YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, JUNE 24TH, 1899.

DEATH.

At the Grand Hotel, Yokohama, on June 20, 1899, FRANCES DANA, wife of Frederick C. Walcott, of New York Mills, New York.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

THE Australians won the second test match at Lord's by ten wickets.

THE tribunal for discussing the Venezuela question has assembled in Paris.

OVER 350 emigrants left for Hawaii by the steamer Coptic on Saturday.

MR. TAKAHIRA, ex Minister to Vienna, who has recently returned to Tokyo, is appointed Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs.

It is reported that His Imperial Majesty will pay a visit to Yokosuka at the beginning of July.

A TELEGRAM announces that in Amoy and the vicinity the black plague is more prevalent than ever.

THE Australians have won the match against Oxford University, Past and Present, by ten wickets.

A NEW YORK telegram states that the silk market is dull, and there is no present prospect of revival.

THE Nippon Railway Company invites tenders for 120 miles of rails, locomotives, passenger coaches, &c.

MR. MAKINO has been appointed Minister to Vienna, and is to leave for his post at the end of this month.

MARQUIS SAIGO, Minister for Home Affairs, who has been in the western cities, returned to Tokyo on the evening of the 19th.

ON the 18th about 200 yards of telephone line were cut and stolen at Miyoshi-cho, Yokohama. The offender is not yet found.

PRINCE HENRY of Prussia returned from Seoul on the 19th to the Deutschland at Jinsen, and thence put to sea. He will shortly visit Japan.

THE plague in Formosa is more severe than ever. From the beginning of this year down to the 19th, there were 2,507 cases, and 1,746 died.

THE attempts to form a Cabinet in France have failed. Politicians shrink from the probable consequences of the new Court-martial on Dreyfus.

THE police station in Tankiji Settlement, Tokyo, will be abolished from 17th July, and its business transferred to the Kyobayashi Police Station.

MR. HAYASHI, new Japanese Minister to Seoul, left Tokyo for his post on Friday. His departure was hastened by the occurrence of the recent outrages.

M. DOORNICKEFF, the great Russian violinist, gave a concert on Thursday evening. It was artistically a great success, though the attendance was meagre.

THE new transport Kosai Maru, of the Red Cross Society, has arrived at Nagasaki, and will be employed by the Nippon Yusen Kaisha on the Hongkong-Vladivostok line.

Six cases of bar gold, value yen 500,000, were brought from London by the steamer Kama-tura Maru, and were delivered on the 19th inst. to the Yokohama Specie Bank.

TELEGRAMS from Hongkong state that Chinese rice has risen about 10 sen per bag. The reason is that in Canton and the vicinity the weather has been unfavourable this spring.

CONCERNING the explosion at Toyokuni colliery, an official telegram states that the disaster was caused by a fallen lantern. As a result, 222 coolies were killed and one was injured. Twelve dead bodies have been found.

A DESPATCH from Jinsen, Korea, announces that three military officials have been arrested at Seoul charged with a plot to dethrone the Emperor, and to put on the throne Prince Li Sung-young, who is staying in the United States.

A WOMAN named Cho (26), wife of Yoshida Kinjuro (30), living at Imagawa-cho, Kanda, Tokyo, strangled her young son Tsunetaro (4) early on the morning of the 19th. She afterwards jumped into a well, where she was found by neighbours.

A MAN named Anzai Seijiro (20), an employe of Mr. Durand, No. 83 Settlement, Yokohama, attempted to commit suicide on the 21st with a girl named Wakamatsu (19) at a house of ill-fame. Both were found with their throats cut, and as they were still alive they were sent to the hospital.

COMPARATIVE statistics of tea transactions in Yokohama show that up to the middle of June last year 117,966 cattie were brought into the market and 9,970,900 lbs. sold, while this year 129,384 cattie have been brought in and 11,303,300 lbs. sold. There is thus an increase as regards quantity, but the quality is inferior to last year.

MR. GEORGE WYNNDHAM has introduced a bill in the House of Commons authorizing the Government to raise a sum of four millions sterling for the purpose of arming the defences abroad with heavy guns, and building barracks both at home and abroad. The bill is merely a continuation of the policy inaugurated by the Government in 1897.

THE Marquis of Lansdowne, Her Majesty's Secretary of State for War, held a lengthy conference with the principal officials of the War Office on Monday, the 19th instant. The conference is believed to have had reference to affairs in the Transvaal. A large exodus of women and children has taken place from Johannesburg and Pretoria. The natives are quitting the mines.

A DEBATE has taken place in the House of Commons on the motion of Sir H. Fowler for disallowing the Indian countervailing duties on sugar. Lord George Hamilton, in the course of a speech opposing the motion, said that he entertained a strong impression that the Currency Commission would be able to submit a report containing propositions for establishing a stable rate of exchange. The motion was rejected by 293 votes to 153.

THE German Reichstag has adopted the bill embodying a loan for the purchase of the Caralines. The Minister for Foreign Affairs, Herr von Bülow, speaking with reference to the bill, predicted a splendid future, both political and commercial, for the islands, and expressed the hope that their possession by Germany would lead to increased intimacy with her new neighbours, the United States and Japan. The Minister added that Germany had never entertained any thought of closing the path to the active and talented Japanese.

IT is expected, says the China Mail, that the Oregon Volunteer Regiment, now in Manila, will go home in the transport Hancock calling in at Nagasaki. This will be the first American regiment ordered home from Manila. The Oregon was one of the first regiments to land at Cavite, and, although the regiment took no part in the attack on Malate fort, they have had a considerable amount of fighting in the outskirts of Manila since the American occupation. It is considered probable that the Californian Volunteers, now in the Island of Negros, will be sent home in the transport Warren.

THE TRANSVAAL TROUBLE.

Saturday, June 17.

Affairs appear to have entered a very ominous phase in the Transvaal. The crisis—for such it must now be called—had its proximate cause in a petition which was presented by the Uitlanders to the Queen, some time ago. The document, which bore more than 21,000 signatures, declared that, owing to the utterly defective protection afforded by the Transvaal Authorities, the lives and properties of the petitioners were in constant peril; that the general administration was radically detrimental to the petitioners and to the country, and that the Uitlanders generally were denied all the public rights to which they were duly entitled by every principle of political justice. For a moment this petition was slightly discredited by a counter-petition bearing 9,000 signatures—British, American, German, French and Dutch—which categorically denied all accusations embodied in the former document. But the second petition only served to evoke a third, confirming and emphasizing the first. Moreover an analysis of the state of affairs in the Transvaal showed that out of a total white population of about 100,000, there are certainly a good many who find their account in the very abuses condemned by the respectable section of the Uitlanders, and who would consequently be injured by any administrative reforms. These conservatives consist of the sellers of illicit liquor, who number some 5,000; the sellers of illicit gold, who are supposed to total 2,000, a not unreasonable estimate, seeing that from 10 to 20 per cent. of the aggregate output of the gold mines is stolen every year—a theft of from 2 million to 4 million pounds sterling; the whole official class of the Netherlands Railways—and the idle section of the Boer population. These people were the signatories of the counter-petition. The Uitlanders are not at all unreasonable in their demands. What they ask for is full franchise after five years' residence, with property and education tests; and a redistribution of representation on lines that would still leave to the Boers an effective voice. The Uitlanders form two-thirds of the whole white population, and it is monstrous that they should be excluded, as they are at present, from any real share in the administration of a country which lives almost entirely by their labour and capital. But President Kruger seems to have resolved that he will make no tangible concessions. We admire his courage, but marvel at his rashness. If he had nothing to fear at home his bold attitude abroad would be less remarkable, but with a hostile element of almost overwhelming dimensions in his own camp, his defiance of England must be due either to insanity or to a profound faith in her pacific proclivities. He has probably gone too far now to recede. Certainly the Queen's Government has.

Tuesday, June 20.

The Emperor of Germany is acting a fine part in the Transvaal difficulty. If his Majesty has really instructed the German Consul at Pretoria to urge upon President Kruger the advisability of conceding England's demands as "just and reasonable," he has taken a step which will win for him much good-will from the people of his mother's country. We see no reason to doubt the correctness of the telegram, for certainly Great Britain has not asked for anything which can possibly be called excessive, and certainly the attitude of the Boers is irreconcilable with any principle of fair play. It has been well said that the spectacle now presented by the Transvaal is not to be seen, and never has been seen, in any other part of the world. A large British population, considerably larger than the entire burgher population of the country, is living in a country surrounded by British possessions, and entirely excluded from any participation in its government. These men have asked for a moderate measure of the rights, privileges, and liberties which civilization regards as the natural possession of every educated individual having a vested interest in the land of his residence, and they have been met by proposals little better than a farce. Mr. Kruger offers them an arrangement which takes no account of their past residence in the Transvaal; which asks them to qualify by living there for a farther period of almost prohibitive length; which requires that two-thirds of the burghers must approve before the franchise is granted to any Uitlander; which calls for a humiliating form of oath, and which prescribes that a candidate for the rights of citizenship must renounce his previous allegiance for several years before becoming eligible, thus losing the citizenship of his own country without any assurance of gaining that of the Transvaal. Proposals of that character can scarcely be regarded as bona fide. The Boers would be more likely to find some approval if they boldly stated their intention of departing from the custom of all civilized countries, and declining to recognise domicile, however lengthy, as conferring on any alien a claim to the rights of citizenship. They might plead, with some show of justice, that to enfranchise foreigners who outnumber the natives would be virtually to surrender to the former the control of the country. But when they acknowledge, on the one hand, that the Uitlanders have a claim to the franchise, and propose, on the other, to make its acquisition conditional on prohibitive qualifications, they are merely flouting Great Britain. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman fails to see any reason for military preparations. He is probably one of the Radicals that follow the example of Mr. Bryn Roberts, and are shocked by such a violation of time-honoured proprieties as the official reception by England of a political petition from British subjects living in a foreign country.

Wednesday, June 21.

The burghers of the Transvaal appear to be persuaded that they can defy Great Britain. They are men of slow mental processes, and probably their memory of the successes they achieved at Majuba Hill and on the occasion of Jameson's raid is more vivid than their perception of England's real strength. The proposals referred to in this morning's telegram are those which we spoke of in a recent issue, and the reference to Bloemfontein is explained by the fact that a federal union is contemplated between the two South African republics, and in the negotiations for that purpose President Kruger made known to the Orange Free State the franchise concessions which he was prepared to offer to the Uitlanders. There is no probability whatever that the Imperial Government will endorse such proposals, and the attitude now assumed by the burghers renders the prospect of a peaceful solution very remote. The Uitlanders ask for the franchise after five years' residence, as a matter of right, subject, of course, to certain qualificatory tests. The burghers offer a remote possibility of obtaining the franchise after 7 years' residence, and couple the grant with virtually prohibitive conditions. They fear to be swamped by the Uitlanders if they enfranchise them, and they consequently regard this question as one of life and death. We can not refuse tribute of admiration to their courage, for they are defying not merely a great foreign Power, but also a preponderating element of their own population.

Friday, June 23.

The news just received with reference to affairs in the Transvaal seems to indicate that a dangerous crisis has been reached. President Kruger and the burghers will not recede from the illiberal position taken by them, and it is quite impossible that Her Majesty's Government can agree to the illusory scheme of enfranchisement elaborated by Kruger at Bloemfontein. The Boers are probably relying on Great Britain's reluctance to undertake a campaign which must inevitably involve a large loss of life. The Transvaal has a population of 750,000, but only 150,000 are whites, and of these 63,000 are Transvaal Boers and 87,000 Uitlanders, no less than 69,600 of the Uitlanders being British subjects. It is probable that the Boers could place a force of fully ten thousand men in the field, and as they are splendid marksmen and thoroughly acquainted with the features of the country, they could offer a formidable opposition to an invading army.

Since the above was written further intelligence confirms the alarmist view suggested by the telegrams of the 21st instant. Of course Mr. Chamberlain's hand can be plainly detected behind the policy that Great Britain is now pursuing. He will have the support of the nation, despite the opposition of men like Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman and Mr. Bryn Roberts. Moreover, the foresight which induced him to begin the massing of troops in South Africa some months ago will now be fully appreciated. Mr. Chamberlain's career has certainly been a series of paradoxes. His political training and associations should render him a man of peace par excellence, yet, ever since the bombardment of Alexandria, he seems to have been engaged in trying to hold open the doors of the British temple of Janus. In the present instance he has the right unquestionably on his side. If Mr. Kruger and his fellow-nationals are incapable of appreciating the impossibility of the situation they are obstinately trying to uphold, then the sooner they are deprived of their mischievously exercised authority, the better. If, though appreciating it, they arbitrarily decline to remedy it, then they are simply flouting Great Britain. The Times recently put the case in a nut-shell when it charged the Transvaal Government with "showing a determination to refuse political rights to the portion of the population who have brought in capital and created wealth and upon whom almost the whole burden of taxation is piled up for the benefit of a small minority." We can not doubt that the feeling in England is much accentuated by Kruger's meeting with Sir Alfred Milner. The Boer President had never, throughout the course of those long complications, made any attempt to confer with the British High Commissioner, though he must have well understood that no overture pointing to a conference could come from the Suzerain Power. Hence, when he did at length step forward, it was reasonably expected that he entertained some rudimentary idea of behaving in a practical and conciliatory manner. But his proposals proved to be a mere farce, so that the meeting assumed an almost insulting complexion. It would appear that he expects to repeat the experiences of 1881 if Great Britain has recourse to arms. But England now understands the nature of the task, and will make no mistake in dealing with it.

COPYRIGHT AND TRANSLATIONS.

The Law of Copyright provides that the copyright of literary and scientific works includes the right of translation, but that if the proprietor of a copyright does not publish a translation within 10 years from the date of publication of the original work, his right of translation ceases. These provisions have been regarded as very important from a Japanese point of view, inasmuch as the translating of works published abroad has hitherto been freely and largely undertaken in Japan, many valuable books being thus brought within reach of Japanese students. The law is decidedly accommodating in one respect, however. The 49th Article says:—

Translations made or commenced prior to the operation of this Law, and not regarded as illicit at that time, may be completed and sold and circulated. But such translations must be published within 7 years from the date of operation of this Law.

In carrying out this provision, the question whether a translation has been commenced depends solely upon due notice in that sense being given to the proper Authorities. The Law will go into force from the 15th July. There is still, therefore, an interval of nearly a month during which the notice alluded to may be given, and the translation need not be finished and published for seven years thereafter. It will be in the interest of persons connected with the enterprise of translation, to prepare and submit, between now and 15th July, an exhaustive list of all the European and American books that may possibly repay the task of rendering them into Japanese. They need not necessarily be translated, but the notice will secure the right to translate and publish them at any time before 1906.

A DAYLIGHT ROBBERY.

Shiozawa Yoshiji (13), an employer of the Wakao Silk Store, 4-chome, Honcho, Yokohama, was yesterday morning walking near the Boyski Shimbun office, having in his possession 6,000 yen belonging to the firm which he had received from the Specie Bank, when a man suddenly attacked him and forcibly robbed him of the money. He was on the point of running away when the boy cried for help, and a constable of the Kagacho Police Office arrested the thief. He proved to be a coolie named Aoshiba Torazo (25), living at Fukutomicho.

The property of the North China Insurance Company in the Hankow Road, Shanghai, has been sold for Tls. 14,000, the purchaser being a Chinese.

THE SAMOAN COMPLICATIONS.

We are at a loss to understand Herr von Bülow's declaration that Germany will not consent to any encroachment on the rights secured to her by the Samoan Treaty. Germany does not possess under that Treaty any rights which are not guaranteed equally to the United States and Great Britain. One of those rights is the nomination of the Chief Justice and the Municipal President by the three Treaty Powers, and one of the charges preferred against the German Consul-General, Herr Rose, is that, in conjunction with the Municipal President—who also is a German—he declared the office of Chief Justice to be vacant, thus contravening the letter and the spirit of the Treaty of 1889. It would seem, indeed, that the "encroachment" upon the rights secured by the Treaty may be laid at Germany's door. Concerning the indemnity for loss of property, the reference is evidently to German claims arising out of the bombardment of Apia by the ships of Great Britain and the United States. But the bombardment was necessitated by the violent proceedings of Mataafa, Germany's protégé. The Germans themselves have never made any secret of the fact that Mataafa could always be controlled by them. Thus, in a telegram dated at Apia, April 22nd, and published by the National-Zeitung, it was plainly stated that after orders had been sent from London and Washington to cease hostilities, "Mataafa withdrew far westwards into the interior, in compliance with the demand of the German Consul." Of course, Germany retorts that Mataafa was the lawful king, and that, had not Malietoa been encouraged by England and America, there would have been no trouble. That is the main point to be decided by the Commission now sitting at Apia under the auspices of the three Powers. The "illegal arrest of a German subject" spoken of by Herr von Bülow, refers, we presume, to the case of the German planter Hufnagel, who is believed to have been in collusion with the rebels that ambuscaded an Anglo-American force on April 1st, killing one British and two American officers, and killing or wounding 11 men of the allied detachment. The party, en route for Vailele to break up the assemblage of rebels there, reached the plantation of which Herr Hufnagel was manager, and, having inquired of the latter whether any Samoans were in the neighbourhood, received a negative answer, although there had been a large body of Mataafa's men within a few hundred yards. Hufnagel advised the party to take the main road through the plantation, as all was safe and there were no rebels about; advice which was heard by three other Germans, none of whom gave any warning of danger. The detachment followed the route indicated, and, marching into a gulley, was caught in an ambuscade. This led to the arrest of Hufnagel. He was ultimately transferred to the German ship Falke. It can not be doubted, however, that the German Government has full faith in the justice of the position taken by it, and we do not imagine that such a petty business will be suffered to disturb the good relations of the three Powers concerned.

THE GERMAN MINISTER FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS AND JAPAN.

The Japanese will justly be gratified by the friendly and flattering terms in which Herr von Bülow alluded to them when supporting the Bill for the Carolines-purchase loan. A prudent reticence has been preserved by Japan throughout the course of events leading to the acquisition of the Philippines by America and the Carolines by Germany. But it may fairly be taken for granted that this re-drafting of the map did not find the Japanese unmoved. They believe that Phœnician civilization came to them in ancient eras via the Philippines; their history shows that they have had more than ordinarily close relations with the islands in mediæval days, and ever since Mr. Inagaki Manjiro and Mr. Taguchi Ukichi directed public attention in modern times to the field of South-Sea opportunities, there has been in the minds of many Japanese a hope, more or less clearly outlined, that the star of empire would ultimately travel in that direction. Herr von Bülow had doubtless been informed of all this, and the information made him stand up in the Reichstag, and promise "the active, intelligent Japanese" that the exclusive policy which certain States have adopted towards them will not be imitated by Germany, and that they may expect to find an open field for their enterprise and a welcome for their labour in the Carolines. We are a little at a loss to understand the German Minister's rosy predictions about the future of islands which can not boast a population of more than 150,000, do not produce anything of special value, and offer no prospect of becoming a market for imports. But some allowances must be made for the exaggeration of parliamentary rhetoric.

THE STATE PURCHASE OF PRIVATE RAILWAYS.

We have heard nothing lately of the project which attracted so much attention when it came upon the tapis in a practical sense during the last session of the Diet, namely, the State purchase of private railways. But the Yorozu Chohan now states that the Committee of Investigation has been making great progress with its labours, and has decided to recommend the immediate acquisition of the Hokkaido Tan-ko Railway, the Nippon Railway, and the Kōbu Railway, 35 million yen of the purchase money to be paid during the "First Period." From this we infer that the Committee contemplates dividing the execution of the project into periods after the plan pursued in the case of railway construction. What that involves we do not clearly perceive. Does it mean that the State's title of ownership is to remain merely nominal until all the instalments of the purchase money are paid, the companies meanwhile working the lines; or does it mean that the State takes over the lines from the time of paying the first instalment? Our contemporary's information is decidedly vague, and its conjecture that the money representing the first instalment—35 million yen—will be defrayed out of the loan just raised abroad, appears to be based on a misconception. The scheme, as we understand it, does not contemplate any hard-money payments. The companies would receive bonds only.

DYNAMITARDS IN KOREA.

Saturday, June 17.

We mentioned in our last issue that certain Japanese adventurers had been arrested in Sōul on suspicion of being implicated in the recent dynamite outrages. The Government of Japan has deemed it expedient to adopt special measures with regard to these agitators. An extraordinary Cabinet Council was held immediately on receipt of the news, and an Imperial Ordinance has now been issued, empowering the Japanese Authorities to deport from Korea all Japanese subjects proved to have taken part in the outrages or to have harboured their perpetrators. It will appear to most observers that this is a wise measure. Japan is most unfortunate in her relations with Korea. Just as the execrable part acted by some of her subjects in connexion with the murder of the Queen was beginning to be forgotten, these dynamite complications come to renew the injury to her credit and popularity. It is evident that the Cabinet knew better than the Houses of the Diet what was needed when it enacted its Tokō Jōrei for controlling the passions of its subjects in the peninsula. The regulations were denounced by the Diet as altogether despotic, but they were obviously needed.

Monday, June 19.

The Japanese Government has considered it necessary to revive the restrictions formerly imposed on the travel of Japanese subjects to Korea. Briefly stated, the restrictions are that, with the exception of civil officials and military or naval officers, as well as persons specially authorized, no Japanese is allowed to cross to Korea without a permit from the authorities.

We need scarcely say that the opposition press does not fail to make capital out of these occurrences in Sōul. The burden of the hostile refrain is that the Foreign Office has lost its head, and fallen into a ferment of quite unnecessary trepidation. The Nippon and the Mainichi especially appear to think that since the Government had not sufficient foresight to prevent these dynamite outrages, it need not trouble itself particularly to punish their perpetrators or to restrict the circle of mischief. The former journal goes so far as to declare that the Tokyo Foreign Office is like a woman who gets into a flutter about petty details of her toilet and gives herself no concern about public questions. Are we to conclude, then, that the Nippon counts it a petty matter to throw dynamite bombs into the residences of Ministers of State? It is precisely owing to the prevalence of such views among certain sections of the Japanese people that a very false estimate exists as to the responsibility attaching to acts which are elsewhere considered of the greatest gravity. A philosophical frame of mind is a very fine thing, but one respects it more when it is associated with some show of consistency. This very Nippon, for example, which condemns the Government for adopting strict measures to put an end to outrages perpetrated by its own nationals against the lives and properties of a neighbouring country's statesmen, devotes article after article and note after note to stirring up public excitement about a petty theft of five hundred pounds sterling from the Bank of Japan.

The theory now regarded as most probable with regard to the origin of the outrages is that they were designed to intimidate the Korean Government into abandoning its intention of reviving the barbarous legislation of old times which included the whole of a political offender's family in the punishment to which he became liable. So far as that is concerned the dynamitards seem to have achieved their purpose, for the Korean Cabinet is reported to be in a state of great trepidation, several of its members not venturing to emerge from hiding places to which they have retired. Meanwhile the conspirators, probably seeing that their bombs are not likely to be of further use, have exploded two of them in a secluded place.

Tuesday, June 20.

After all, the wool in the Korean affair does not appear to have been nearly commensurate with the cry raised by the public or with the measures taken by the Japanese Government. The general impression now existing is that quite a number of Japanese sōshi were engaged in the dynamite outrages, and that several were arrested and are now undergoing trial. But the facts are that not even one was arrested, and that suspicion attaches to one only. That one is a man who lent his name to Pak Yong-ho when the latter was obliged to fly from Korea. Pak being charged with a political offence, his house and all his property would have been confiscated after his flight had they stood in his own name. He therefore persuaded a Japanese friend to lend his name for purposes of registration, a service which the Japanese was doubtless very willing to perform, inasmuch as Pak's crime had been nothing worse than too loyal devotion to the cause of civilized progress. Now it was in Pak's house, or rather in the house really belonging to Pak but nominally owned by his Japanese friend, that the recently employed dynamite bombs are supposed to have been manufactured, and a certain responsibility consequently attaches to the registered owner of the place. The latter is therefore undergoing examination at the hands of the Japanese Consul in Sōul. That seems to be the whole story. It is evident that only very slender prima facie grounds exist for suspecting collusion on the part of the Japanese. The strong probability is that, after lending his name to save Pak's property, he did not interfere any further in the matter, or give himself any concern about the uses to which the house was put. Still, so long as he appeared upon the register, he was more or less answerable, and it is likely that he will have difficulty in clearing himself altogether. Such, then, seems to be the sole basis of the agitation raised about Japanese sōshi in Sōul and about their implication in the bomb-throwing enterprise. Such, too, seems to be the Tokyo Government's sole reason for enacting special laws to provide for the deportation of suspicious Japanese and to bring under close official scrutiny all Japanese subjects travelling to Korea. We are disposed to agree with the Opposition journals that the effect was quite out of proportion to the cause. Japanese Consuls in Korea have already ample competence to deport objectionable characters, and it can hardly be claimed that the possibility of one man's indirect implication constitutes a sufficient reason for compelling every one that crosses to the peninsula to carry a passport. Perhaps the action of the Japanese Authorities is based upon facts of which they alone have cognisance, but it is unfortunately certain that a very exaggerated idea has been conveyed to the general public.

Thursday, June 22.

The Government's action in connexion with recent events in Korea is vindicated by the Kokumin Shinbun in an article which, though cleverly written, will scarcely pacify the Cabinet's opponents. Its gist is that Japan's special interests in Korea are recognised—interests based not merely on political considerations but also upon Korea's value as a source of supply—by Western Powers as well as by Korea herself, and that the utmost circumspection ought therefore to be observed in dealing with the peninsular empire. Japan's influence and prestige suffered severely from the action of her people on the occasion of the murder of the Queen, and, just as that evil memory has nearly been lived down, it would be most unfortunate if the good faith of this nation were again brought into suspicion by an appearance of connexion with the dynamite outrages. The Government has therefore deemed it advisable to adopt precautions of a more than ordinarily stringent character.

We may notice in this context a really entertaining essay in the Mainichi Shinbun. Two or three days ago the Mainichi published an article headed "Don't get into a fluster and panic" (rōbai kōbō suru nakare), the object of which was to prove that the Government had lost its head, and that the special powers of deportation created by Imperial Ordinance, and the special restraints imposed upon travel to Korea, were the outcome of pure nervousness and perturbation on the part of the Cabinet. Now, however, the same journal preaches on the text "the degree of sensibility is a measure of civilization" (kankaku no teido bummei no kōge), and the only conclusion we can arrive at after reading the article is that our worthy contemporary has engaged in the operation of "hedging." It intends to make a case against the Cabinet under any and all circumstances, and accordingly, whereas on the 17th instant it denounced the statesmen in power for adopting overactive measures in the Korean complication, it now accuses Marquis Yamagata of uncivilized imperturbability because he remains quietly in Kyoto while a solitary Japanese subject is suspected of having lent to Korean dynamitards a house nominally owned by him in Sōul, and while tongues are wagging in Tokyo about a theft of five hundred pounds from the Bank of Japan. That is heads-I-win-tails-you-lose criticism with a vengeance. A note of colour is given to the volte-face performance by an anecdote in which M. Boissonade figures. On the occasion of the Formosan complication in 1873, says the Mainichi, when war with China seemed imminent, a Cabinet meeting was held to discuss the situation, and one of the Ministers, instead of attending to the proceedings, occupied himself shaping pot-books and hangers in an English copy-book, the study of that language being his hobby at the moment. M. Boissonade complimented him sarcastically on his sang-froid, and observed that a French Cabinet Minister under similar circumstances would have displayed a very different demeanour. "Was the Japanese statesman right and would the Frenchman have been wrong?" is the Mainichi's suggestive question. Eighteen hundred and seventy-three is a retrospect of 26 years. We remember very vividly the excitement that prevailed in Tokyo among all classes of the people at that epoch. If civilization produces highly strung nerves, the Japanese were then very civilized.

A telegram to the Fiji Shimpō, despatched from Chemulpo at 6 p.m. on the 19th instant, says that two captains in the Korean army and two other persons have been apprehended on a charge of plotting to dethrone the present Emperor. The Korean people seem to have a fever of conspiracy in their blood. The wonder is that failure does not act as a febrifuge. During the past twenty years, plot has followed plot and conspiracy has succeeded conspiracy, yet not in so much as one solitary instance have the plotters been able to congratulate themselves on the result of their machinations. All that they have effected is to people the neighbouring empire of Japan with political refugees. Some hope of respite was entertained when the Tai Wōn-kun died, but the spirit of that arch schemer still appears to stalk abroad. What a pity it is that international ethics do not sanction the peaceful assumption of administrative authority in the peninsula by some foreign Power competent to secure the maintenance of good order.

THE INDIAN SUGAR DUTIES.

The House of Commons, by rejecting the motion of the former Secretary of State for India, Sir H. Fowler, with reference to the Indian sugar duties, seems to have practically declared its unwillingness to impose any restraint on the competence of the Indian Legislature, acting in conjunction with Her Majesty's Secretary of State, to enact whatever laws may be considered conducive to the interests of the Dependency. It would scarcely have been possible to apply a severer test of the House's willingness to recognise the autonomy of the Indian Legislature, for the proposed countervailing duty on sugar is altogether contrary to the economic convictions of Englishmen in general. Such a measure is distinctly at variance with the principles of free trade. Still we must not interpret the defeat of Sir Henry Fowler's motion as an admission on the part of the House that, although free trade is good for Great Britain herself, it is not necessarily good for countries acknowledging British sway. In all probability the House's action was based solely on the consideration that interference of such a nature would be mischievous under any circumstances, and the merits of the question raised by Sir H. Fowler did not directly influence the voting. Indian Viceroy, however, have always endeavoured to be loyal to the economic doctrines of the Sovereign State. It was avowedly for that reason that Lord Elgin declined to endorse the proposal for a duty on imported cotton fabrics, and Lord Curzon's approval of the sugar duty will, of course, be criticized as an unwholesome departure from sound precedents. Of course England herself has no direct interest in India's attitude towards foreign sugar, whereas she has a very lively interest in the free admission of Manchester goods to the markets of the great dependency. But we are disposed to think that the constitutional issue alone was the basis of the House's vote, and that the economic question did not materially affect the result.

BUDDHISTS AND THE STATE.

Monday, June 19.

It does not appear that the Buddhists themselves are agitating for State recognition as strongly as might have been supposed had rumour been entirely trustworthy. Certain politicians have adopted the question as a principal plank of their platform, but they do not seem to have inspired the Buddhists with much enthusiasm. Such at least is the inference we draw from the report of the recent meeting of Sect Prelates held at the temple Kennin-ji in Kyoto from the 5th to the 12th instant. Among over sixty resolutions adopted by the meeting, we do not find one indicating a determination to seek State recognition. The only noteworthy features of the resolutions were, first, that, if Japanese disciples of Buddhism residing in a foreign country apply for a minister of their creed, the Government shall provide due facilities for his despatch; secondly, that if the Authorities contemplate any change in the present laws relating to Buddhism or the enactment of any new laws, reference must first be made to the assembly of Sectarian Prelates; and thirdly, that exemption from conscription up to the age of 28 should be granted to students in Buddhist schools. The second and third of these proposals are distinctly important, for, while one of them aims at virtually declaring the Buddhist priesthood to be independent of all legislative enactments which have not received their previous endorsement, the second seeks to pledge the Government to the very course which it shows so much reluctance to adopt, namely, the abandonment of all discrimination against religion in the field of education. We sincerely hope that the Buddhists may succeed in the latter enterprise.

Very bitter articles are published by both the Fiji Shimpō and the Nichi Nichi Shimbun with reference to this question. The Fiji Shimpō, reverting to its favourite argument that Mixed Residence will constitute a test of Japanese conduct and morality, taunts the Buddhists with devoting their time to agitation of a more or less political nature when they ought to be wholly engrossed in endeavouring to lead the people into the right path, and speaks in scathing terms of disgraceful lives of self-indulgence led by certain Buddhist prelates who should be shining examples of high morals, but are, on the contrary, influences for encouraging evil. The Nichi Nichi devotes its columns chiefly to denouncing the idea that the State should associate itself with a creed, and declares that, since the absence of any connexion between Church and State has always constituted a highly commendable feature of Japan's polity, it would be infinitely regrettable now to depart from such a wholesome custom. We presume that the Nichi Nichi has Japan's modern history alone in view when it speaks in the above strain, for certainly her ancient records do not justify any such eulogium.

Thursday, June 22.

Referring to the recent meeting of Buddhist prelates in the temple Kennin-ji in Kyoto, we noted that, so far as the published reports showed, there was no evidence that the Buddhists really entertain the project attributed to them, namely, to have their religion recognised as the State creed of Japan. But later and fuller accounts of the meeting's proceedings show that a resolution in that sense was actually introduced, and that it found support from the representatives of the Shingon, the Rinzai, and the Soto sects. But the great Shin sect resolutely condemned such a notion. Count Otani, the chief prelate of the Hongwan-ji, seems to have delivered a most enlightened speech. He pointed out, in the course of his remarks, that the step proposed by the other sects would be contrary to the Constitution, which, by declaring absolute freedom of conscience, has given to all religions an equal status in the eyes of the law. The result of this opposition was that the proposal fell through, and nothing more is likely to be heard of it for the present at all events. It is significant that Count Otani alluded, in terms of unequivocal condemnation, to the tendency shown by some religious leaders to associate themselves with politics. We may therefore infer that the talk of an alliance between the Shin sect and the new political party has no foundation in fact.

THE CHINESE IN JAPAN.

The discussion continues about the advisability of throwing open the country to the Chinese in common with other foreigners from next month. We strongly advise the Japanese to refrain from doing anything of the kind. Nothing is easier than to make such a concession; nothing more difficult than to retract it. There can not be any special desire at present to add a large Chinese element to the population. Granting all the good points of the individual Chinaman—and they make a very long list—it is not to be denied that he is an undesirable member of any community which adapts itself to Western civilization. His scale of living is very low; his habits are insanitary; he introduces customs which are not conducive to morality; he keeps himself apart from the native population; and he does not regard as his home the country to which he emigrates. There are people who deny that the last objection applies as forcibly to the Chinaman in Japan as it applies to the Chinaman in Australia and America. In either of the latter countries he finds easy opportunities of making money, and his constant aim is to escape to China with his earnings; whereas in Japan he is not able to save money quickly, and he usually ends by marrying a Japanese wife and settling here permanently. Granting all that, we still say that the lower classes of the Chinese are not desirable additions to the population of this country, and that to throw the gates open to them without any limitation would be a mistake which Japan might repent too late. Between China and Japan as places of residence and bread-earning there is no comparison. Life in China is, as a rule, an unlovely, grimy struggle, without any redeeming features of environment or climate. Life in Japan is comparative elysium. The shrewd Chinaman discovered the difference long ago, and has proved his appreciation of it. There are already three Chinese settlers in Japan for every one European or American, and that, too, although the Chinaman at present is not much more than a parasite on the foreign Settlements. The ratio would become more striking if the Chinese had free access to the interior. Numbers of them would certainly find means of livelihood in or about all the chief cities, and vested interests would quickly be created which would render it almost impossible to adopt any restrictive measures hereafter. Of course it is not a neighbourly act on Japan's part to withhold from the Chinese privileges that she grants to other peoples. But one of the chief difficulties lies in that very fact of neighbourhood. If the Chinese empire with its teeming millions were five thousand miles distant instead of being at her very doors, she might treat this problem differently. Under existing conditions, however, she has to face a danger far more imminent and of much larger dimensions than the peril against which the United States and Australia have deemed it necessary to enact special legislation. The Chinese may swamp her at any moment if she opens her gates to them. Besides, in her case there is not even the consideration that has been urged by critics of American and Australian exclusiveness; the consideration that Chinese cheap labour may be useful to develop her resources. She has sufficient cheap labour of her own for all immediate purposes. From every point of view it seems to us that this is essentially an occasion for caution. No importance attaches to the argument advanced in some quarters, that since China does not throw open her whole territories to the Japanese, the latter are under no obligation to throw open theirs to her. Occidental Powers never allowed any such consideration to weigh with them against Japan in the days of her semi-isolation, and they do not now attach any importance to it as against China. The really cogent reason is that Japan had better not take too many burdens upon her shoulders simultaneously. She can grant this privilege to the Chinese hereafter just as easily as she could grant it now. Let her be content to wait and see how things fare with her under the new system to which she is already pledged. She need not be deterred by reluctance to discriminate against China. She has been discriminating against the Chinese in other ways ever since the war.

GAMBLING IN JAPAN.

The prison statistics for 1896 show that out of 184,062 criminals, no less than 53,896, or nearly one-third, were imprisoned for gambling. Taking that figure on a basis, Mr. Taguchi Ukichi has written in the Keizai Zasshi three articles advocating the abolition of the law which declares gambling an offence. He deems it a hopeless undertaking to attempt to put down gambling, and is persuaded that the evils resulting from the effort outweigh the advantages secured. One of those evils is the corruption of the police. Considering the widely extended practice of gambling, it is evident that if the police arrested gamblers without favour or affection, the jails would be quite inadequate to accommodate these offenders. But the custom at present is to set aside 4 per cent. of the profits realized by gambling as tera, or remuneration for the use of the room where the game is carried on, and out of that sum the owner of the premises "squares" the police, so as to secure immunity for his guests. Were the law abolished, the Code would cease to be disfigured by what is virtually a dead letter, the standard of police integrity would be raised, and the cost of maintaining the prisons would be reduced by 30 per cent. On the threshold of mixed residence, too, it behoves the Government to consider this question from another point of view—that of the foreign resident. The Keizai says that nearly all the foreign residents gamble. Gambling was openly carried on at the races last month when the Emperor was present. Gambling is carried on at the regattas. Tickets for lotteries are publicly sold in the Settlements, and gambling takes place perpetually in clubs and private houses. Is it proposed to arrest every foreigner detected engaging in such pursuits? Better recognise at once the unpractical character of such action, and abolish the law which declares gambling a crime.

The law referred to by our contemporary is this:—

Whoever shall have held games of chance to profit personally by them, or shall have formed an association of gamblers, shall be punished with imprisonment with labour for a period of from 3 months to 1 year, and a fine of from 10 to 100 yen.

All individuals taken in the act of playing at a game of chance, or who shall have knowingly supplied premises for gamblers, shall be punished with imprisonment with labour for a period of from 1 to 6 months and a fine of from 5 to 50 yen. Games of chance in which the stakes are articles of food or drink are excepted from the present provision. The instruments of games of hazard and the stakes present shall be confiscated.

Whoever shall have organized a lottery to make personal profit by it, shall be punished with imprisonment with labour for a period of from one to six months, and a fine of from 5 to 50 yen.

The law requires, it will be observed, that a man must be taken in the act of gambling in order to be punishable. The idea that the police can raid a private house or a club on the chance of finding a party playing whist or poker is, of course, a mere chimera. Further, it is very doubtful whether betting, as conducted on a race course, falls within the category of games of chance interdicted by the above law.

MORE CHINESE ASSASSINS.

In 1897 it was commonly rumoured that seventeen Chinamen had come to Japan charged with the duty of assassinating Sun Yat-sin. This Mr. Sun is a person with a history. He made himself conspicuous, in the first place, by plotting a rebellion which had its headquarters in Canton, and aimed at the overthrow of the Manchu Dynasty. Having failed in that enterprise, he made his way to England, and was there inveigled into the Chinese Legation and held prisoner until the British Government interfered to procure his release. The case made a great noise at the time, and is doubtless well remembered now. Sun then came to Japan, whither it was said that no fewer than 17 of his fellow-countrymen followed him, with a commission from their own Government to take his life. They did not succeed. Apparently, however, Peking can not sleep quiet so long as Sun is above the ground, for it is said that five fresh assassins have now reached Japan under similar orders. We do not vouch for the truth of the story.

THE ROYAL NIGER COMPANY.

The Royal Niger Company, whose possessions the British Government now contemplates taking over, is one of those colossal organizations characteristic of British enterprise. By some writers it has been compared to the celebrated East India Company which played such a memorable part in history. It is the son and heir of the "National African Company," which, 14 years ago, acquired by purchase or amalgamation the conventional privileges and belongings of the various French companies then trading on the Niger, and negotiated treaties conferring territorial rights with some three hundred native chiefs and States. The immediate result of these proceedings was that the British Government, in 1885, declared a protectorate over the whole coast from Lagos to Rio del Bey; in other words, over an area of 500,000 square miles, with a population of from 20 to 30 millions. Nearly the whole of this vast district was granted to the Royal Niger Company, which received its charter on July 11th, 1886. The Company is not a sovereign, of course. Its administrative and political powers are exercised under the control of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. But for many practical purposes it is virtually autocratic, and a great many good people of the Little-England type have, from time to time, raised their voices against the vesting of such competence in a private corporation. But, whatever may be said by theoretical politicians, it is certain that the Royal Niger Company has done splendid work as a civilizing and commerce-developing agent. It has sternly repressed slave-raiding, that heinous practice which disgraces the 19th century, and it has put an end to inter-tribal war by compelling the native chiefs to submit all their disputes to arbitration. That it has been able to rule so vast a district and such a large population by means of an armed force of only 1,000 men—natives with European officers—supplemented by small squadrons of police at each of the Company's 42 stations, affords a striking object lesson as to the importance of mobility, for if the Company's fleet of 30 steamers, navigating the Niger and its tributaries, did not enable it to concentrate its strength at any given place in the briefest interval, the machinery required for preserving law and order would have to be very largely augmented. The resumption of the administrative power by the British Government does not mean that the British Empire receives a territorial addition equal to more than three times the area of the whole Japanese Empire, but merely that functions hitherto discharged by the Company's officers will now be entrusted to Crown officials.

INCOME TAX IN AMERICA.

The State of Michigan is about to put in operation a graduated income tax from which an annual revenue of a million dollars is expected, and the principal conditions of which are as follows. Incomes of one thousand dollars, or less, are untouched. Upon those ranging from a thousand to twenty-five hundred, a quarter of one per cent. will be levied. Those between twenty-five hundred and five thousand will pay one half of one per cent., and all above five thousand are assessed one per cent. The tax is applied not only to citizens actually dwelling in Michigan. All corporations organized within the State are held liable, even though the stock-holders may be non-residents. The penalty for making false returns of incomes is imprisonment for not less than five or more than fifteen years.

An attempt was made in the legislature to modify the stringency of the last-named provision, but the Senate, not satisfied with rejecting the proposal, enacted an amendment to the effect that proof of intent to deceive should not be essential to a conviction. It is apparently hoped that the severity of the punishment will deter capitalists from following the example of their class in other parts of the country, and flagrantly repudiating their legal obligations. The disposition to escape the burdens of taxation is common enough, all over the world. Few persons are sufficiently tender of conscience to feel ashamed of cheating the Customs on the sly; many, indeed, act as if they considered this species of fraud a perfectly innocent, if not a commendable, practice. But the unconcealed evasions of taxes on property in the United States seem to have passed all bounds of decency. In New York alone millions upon millions go free of impost, for no reason but that the people who possess them do not choose to pay. Mr. Rockefeller, whose income alone would be a gigantic fortune for most individuals, acknowledges only three hundred thousand dollars worth of personal property. The two richest of the Vanderbilts declare four hundred thousand personally each. The younger Rockefeller, Russell Sage, and Pierpont Morgan, all multi-millionaires, are taxed upon less than half a million. For years these men have openly defied the Government, in common with hundreds of their kind, not one of whom has ever been properly held to account. No tax-commissioner has the courage to take proceedings against the pillars of plutocracy. There was a feeble attempt, long ago, to make the wealthiest of railroad proprietors disgorge, but it ended in a compromise that looked very much like the compounding of a felony, and added little to the public revenue. Since then the great capitalists, in New York at least, have had everything their own way. It will be interesting to see what happens in Michigan, when the experiment is fairly tried.

FOREIGN NEWSPAPERS.

We read in the Tokyo Asahi that the chief of the Yokohama police was good enough to send an official to visit the offices of the foreign newspapers in this Settlement, a few days ago, in order to remind the managers that certain formalities as to registration will have to be complied with in connexion with the operation of the Revised Treaties. The Tokyo newspaper says that the official was politely received at the offices of the various journals with one exception. By the foreign staff of a certain newspaper—which is easily identifiable without being named—he was told that he had better go home and send some one fully acquainted with the English language, and that, if any information as to procedure were required, the journal could obtain it from the British Minister without interference on the part of Japanese officials. We presume that there is another side to this story, and that it will be related by the journal concerned. To one point of the Asahi's information we ourselves have a word to say, however. Referring to the security—700 yen—which each of the journals published in Yokohama will be obliged to put up, the police official is said to have stated that deposit receipts of the Specie Bank would not be accepted, a reply which caused some consternation in the offices of the various newspapers. The law being perfectly clear upon this point, we are at a loss to understand the Asahi's information. In the 8th Article of the Press Regulations it is provided that a journal published in Tokyo must put up security to the amount of 1,000 yen; journals published in Kyoto, Osaka, Yokohama, Hyogo, Kobe, and Nagasaki must furnish 700 yen, and journals published elsewhere, 350 yen. With regard to the nature of the payment, it is provided that public loan bonds or deposit receipts of a national bank may be used. There are at present no "national banks" in Japan, but a deposit receipt of the Specie Bank would doubtless be accepted without query. At all events, so long as a newspaper is allowed to put its security into the form of public bonds there can be no complaint on that score. The question of having to furnish security at all is one thing, but so long as the law imposes that necessity, newspapers have only a right to expect that they shall not be deprived of the interest on the money, since they would thus be virtually compelled to pay a tax of from 12½ yen to 50 yen annually in addition to the regular business tax and income tax.

THE TOKYO CITY ASSEMBLY.

The Tokyo City Assembly held its first session on the 15th instant after the election of one half of its members. Contrary to all expectation, Mr. Hoshi Toru did not stand for the presidency, and Mr. Sudo Takiichi, an Independent, was elected, the choice for the Vice-Presidency falling on Mr. Nakajima Matagoro, a Liberal. The members of the new City Council are Messrs. Shibusawa Eiichi (Independent), Yoshino Seikei (Independent), Hoshi Toru (Liberal), Taguchi Ukichi (Independent), Hatoyama Kazuo (Progressist) and Suzuki Nobuto (Independent). This result is regarded as a great victory for the Liberals, for, though they elected only one of their number, they combined with the Independents to oust all the Progressist candidates except Mr. Hatoyama. The names of these City Councillors ought to be a guarantee that Tokyo will be roused from its slumber of municipal incompetence, but hope has become very slender.

The City Assembly's first act was to adopt, by an overwhelming vote, a resolution that absence from Japan in the discharge of official duties does not constitute an interruption of the period of residence prescribed as a qualification for electing or being elected. We may add that the Headman of the Kojimachi District, who attempted to establish the opposite proposition, has been removed from office. He tendered his resignation, but was not allowed to retire in that simple fashion.

THE AMERICAN POSTAL SERVICE.

The Postmaster-General of the United States has recently published an account of the Department under his control which, though wholly informal,—or, it may be, partly for that reason,—contains a much greater variety of interesting information than is ordinarily found in the regular official reports. It is evidently not his intention to offer instruction to the world at large, yet there are few countries in which many of the details described might not be profitably considered. Especially in Japan, those who have brought discredit upon the postal system by the retrogressive features lately introduced, could not occupy themselves more advantageously than by giving their days and nights to a study of the liberal and public-spirited methods employed in America. At the same time they might be warned against the one fatal defect which impairs a service otherwise almost above criticism, and which even its administrative chief has not the hardihood to defend or excuse.

Telegraphic communication is not in the hands of the United States Government, but the postal business alone exceeds in magnitude that of the posts and telegraphs combined in any European country. More than sixty-two hundred million pieces of mail matter were received and delivered last year, and of these nearly one half were letters. It is mainly with letters and newspapers or magazines that the service deals. The transmission of money orders, though extensive, is not so large as in Germany or Great Britain. This is explained, in a measure, by the universal use of cheques, great numbers of which are drawn for much smaller sums than is customary in Europe, and which travel by mail without trouble to the sender. Still, the aggregate amount of money orders, last year, was more than two hundred million dollars,—of which, it may be incidentally mentioned, only forty dollars were lost. In Great Britain, during the same period, upwards of three hundred million dollars were thus transferred; while from Germany the astonishing figure of eighteen hundred millions is reported. In the branch of parcels-conveyance America is also behind. There is, in fact, no domestic parcels post, the opposition of powerful express companies having prevented all efforts in that direction; but parcels are exchanged with many foreign countries, the number of which will be largely increased before the beginning of the next century.

The supreme distinctions of the United States service are the energy and thoroughness shown in all the details of its management,—with the single exception to which we have referred, and of which we shall speak more particularly in due course;—in the daring enterprise which extends the benefits of swift communication to the remotest and least accessible regions with unerring certainty, and in the splendid liberality with which it avails itself of every resource of ingenious invention to promote the efficacy of its operations. Nothing is left undone that can contribute in the slightest degree to the needs or desires of the public. The annual expenditure exceeds one hundred million dollars; and, though the revenue is not far below this sum, it is not because of any economical attempt to secure a balance. A much larger deficit would be ungrudgingly accepted, were it necessary for the further improvement of the service. The low rate of postage is adhered to on principle. The boldest of politicians would not dare to suggest such an increase as the Japanese Government has unwisely decreed this year. There are places in America where no letters can be delivered at a smaller cost than fifty cents or even a dollar each; but two cents carries them safely and surely to their destination. The entire mass of second class matter, which is mailed at one cent a pound, averages an outlay of eight cents a pound for transportation. The same care is exercised in supervising the business of small stations in the wilderness, the annual receipts of which do not rise above twenty-five dollars, as is bestowed upon the great city offices, some of which bring a revenue of six or eight millions.

It is in the methods of quick transmission and distribution that the greatest vigour and activity are displayed. The quantity of work done while the mails are actually en route is immense. In the large cities, postal cars, with boxes attached, are run on the street tramways. There is not a railroad of importance in the whole country which has not its detachment of mail-carriages, and many steamships, on the ocean and the great lakes, are likewise provided with post-offices. Eight thousand clerks are employed on express trains, and the number of pieces of mail matter assorted by them is above twelve billion a year. That this figure is much in excess of the total received and delivered is accounted for by the fact that many letters and packages are necessarily handled several times over, as they pass from road to road. In order that no time shall be wasted at any point, the labour of the central offices in populous towns has been greatly reduced. These no longer receive deposits from the various branches, but all matter except that which is purely local is sent directly to one railway station or another, where it is prepared for immediate transportation. Swiftmess of carriage has been brought to such a point that the mails outstrip the fastest passenger traffic, in many instances. Travellers from New York to San Francisco, for example, arrive four hours later than the letters and newspapers that started with them, and between intermediate points the time is proportionately shortened. This has been brought about by the establishment of trains exclusively for the service, as well as by the application of a mechanical device for taking up and discharging bags while the cars are running at full speed.

Time-saving expedients are practised as effectively on water as on land. Ocean steamers are met, as they enter their harbours, by rapid boats which take possession of the mails and land them long before the big ships arrive at their berths. For all matter to be carried inland, cars are waiting at the wharf, ready to begin their journeys at a moment's notice. The industry with which the lake service is conducted may be illustrated by what takes place each day at the mouth of the Detroit River. Steamboats pass through this channel every three and a half minutes;—a marine procession of more than four hundred vessels in twenty-four hours. Mails are carried out from Detroit to all of these, without exception, by tenders which bring back a harvest of bags in exchange; and the receipt and delivery are effected as the large craft sweep by without deviating from their course or slackening speed.

When the "star routes," of unsavoury history, were first introduced, the Government caused it to be understood that "celerity, certainty, and security" were the conditions which every contractor must bind himself to fulfil. If any one of these requirements was thought more essential than the others, it was undoubtedly the first. It had been the custom to employ only stage-coaches in districts which could not be reached by railroads or steamboats; but with the establishment of "star routes" all restrictions were removed, with the result that many unexpected and extraordinary methods of conveyance were adopted, either as regular processes or as expedients in emergencies. In the northwest, the mails are often carried on horse-back, in carts drawn by dogs, in canoes, on rafts, and by pedestrians on snow-shoes or skimmers on skates. Rivers have been crossed by swimming, and floods set at naught by recourse to small balloons guided by ropes. Cords have been flung by bow-and-arrow across chasms from which the bridges have been torn away, and the pouches thus exchanged. It was long ago discovered that ordinary mail-bags were not suited to such exigencies as these, and new receptacles have been devised, from time to time, to meet every conceivable need. The latest of these novelties is a sack contrived to carry queen bees alive from Western ports to islands in the Pacific. Who would have imagined that such a necessity as this could arise, or that it would be recognized and provided for by a great national department?

It is surprising to learn that all the progressive developments of the system have been put in operation almost within a single generation. Before the civil war, slight consideration was given to the public convenience, even at the north, while in the south, the deficiency of postal accommodation was notorious. Thirty-five years ago, free delivery by carriers was unknown, and every citizen was obliged to apply for his mails at the general post-office. Now the army of carriers numbers fourteen thousand, with an annual pay-roll of more than fourteen million dollars. All the devices of expedition above mentioned have been introduced in the last quarter of the century. It is satisfactory to know that the people have cordially responded to the efforts made on their behalf. The postal revenue, in 1880, was only about one-third of what it is now. Since that date, the population of the United States has increased one-half, but the volume of postal business has multiplied three-fold.

That the working of this marvel of elaborate and complicated machinery should ever be deliberately crippled by the Government which exhausts the last possibilities of enterprise and energy in the endeavour to perfect it, seems almost too paradoxical for belief. Yet the fact is visible to all observers. The very hands that have toiled to build up the service do not shrink from periodically degrading it. Official reputation, the credit of a department of State, the honours of past achievement, count for nothing, and may all be sacrificed to the craving for public office that seizes the community after each change of party rule at Washington. The "spoils" of the Postal Department are enormous. Four thousand places are at the disposal of the President. Seventy thousand are nominally in the gift of the Postmaster-General, but the right to apportion them is claimed by Congressmen, as a reward for the exercise of political influence in their various districts. In addition, there are the countless minor employees appointed by local postmasters. The rage for office is one of the inexplicable phenomena of American society. Those who succeed in obtaining positions are not well paid. The great majority of successful applicants could earn much more by following the avocations which they rashly abandon, besides preserving their own respect as self-supporting citizens. Nothing in American life is more demoralizing than the temptation which lures so many men from their natural career, to wait upon the caprices of political fortune. But we are now considering the injurious effect of "official rotation" upon a national service,—not its evil influence upon the character of the people. The Postmaster-General makes no concealments. He shows that during the long period when one party retained control of the government, with comparatively infrequent changes, the increase of efficiency was sure and steady; whereas when the parties began to alternate, and the re-distribution of "spoils" was renewed, deterioration at once set in, and continued for several years, until "the enforcement of a stricter discipline and more exacting requirements" led to a gradual improvement. Among other evidences of the danger of transferring difficult duties from skilled to inexperienced hands, the hazards of the lake and railway systems are noted, especially the latter. By the machinery which enables flying trains to take in mail pouches, sixty-nine clerks have been killed and thirteen hundred rendered incapable of duty, since 1889.

Thus, while abundant examples of praiseworthy enterprise and endeavour are found in the United States postal records, one adverse lesson is taught, which all who run may be expected to read,—except those that run for Republican or Democratic office,—and which may serve a salutary purpose in more than one part of the world.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

Prince Henry of Germany returned to Chemulpo from Seoul on the 19th instant—says the Kokumin Shimbum—and was to sail from the former place on the 20th instant. The Prince will make a brief visit to Kiao-chou and then come over to Japan, arriving in Tokyo about the 29th instant.

In the Official Gazette of the 20th instant we find the detailed regulations for putting into operation the new laws of patents, trade-marks, and designs. The compilation of these regulations has evidently been a work of some difficulty. We hope to lay a translation of them before our readers at an early date.

Foreign capitalists, according to the Tokyo Asahi, are beginning to seek investments in Japan. A wealthy Frenchman has made application for one half of the total shares of the Tokyo Tramway Company and the Kyoto Electric Railway Company. It sounds curious that such a cut-and-dry project should be entertained, but the Asahi seems to have no doubt about the matter.

The coal mine in Wakamatsu Prefecture, where such a terrible explosion occurred on the 14th instant, is of considerable magnitude. At the time of the accident the number of workmen employed was 800, and the daily output was about a million catties. It is estimated that the loss resulting from the catastrophe will be at least a hundred thousand yen. The principal owner, Mr. Hiraoka, is now travelling in Europe.

Extensive changes are gazetted in the personnel of the Japanese Navy. It is not necessary to enter into details. The purpose of the measure is to carry out an idea said to have been entertained by the present Minister of the Navy ever since he served as head of a bureau in that Department, the idea that neither shore service nor sea service should be too continuous, but that men should be drafted from the one to the other at intervals of moderate length.

The Official Gazette of the 19th instant contains an Instruction issued by the Department of Home Affairs for the guidance of local officials in dealing with foreigners who may be overtaken by sickness or sudden death while travelling in Japan. No interest attaches to the details of the Instruction, its principal object being to prescribe a routine so that there may be neither confusion nor hesitation in the treatment of such cases.

Mr. Kato, who recently returned from London, where he had represented Japan for several years with exceptional ability, has inaugurated a new custom. He has presented to the Emperor, the Empress, and the Prince Imperial certain articles procured in England. To the Emperor he presented two bronze figures, one of a guardsman, the other of a royal marine; to the Empress, a parasol and a fan; and to the Prince Imperial an electric clock and a folding chair.

We invite our readers' attention to two important Ordinances promulgated on the 15th instant and published in an Extra of the Official Gazette. It will be seen that foreign companies are allowed a period of six months within which to comply with the provisions of Japanese law as to registration. That is a liberal arrangement. It disposes of all the difficulties that have been suggested of late by vernacular newspapers in connexion with this subject.

An Imperial Ordinance has been issued extending to Formosa the operation of the Law of Nationality (No. 66 of 1899); the Law (with the exception of Art. XI.) for assisting to apprehend and detain Deserters from Foreign Men-of-war (No. 68 of 1899); the Law relating to Persons who have lost their Nationality (No. 94 of 1899); and the Laws of Patents, Trade Marks, and Designs. Another Ordinance rescinds Notification No. 30 (issued in 1876 under the authority of Imperial Ordinance No. 293) containing rules relating to the crews of foreign ships.

The ladies of Tokyo played a Lawn Tennis tournament of singles at the Belgian Legation on the 15th, 16th, and 17th instant, for a handsome prize given by Baron d'Aethlian. The game was 25 up, and the contest was on the American system, each lady playing against every one of the contestants in succession. The handicapping was in some cases very severe, but the results justified it, nearly all the games being well fought, and several leading to most exciting struggles. Miss F. V. Dening came out victorious, and Mrs. Churchill was second. Miss Dening played magnificently: she did not suffer even one defeat.

Definite arrangements are now understood to have been made for the special treatment of foreigners in Japanese jails. It is not the intention, of course, to make things pleasanter for them than for the Japanese. What the Government aims at is to consult the foreigner's habits sufficiently to prevent his punishment from proving disproportionately severe. Foreign food and costume, as well as chairs and beds, will be provided; the cells will be built in foreign style, not enclosed with paper doors only, and the kind of labour allotted to him will be such as he can do without undue hardship. We have often expressed our conviction that the Government would adopt this line of procedure, but we presume that the erstwhile agitators will now assign the result to their own exertions.

The project of establishing two new Universities finds a vehement opponent in the Fiji Shimpō. Of course that journal does not object to the general expansion of educational opportunities. But it alleges, in the first place, that to increase the number of Universities is to begin at the wrong end; and, in the second, that this project is the outcome, not of any genuine appreciation of educational needs, but of political agitation. Both the Liberals and the Progressists, in order to curry favour with their constituents in the north and east, promised them a university, and each party has brought pressure to bear on the Educational Department, which, being organically weak and without a policy of its own, has yielded. Appearances certainly furnish some justification of the Fiji Shimpō's criticism, but the fact that the Miyagi Prefectural Assembly has put up a sum of 350,000 yen towards the cost of the Sendai University is a substantial proof of the bona fides of the affair.

Mr. Hoshi Toru has taken up the question of expanding the educational system, and, when Mr. Hoshi Toru speaks with the Liberal Party at his back, his voice is audible. Besides, in this case his influence has been thrown into the same scale with the inclinations of the Minister of Education. There will therefore be a "north-eastern university" (To-koku daigaku) in Sendai. Eight years are to be devoted to establishing the university, and the total outlay will be 2,600,000 yen, the appropriation for next year being the sum of 350,000 yen voted by the Miyagi Prefectural Assembly. There is also talk of establishing a school of agriculture and forestry in Iwate Prefecture.

It is alleged that the Korean Government, becoming sensible of the value of the Sōul-Chemulpo Railway as it approaches completion, has addressed three requests to the Japanese Authorities. The first is that a certain number of the shares should be sold to the Korean Imperial Household; the second, that the railway people should consent to run a special car for the use of the Korean Sovereign, the car being built at his Majesty's expense; and the third, that at the ceremony of opening the line, the Korean flag should be displayed as well as the Japanese. The third of these requests is agreeably naïve, and so is the suggestion they evoke from a Japanese journal, namely, that it would be advisable to make a present of a number of shares and also of an imperial state car to the Emperor of Korea.

Mr. Otani Kahei is determined not to rest from his endeavours to bring about the remission of the American tax on tea. Addressing a meeting of the Seicha Boyeki Kumiai on the 18th instant, he pointed out that, whereas the price of 100 catties of tea in Japan is 25 yen, the import duty levied in America on that quantity—at 10 cents (gold) per lb.—amounts to 26.66 yen, or 1.66 yen more than the original cost. Such an impost could not fail to affect consumption by driving people to the cheaper beverage, coffee. The import of tea into the United States is 100 million lbs. annually, of which Japan supplies one-fourth. Mr. Otani's speech, and the evident importance of the subject, have induced the tea-men to resolve that a commission, headed by Mr. Otani, shall be sent to the States, to agitate for a reduction of this duty.

THE SITUATION IN THE PHILIPPINES.

OFFICIALS AT LOGGERHEADS.

(FROM THE "CHINA MAIL.")

A gentleman who has just returned from Manila relates a very disappointing state of affairs in high official circles.

General Otis, the Governor-General, and the U.S. Peace Commissioners are at loggerheads.—Twas ever thus. Even in the Christianising of the heathen the different agencies are frequently found not to be in absolute accord. General Otis has reported that the conciliatory policy adopted towards the natives by the Peace Commissioners has entirely undone all the work of the past four months, and made the Filipinos more hopeful of fooling the United States.

And General Otis continues to blunder on in his campaign against the Filipinos. With the disastrous effects of the removal of the American troops from Pasig, Paternon, and Tagnig still fresh in his mind, the Governor-General has ordered another backward movement in the withdrawal of the troops from the district of San Isidro. It is stated that General Lawton is furious at being recalled. He had advanced as far as San Isidro, where he had established a strong position, and by this time he would have cleared the country of rebels as far as Dagupan had he been allowed to proceed. The friendly Filipinos are losing faith in the Americans, as when the districts evacuated by the U.S. troops are re-occupied by the rebels large numbers of the Filipinos who welcomed the Americans get their throats cut.

The Americans on abandoning San Isidro and other towns posted proclamations offering $30 each for Mauser rifles brought to them. In reply the rebels surreptitiously posted proclamations inside the American line offering $60 for every Krag Jorgensen rifle.

Aguinaldo sentenced Colonel Arguelles, the last peace envoy, to be executed, but subsequently commuted the sentence to twelve years' penal servitude.

The movement for which the Governor-General has mobilised the troops is the last of the season. The plan is to clear the Laguna again, and then sweep down and across to Cavite, wiping out all the rebels who have been left alone so long near Parangue. Operations will then cease till next dry season, November or so.

Our informant says that General Miles has left the United States for Manila to supersede General Otis as Governor-General of the Philippines.

FRENCH AFFAIRS.

WHEN news reached us that the Court of Cassation had ordered the retrial of DREYFUS by a new court-martial, there seemed to be good grounds for hope that this unhappy affair, which had caused so much perturbation in France, was at length on the eve of satisfactory settlement. But the latest telegraphic intelligence goes to show that the nation has not yet recovered its sang froid, and that there is still a strong prejudice against the wretched convict of Devil's Island. It is not immediately easy to understand the mood of the French people. That their first desire is to see justice done must be taken for granted. But the highest judicial tribunal in the land has decided that justice was not done by the court-martial which tried DREYFUS originally. Why, then, should there be any objection to a fresh trial, or any apprehension that its result will renew the public ferment? Two conclusions are forced upon us: the first is that the decisions of the Court of Cassation do not command the absolute confidence which should attach to such a tribunal; the second, that people can not persuade themselves to think as lightly of court-martial justice as the Dreyfusites would have them think. One can understand both of these sentiments. Since the DREYFUS affair came upon the tapis, there has been a disposition on the part of irresponsible critics to belittle courts-martial and to conclude that their manner of administering the law is disfigured by all the rough and summary directness supposed to be characteristic of military minds in general. It is surprising that such a view should be entertained by people who reverence the jury system; surprising that folks who are willing to see the rights and wrongs of an intricate question decided by a body of twelve untrained and probably half-educated men, chosen at random, should deny at least corresponding competence to a court composed of educated officers and gentlemen. Of course we understand that the chief objection is based not on the personnel of the tribunal, but on the fact that its procedure is not directed by experts qualified to prevent the admission of illegal evidence. We greatly doubt, however, whether the admission of illegal evidence constitutes a genuine blot upon the administration of courts-martial, or whether it gives rise to any abuses comparable with those resulting from the licence enjoyed by the Bar. At all events the French people have long regarded courts-martial with respect and esteem. A recent writer said of them:—"One must have attended sittings of a court-martial before which a simple soldier is brought for a proved and confessed crime in order to have an idea of the extreme care with which the proceedings are conducted. Everything that may strengthen the defence is heard with benevolent attention, and, when sentence is passed, it is difficult not to be moved by the way in which it is done." The fact is that to the members of a court-martial the prisoner they have to try is much closer than an accused person is to the occupants of the Bench in an ordinary criminal court. He wears their own cloth and is a member of their own service. Of course that fact may be productive of prejudice in some cases, but, as a rule, it makes for leniency and exhaustively careful investigation. Can we wonder, then, that a large section of the nation clings to its faith in the court-martial, and that a still larger objects to see a slight put upon the Army, the cynosure of so many hopes? As for the Court of Cassation, there is no doubt that the accusations of M. QUESNEY DE BEAUREPAIRE gave a great shock to the confidence reposed in its infallibility by the general public, and that this bewilderment was aggravated when the Committee of Inquiry ordered by the Minister of Justice endorsed M. DE BEAUREPAIRE'S charges to the extent of recommending that the question of revision be entrusted to the whole Court of Cassation, all three chambers united. Thus the anti-Dreyfusites are certainly not without reason. To outsiders like ourselves the reluctance now shown to let things take their course peacefully may seem somewhat incomprehensible, but in truth history contains nothing that can compare with this DREYFUS case. It is all very well for Anglo-Saxons and Germans to speak critically of French passion and excitability, but have not the journals of London and Berlin filled long columns unremittingly for the past two years with minute details and intricate dissertations about the DREYFUS affair, which would have become insufferably tiresome after a week had not the extraordinarily vivid interest of the story riveted the attention of the whole civilized world? That France is still shaken by the throes of such a convulsion need not surprise us at all. But the fact that the President experiences so much difficulty in finding a Cabinet to face the situation is very disquieting, for it appears to indicate that no exit from this long complication is furnished by the normal machinery of justice, and that we may at any moment see violence employed to provide a solution.

THE NEW PHYSICAL LAW.

ONE of the difficulties involved in accepting the old theory of world formation is that we must suppose the process to have ceased. If, as philosophers assert, the first condition of planets now solidified, or partially solidified, was a white-hot, flaming body, why is it that no such bodies are seen any longer in the universe? Why should the creative forces have rested from their labours? It is surely much more reasonable to suppose that these forces are continuously at work, but that their initial operations are hidden from our vision. For instance, if the original condition of our solar system, and of all other stellar systems, was "a formless swarm of icy masses" floating in space; a collection of cold, dark, icy nebulae invisible to the eye but possessing the elements of development, then there would be no difficulty in supposing that the creative forces are still steadily performing their functions uninterruptedly and everlastingly. But to accept such a hypothesis is to throw our old ideas overboard. We must assume that things had their beginning in an icy condition, not in an incandescent state. That is exactly what the author of the latest great discovery undertakes to demonstrate. Professor SEE, of the United States Naval Observatory, has enunciated a new law, namely, that the temperature of a gaseous star varies inversely as its radius. It is well known that a gas when compressed gives out heat. Hence if, owing to the operation of any known cause, a gaseous body were to grow smaller, it would become warmer in the process. The attraction of gravitation is such a cause. Under its influence a gaseous star compresses itself and produces heat. Experiments have shown that the present heat of the sun is about 8,000 degrees C. above the absolute cold of interstellar space. Assuming the truth of See's new law, it would follow that were the sun's radius twice what it is to-day, the temperature would be only 4,000 degrees. If it had eight times its present radius, its temperature would be only 1,000 degrees. Professor SEE suggests that its mass was originally immense enough to cover the entire space now occupied by the solar system. If so, its temperature would then have been 1 degree above the absolute zero; namely, 272 degrees below the zero of the centigrade scale. Such cold would liquify air then, and then freeze it solid. We should have instead of the present solar system, a dim, cold nebula, of which many similar may now occupy portions of space. What happened then is thus described by Professor SEE:—"Although vast and attenuated this nebula has set up a slow motion, which is the beginning of development. It revolves on its axis. It is also condensing gradually by the attraction of gravitation. As it grows smaller and a trifle more compact it revolves a little faster. In the course of a few million years, when its circumference has reached what is now about the orbit of Neptune, a part of the outer edge, unable to keep up with the movement of the mass, is detached, not unlike the mud from a revolving buggy-wheel. That is Neptune. Later Uranus is left behind, and then Saturn and Jupiter. And as the central mass gradually shrinks inward, the temperature, according to the new law, necessarily increases. Mars is formed at 249 degrees below zero Centigrade, the earth at 233 degrees, and finally Mercury at 181 degrees—all far below zero.

"As each of these worlds takes up a separate existence, it too begins shrinking and generating heat. The nebula of our earth was probably about as large as the present orbit of our moon, and, after having begun independent rotation, it, in turn, cast off a world. That world is our moon. The earth nebula was comparatively small, and shrunk rapidly. From what we know of the length of its nebular radius, it is difficult to see how its temperature ever could have exceeded about 1,000 degrees Centigrade. In other words, I don't believe there ever was heat enough here to vaporize iron, although the temperature was sufficient to fuse lava such as now issues from our volcanoes. It used to be held by men of science that the interior of the earth was a fiery globe filled with molten liquid substances, and that the volcanoes were vents analogous to chimneys. It is probable, however, that the heat does not increase after a certain depth has been reached. Beyond that, it remains uniform throughout the entire interior of the globe. If the earth ever had been as hot as many of the planets are to-day, all of our atmosphere would have been driven off into space and this would now be an airless world. The earth still continues its shrinking: slowly now, but as certainly as ever. The earthquakes are the remnants of its shrinking throes.

"The great planets, Neptune, Uranus, Saturn, and Jupiter, after being detached from the mother nebula, also went through the regular shrinking process. And as they shrunk, their temperatures rose higher, until finally the solid matter melted, and they became gaseous, as they are to-day. The shrinking is still going on, and instead of growing colder, as astronomers have long taught, these planets are growing steadily hotter, and in the end they may shine of their own light, and not merely reflect the illumination they receive from the sun. Already there are faint signs of luminosity in Uranus, and perhaps also in Jupiter.

"The sun is still a gaseous body, and it therefore conforms to the new law. We know that it is shrinking from year to year, and it is, therefore, growing gradually hotter. At present the radiance is yellow. As the years go by and the heat increases, we may expect the light to grow gradually whiter and whiter, until it approaches the glare of an arc lamp, and after that it will gradually become blue, the next step marked in the spectrum. It will then have reached the condition of the blue stars of our heavens, Sirius and Vega, and it will have shrunk to a density nearly approaching that of an incompressible liquid.

"There is a vast chance for speculation as to what effect these changes in the colour of the sun's light will have on our earth. We know that we shall receive less heat, owing to the smaller radiating surface of the sun; but just what effect a glare which is blue instead of yellow will have on the earth, its foliage, and inhabitants, if plants and animals exist at that time, we can scarcely imagine."

"After the sun has become a blue star, like Sirius, blue being the mark of old age among stellar bodies, it will radiate an intensely blue light for perhaps a million years, and then suddenly begin falling in temperature. In the sudden cooling it may for a time appear reddish. Then it will become a liquid, and finally a dark solid. Sirius and other blue stars must reach this dark stage comparatively soon. Indeed, we have an example of a dying star, one in which the light is going out, in the companion of Sirius, which although half as large as Sirius, gives only a ten-thousandth part as much light.

"I presume that the heavens are full of these vast inert bodies of dead stars. They represent the other extremes from the icy cold nebula out of which stars spring into existence. Owing to the presence of these dead stars and the nebulae in space I think it impossible for us to form any idea of the universe.

"All of our planets are doomed to death and cold, the present condition of our moon. The end will come long before the sun has cooled off. The law of gravitation continues its slow work of destruction. The moon, which, according to Darwin's theory of the tides, has been gradually forced away from the earth, will, when there are no longer any tides upon the earth's surface, be slowly drawn back again, and one day it will fall upon the earth with fearful force, no doubt causing a conflagration more awful than we can imagine. In the same way the moons of Jupiter will fall. Then the planets one after another will be drawn into the sun, producing for the time being a terrible blast of heat, although if all of the planets in our system were to be dropped upon the sun in a single day, their masses are so insignificant compared with the immensity of the mass of the sun, that they would serve to keep up the heat only a few hundred thousand years.

"After the last of the planets has fallen, the sun, having reached the limit of compression, will cool down and become gradually dimmer and dimmer, until the residents of other stars, if there be such, will gradually lose sight of it, and it will become a dark wanderer in space. Then, perhaps, at the end of hundreds of millions of years, it too will fall into the central mass around which it revolves as we now revolve around it.

"But we can not say that this is really the end, for no man knows, and man's mind is not big enough even to imagine how many systems, one within the other, make up God's creation."

THE BOOKSHELF.

Supplement to the Digest on the condition of Foreigners under the new Treaties; Yokohama, General Foreign Chamber of Commerce.

AMONG the many useful works undertaken by the International Committee one was the commissioning of Dr. Lönholm to prepare a digest of such Japanese laws as are of practical interest to foreigners in connexion with the operation of the Revised Treaties. The result of the commission was a volume which, if it be not already in the hands of every foreign resident, ought to be procured with as little delay as possible. A supplement has now been published by the same author for the International Committee. It contains a clear and concise exposition of the laws and regulations promulgated since the original volume was compiled. There is no possibility within the limits of a newspaper article of giving anything like a comprehensive idea of the contents of this book, for although it consists of 41 pages only, every page abounds with important facts and inferences. At the outset we find an exposition of a question which recently inspired some uneasiness, namely, the practice under Japanese commercial law with regard to pledges. It is not the custom with foreign banks to require the actual delivery of the goods pledged. A bill of lading is considered sufficient, and so is the possession—often nominal possession only—of the keys of the warehouse where the goods are stored. An impression obtained credence at first that these convenient methods would not be possible under Japanese law, and that the course of business might be correspondingly hampered. That apprehension will be dispelled by Dr. Lönholm's interpretation of the law. He points out that the endorsement and delivery of a bill of lading have the same effect as the delivery of the goods themselves—that, indeed, is explicitly stated in the Code—and, also that, since "delivery means any act by which the goods are actually brought under the exclusive power of the pledgee in a manner visible to third persons," a "delivery may be made by handing over to the pledgee the key of the godown where the goods are."

Our readers may remember a journalistic discussion which took place some months ago with reference to the significance of the word métier used in the French Revised Treaty. We maintained that métier could not properly be interpreted as including the profession of journalism, and for that expression of opinion we were roundly abused by a Kobe journal, our contemporary even going so far as to repeatedly accuse us of deliberately seeking to deceive the public because we quoted, in support of our view, Littré's definition of the ordinary meaning of the word, and did not choose, by preference, the extended meaning which, according to the great lexicographer, is sometimes assigned to it. The subject is sufficiently interesting to justify quotation of Dr. Lönholm's remarks, which bear out our contention from point to point:—

3.—"Professions.—The word 'professions' in English is properly applied to those occupations which require an education in some branch of science or at least what is called 'a liberal education.' In this sense 'professions' are not specially mentioned in the Treaties. The French word 'la profession' has a quite different meaning, including any kind of occupation. 'Les professions' whose exercise is granted to Frenchmen are enumerated in Art. 4 of the French Treaty, namely: 'Le commerce, l'industrie, et le métier,' and the phrases 'ils pourront se livrer à leurs professions' in Art. 1 and 'à l'effet d'y exercer leurs professions' in Art. 4 plainly refer to the callings as enumerated in the latter article. Nor does the word métier comprehend the liberal professions. Métier is defined by the Dictionnaire de l'Académie Française, vol. 1. p. 202 to be 'la profession d'un art mécanique, p. e. le métier de cordonnier, de tailleur, de serrurier, de menuisier,' and it is added 'métier se dit par extension de plusieurs professions non-mécaniques, p. e. le métier des armes, etc.' This shows plainly that 'métier' in its ordinary sense, especially if used in connection with 'industrie et commerce,' means only mechanical occupations. No State will bind itself by treaty to allow foreign professional men to pursue their callings in its territory."

The parts of this volume relating to taxes will be scrutinized by foreigners with special attention. With regard to income tax, the rates have undergone revision since Dr. Lönholm's first book was published. They vary now from 1 to 5½ per cent., whereas the maximum under the former schedule was 3 per cent. A person enjoying an income of ten thousand yen annually will have to pay a tax of 300 yen. If his income be five thousand yen, the tax is 125 yen. The smallest income taxed is 300 yen, and the tax in that case is 1 per cent. Income for any one year is reckoned as the average of the preceding three years. He is required to furnish a return of it in April, and the tax is thereafter levied in two equal instalments, the first in September, the second in March. It appears, therefore, that since the foreign residents can not furnish any returns before April, 1900, their first payment of income tax will be in September of that year, or about 14 months after the Treaties go into operation. The Business Tax is of scarcely less importance to foreigners. In the case of sellers of merchandise, the tax is one half of one mil. of wholesale transactions, and 1½ of one per mil. of retail transactions, and there is also a tax of 4 per cent. of the rental value of the buildings used in the trade, as well as one yen per head on the employees. In other business the tax is usually on the capital, and also on the rental value of the premises. We do not attempt a detailed statement, but it will be well to point out that as the returns for the purposes of this tax have to be furnished in January, foreigners will not become liable for any payment before the year 1900.

Turning to the chapter on superficies, Dr. Lönholm expresses some important opinions. In the first place, he emphatically denies the assertion made by some critics that a superficies is not assignable, and he gives convincing reasons for that view. In the second place, he discusses the question whether the decision of a law court as to the duration of a superficies dates from the time of rendering the decision or from the time when the superficies began to run. Our readers are doubtless familiar with the fact that when the duration of a superficies has not been fixed by agreement, a court of law may, on the application of either party, assign a limit of not less than 20 years and not more than 50. Does that limit count from the time when the application was made, or does it count from the original date of the superficies? Obviously, if the latter view be taken, a superficies the duration of which was not fixed by the parties may be brought to an end at once by the ruling of a law court, for if the superficies has already run for, say, 40 years, and the court decides that it should exist for 40 years only, then it must terminate forthwith. That, nevertheless, is Dr. Lönholm's interpretation of the Code. He avers that no other rendering is possible, and that the framers of the Code take the same view. We are thus driven to the inference that, whenever the parties to a superficies fail to fix a period, the superficies ceases to have any binding force after 50 years, for on the application of either party it may be terminated there and then. In fact, if an indefinite superficies, after lasting for 70 years, is brought before a law court, the latter would have to rule that the superficies ceased to be valid 20 years previously. Dr. Lönholm concludes his chapter on superficies with these words:—"I should strongly advise foreigners not to make agreements as to a right of superficies for a rent, but only for a lump sum, and to have the duration of it specified in the agreement. If carefully made, such an agreement may procure the superfluous practically nearly all the essential rights of an owner."

Dr. Lönholm states that the mise en secret has been abolished, but we fail to see how that proposition can be established in the face of the fact that the judge is still competent to segregate a prisoner's cell, to cut him off from all intercourse with others, and to forbid him to despatch or receive letters or articles from outside. If that is not our old friend the mise en secret in a new guise, our powers of identification must be very feeble.

It will be understood, of course, that what we have written above refers to only a small part of the interesting treatise now before us. Many other subjects of the highest importance are discussed. Indeed, if the International Committee had accomplished nothing beyond procuring the compilation and publication of these two volumes, it would have amply justified its existence. Dr. Lönholm has laid the community under a great obligation, for it is owing to the aid of his lucid explanations that the foreign residents are enabled to approach the new order of things with a full knowledge of conditions actually awaiting them.

IMPORTANT ORDINANCES FOR FOREIGNERS.

(TRANSLATED BY DR. L. LÖNHOLM.)

I.

IMPERIAL ORDINANCE, No. 273 OF JUNE 15TH, 1899 RELATING TO BRANCH OFFICES OF FOREIGN COMMERCIAL COMPANIES, AND TO COMMERCIAL COMPANIES, AND ASSOCIATIONS ESTABLISHED BY FOREIGNERS.

Art. 1.—A foreign commercial company* which has set up a branch office in Japan before the taking effect of the Commercial Code must, within six months from its taking effect, register such fact according to the provisions of Art. 255 of the Commercial Code and appoint a representative in Japan and register his name and domicile.

The provisions of Art. 257 of the Commercial Code and of Art. 202 of the Law Concerning Non-Contentious Matters apply correspondingly to such foreign companies.

Art. 2.—A commercial company formed by foreigners in Japan before the taking effect of the Commercial Code must, within six months from its taking effect, make a company contract in accordance with the provisions of the Commercial Code and register the formation of the company.

Art. 3.—If a commercial company act in contravention of the provisions of Art. 2, the court may on the application of the public prosecutor or of its own motion order the dissolution of the company.

The order of dissolution must be published in the same manner as registered facts are published.

In the afore-mentioned case the provisions of Arts. 126, 1, 134, 1 and 2 and 135 of the Law Concerning Non-Contentious Matters apply correspondingly.

Art. 4.—As to commercial companies formed by foreigners in Japan before the taking effect of the Commercial Code, the legal relations which will arise before the registration is made according to the provisions of Art. 2, or before an order of dissolution has become finally binding, are governed by the law of the country to which the company belonged before.

Art. 5.—An association formed by foreigners in Japan before the taking effect of the Commercial Code, which has property of its own, must within six months from the taking effect of the Commercial Code change its organization into that of some kind of commercial company recognized by the Commercial Code. The provisions of the preceding two articles apply correspondingly to such an association.

ADDITIONAL PROVISIONS.

This Ordinance takes effect from the day when the Commercial Code takes effect.

II.

IMPERIAL ORDINANCE, No. 273, OF JUNE 15TH, 1899, CONCERNING FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES.

Art. 1.—If a foreign commercial company establishes an agency in Japan to carry on the business of insurance, it must appoint a representative in Japan. The provisions of Art. 62 of the Commercial Code apply correspondingly to such representative.

Art. 2.—The foreign company must notify the Government of the name and domicile of its representative in Japan.

Art. 3.—The provisions of Arts. 95 and 97-101 of the Law Concerning the Operation of the Commercial Code apply correspondingly to foreign insurance companies.

Art. 4.—If it appears to the Government that the continuance of the business of a foreign insurance company is endangered, or if the foreign company acts in contravention of an order of the Government, the Government may order that the prosecution of the business be suspended or the representative be removed.

Art. 5.—Whenever a foreign insurance company makes an inventory and a balance sheet, it must without delay submit it to the Government, together with a business report, an account of profits and losses, and its proposals as to the distribution of the profits.

Art. 6.—A foreign insurance company which has set up a branch office or an agency in Japan before the taking effect of the Commercial Code must, within six months from its taking effect, obtain the permission of the Government.

The provisions of Art. 95, 2 of the Law Concerning the Operation of the Commercial Code apply correspondingly to such foreign companies.

The provisions of Arts. 126, 1, 134, 1 and 2 and 135 of the Law Concerning Non-Contentious Matters apply correspondingly when a foreign insurance company is forbidden to carry on its business.

Art. 7.—The provisions of Arts. 1, 2, and 5 of this law and of Articles 98 to 101 of the Law Concerning the Operation of the Commercial Code apply correspondingly to foreign insurance companies which have established a branch office or an agency in Japan before the taking effect of the Commercial Code.

ADDITIONAL PROVISIONS.

This ordinance takes effect from the day when the Commercial Code takes effect.

CONTRASTS.

On May 1st, a question having been addressed to the British Government in the House of Lords, the Marquis of Salisbury replied as follows:—

I am a little in difficulty, because I am not quite sure whether I am acting in accordance with the wishes of the Russian Government in entering into the matter; that I have not been able to ascertain. But I imagine that as soon as the text arrives, which will be in a few days, I shall be able to lay it upon the table. As to the general drift of the agreement, the noble lord probably knows that it is a railway agreement concerning our fields of operation in China; and that, while England agrees neither to undertake nor to encourage any railway, by English persons or others, north of the Great Wall, Russia, on the other hand, has made exactly similar stipulations with respect to the basin of the Yangtze. There are certain provisions in the agreement with respect to the railway to be made to Newchwang, about which there has been so much controversy, and our interests in that respect, are I think, entirely protected. I may say that I am very anxious not to appear to attach to the particular stipulations of this agreement an exaggerated importance. But I attach very great importance to the agreement itself, as a sign of good feeling between the Governments of Great Britain and Russia.—(Hear, hear.) That is very much to be desired; and what is still more to be desired is that good feeling should grow up between the Russian and English peoples. But this particular agreement will be of value in preventing the possibility of collision between the two Governments in that distant part of the world; and therefore it is a gage for their future agreement for a long time, and will I trust, lead to agreement in other matters.—(Cheers.)

On May 9th, the St. Petersburg correspondent of The Times sent the following communication to that journal:—

The Novoe Vremya continues to minimize the importance of the Anglo-Russian agreement, while the Novosti is the only journal that really accepts it unconditionally as a welcome earnest of that friendly understanding on all points between the two countries which it professes most ardently to desire. It therefore denounces the German Press for its display of ill-feeling at the prospect of better relations between England and Russia, while the Novoe Vremya declares that these political circles in which so much anxiety has been exhibited at the reports of a rapprochement between these two nations may now rest assured that nothing of the kind has taken place. The agreement is nothing more than a "private" transaction of a "technical" character, and, beyond certain definite points in the matter of railways, everything remains as it was before. It rejoices at the news that Russia has left herself full freedom of action, and declares that she does not require any "general" agreement with England either in Asia or anywhere.

There is certainly a very marked contrast between the utterances of Lord Salisbury and the writings of the Novoe Vremya. Of course, as a general rule, one does not think of comparing the parliamentary speech of a responsible Prime Minister with the comments of a newspaper. But newspapers in Russia are not as newspapers elsewhere. The Russian press is under official control, and its utterances are usually regarded as having at least the tacit approval of the Government. Probably that conception is somewhat exaggerated, for unless the articles appearing in a journal pass under the eyes of an official censor before publication, they can not justly be regarded as bearing the cachet of the Government. Post-facto scrutiny proceeds on a canon of criticism very different from that governing examination before insertion. People at large, however, do not recognise that nice distinction. They will interpret the Novoe Vremya's utterances as an expression of the Russian Government's views, and will certainly not attach the same importance in the opposite direction to the friendly and sensible language of the Novosti.

RAILWAYS IN CHINA.

An American contemporary, summarizing the latest publication of the Treasury Bureau of Statistics, obtains the following concise account of the railway programme of China:—

At present the only railroad system in China consists of the 350 miles of road which connects Tientsin, the port of Peking, with the capital, and extends southwesterly to Pao-tung, the capital of the province of that name, whence it is the intention to build lines into the coal and iron regions of the interior, which are within easy reach. This, however, is only one important link in the projected network of Chinese railroads.

The other important concessions for Chinese railroads include a line under British and German auspices from Tientsin to Shanghai, 700 miles in length, which, passing through the German sphere of influence in middle China, will connect with roads from Germany's port at Kiaochow running eastwardly into the coal and iron regions of the province of Santung. A Belgian concession has been granted for a road 650 miles long from Peking to Hankow, the great interior port at the head of deep-water navigation on the Yangtze river. Another British concession is for a line extending southward from Shanghai to Ningpo and Hangchow, and finally to the British territory recently acquired on the mainland opposite Hongkong, where it will connect with a short British line, now under construction, leading to Canton, the southern commercial centre of China. British capital is also engaged in the construction of a short line westward from Shanghai to Soochow and Nanking. The direct American interest in Chinese railroad concessions centres in a concession granted last year to New York capitalists for the construction of 600 miles of road, connecting Canton with Hankow, for which active surveys are now being prosecuted. In the south of China the French propose several lines which will bring their possessions into connection with the provinces of Yunnan, and ultimately with Canton. Another road under British auspices is to lead from Canton and Hongkong to Chingto, the capital of the province of Szechuen, probably the most populous and productive portion of China, and opens up an important region upon the upper section of the West river of China, which has been recently thrown open to European commerce.

Altogether the Chinese lines provided for by these concessions involve the addition of some 3,000 miles of railroads to the world's existing mileage. It is noted in the publication from which these details are taken that the concessions, although committing the construction of the new lines to foreign skill and management, provide in most cases that the capital with which they are built shall be secured by mortgage, but that the lines themselves, after the liens are paid, are to become the property of the Chinese Government. With the extension of the European spheres of influence and the growing financial necessities of the Chinese Government, it may, however, be doubted if these provisions can be regarded as permanent. Whatever the result may be in this connection, the prospective railroad development of China constitutes an important element in the present outlook for the iron and steel industries of the rest of the world, and may well be taken into account in connection with the immediate future of that department of activity in the United States.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TAXATION OF FOREIGNERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—In an editorial article published on the 16th inst., you say "it is probable that the foreign residents will not be held liable to pay any taxes until October 1st."

I do not know whether you mean to include all kinds of taxes in this statement, but it is certain that the payment of two per cent. on the interest receivable from Japanese securities was exacted, on the first of this month, from foreign bond and share holders. There seems to be no good reason, indeed, why aliens should be exempted from this or any other impost that is levied upon natives of the country, although the figure is a little steep, and the method of collection peculiar. I learn that the Government has notified all the banks that they must not credit depositors of coupons with the full amount of these tickets, but deduct the required two per cent. and hand it over to the financial authorities. Even over the city bonds of the Tokyo Fu, the central Government asserts and exercises this control, as well as over its own issues.

It would be a great convenience if foreigners could be informed, definitely and decisively, exactly what taxes they are subject to and how and when such taxes are to be gathered. There will undoubtedly be a great deal of criticism over the irregular and contradictory rates imposed by various legislative enactments. The intention to graduate assessments, so that the chief burden shall fall upon the wealthy, is defeated, so far as incomes derived from public securities are concerned. A capitalist may have an immense revenue from bonds, yet his income rate will be only two per cent.; whereas it will be five per cent. if his property consist of real estate. On the other hand, a very small income, which would otherwise escape lightly, must, if drawn from bonds, surrender the same percentage. The advantage is obviously on the side of the rich and against those in moderate or humble circumstances.

Irregularities of this sort are, however, less likely to affect aliens than Japanese subjects. In any case, whatever the law may be, we are all bound by it, and since every one must admit, it is best to do so as gracefully as possible. I beg to repeat that it would be a great benefit to foreigners if some newspaper,—The Mail, by preference,—would publish an authoritative statement as to what we have to expect. The taxes on bond incomes have already begun, but nobody appears to know precisely what lies in the future. It cannot be supposed that the Government desires to withhold information on this subject, and the sooner and more fully it is given, the better it will be for all parties.

Respectfully yours,

H.

[The taxes on bonds are not connected with the Treaties, nor does the foreigner's liability to them depend on his passing under Japanese jurisdiction, as our correspondent of course knows. It will be always possible to avoid the tax on bonds by arranging to have the interest paid in a foreign country instead of in Japan.—Ed. J.M.]

FOREIGN SPEAKERS OF JAPANESE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—Kindly allow a word in regard to the recent editorial in the Mail concerning the ability of foreigners or missionaries to acquire the Japanese language so as to make public addresses in Japanese acceptably or to edification.

Possibly it may pacify some of your disturbed correspondents.

The writer was speaking of that editorial to friends who use the Japanese language certainly with force and effectiveness. The opinion of the editor of the Mail was quoted. "Oh," said one of the gentlemen, "I was speaking to Mr. ——— a few days ago," naming the prominent editor of one of the largest Japanese daily newspapers in Tokyo, "about the possibility of securing the editor of the Mail to address (in Japanese) a certain Young Men's Club. Mr. ——— thought the editor of the Mail could hardly find time for it, but remarked, "He speaks Japanese better than we Japanese do."

Possibly the editor of the Mail in that article was giving the Japanese an example of Anglo-Saxon humility, or perhaps his ideals are exceptionally high.

Yours, &c.,

P.

[The editor of the Japan Mail has resided in Japan for 32 years and has devoted some study to the Japanese language, but he is quite incompetent to address a Japanese audience in the Japanese language, and would never think of making the attempt except as a matter of necessity. But of course in the article referred to the editor did have a high ideal in view. He was discussing the question of a foreigner's preaching with eloquence such as to win converts and arouse the enthusiasm of a Japanese audience.—Ed. J.M.]

MR. DIOSY AND RUDE LITTLE BOYS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—Allow me to correct an error in the otherwise accurate report published in your issue of 13th instant, of my recent speech at Yokohama.

You report me as having said:—"When the little boys of Tokyo run after my jinrikisha and call out Jin baba! Jin neko baba! I take off my hat to them and salute their teachers."

I did not use the words Jin neko baba—an opprobrious epithet I have never heard—but only Jin baba, and the concluding words of my sentence were not as given by you, but as follows:—"I take off my hat to them and bow, and I salute them with Go-tagai sama!—the best answer one can give them."

Go-tagai sama was used by me in its sense of, "It is the honourable mutually"—a well-known polite expression, having nothing at all to do with "teachers." The occasions on which I have used it, with great effect, gave it the force of a courteous, but crushing, "You're another!"

I am glad you reported this passage of my speech, as it may serve to call the attention of thoughtful Japanese to the necessity for teaching children that the foreigner in their midst is not, necessarily, a fool and should be treated with the same politeness they are trained to show to elders of their own nation.

We are not free, in the West, from the howling street-urchin, but in the Land of Good Manners the nuisance should not be tolerated.

I am, sir, yours very truly,

ARTHUR DIOSY.

M. DOOMCHEFF'S CONCERT.

Yokohama has been favoured with visits from many musicians of respectable abilities, and from several of very high talents. But rarely has a local audience had the opportunity of hearing so consummate a master as M. Constantine Doomcheff, the well-known Russian violinist, who appeared on Thursday in the Public Hall. Unfortunately, perhaps through the wretched state of weather, and also possibly from ignorance on the part of the community as to the capabilities of the artist—though the notices already appearing in the Press should have made it clear that M. Doomcheff was a violinist of exceptional power—the audience was regrettably small, not half the available accommodation being occupied. Professor Doomcheff must have been rather disappointed, for this is, we believe, not his first visit to Yokohama, and, from the natural amour propre of one whose soul is in his art, it would probably have pleased him to have had a big reception in a place where he performed some years ago as a mere lad, recognised as of great promise, but not yet arrived at the full maturity of his powers. Mr. Doomcheff is truly a great artist, and his career has been one of marked distinction. He is one of the infant prodigies who have not disappointed early expectations. From the age of eight, when he made his first appearance before Royalty, his career has been one of steady and consistent progress, and to-day, in the first years of manhood, he promises to develop into one of the great violinists of the world. The programme last night was admirably selected, and enabled the artist to show his great capabilities to the best advantage. It opened with a concerto by Beethoven, which was magnificently rendered. The effect on the audience was marked. At the opening they sat with frigid indifference and dull decorum prepared apparently for the ordinary "creditable" performance of the clever amateur and the mediocre professional. But the first few notes were sufficient to show that it was the hand of a master that was at work, and as the artist proceeded the auditors warmed into keen enthusiasm, the heartiest applause marking the conclusion of each movement. The concluding cadence was especially beautiful. Then followed a Berceuse of M. Doomcheff's own composing, played with muted strings. It was a beautifully dreamy melody, making less demands than the opening piece on the artist's powers of technique, but played with splendid expression. Sarasate's "Zigeunerweisen" was the concluding item of the first part of the programme, and was rendered in a manner which the composer himself could hardly have excelled. The allegro movement particularly charmed the audience, and an encore was so vociferously demanded that M. Doomcheff had to respond with a Mazurka by Wieniawski. The second half opened with Wieniawski's "Souvenir de Moscou," and then followed another piece of the artist's own composition, "Adagio Triste," the plaintive melody of which was charmingly expressed. The concluding item was Fantaisie de l'Opera "Moise" (Paganini), executed on one string only. This was one of the most beautiful numbers of the evening, and the inevitable encore followed. M. Doomcheff was manifestly unwilling to comply, as was natural after two hours' continuous exertion, but the audience would not be denied, and the artist was kind enough to accede to its wishes. The accompaniments were played by Miss Melissoff. We regret that the audience was so small at this, undoubtedly the finest concert of the kind in Yokohama for years, for it is to some extent discreditable to the taste of the musical community, but we feel assured that if Mr. Doomcheff could be induced to repeat his performance this seeming want of appreciation would prove to be due merely to the unfortunate climatic conditions of last night.

AFFAIRS IN CHINA.

In consequence of the disturbed state of the country around Ningpo, the Taotai has informed the British Consul at that port that he has made arrangements to provide an escort for foreigners who may be travelling in that neighbourhood. The Ningpo Taotai is chiefly concerned about the safety of visitors to Talaushan and other summer resorts.

The German authorities at Kiaochow have come to an arrangement with the Foreign Chinese Customs to undertake the control of trade in the German territory; and a very wise decision this is, remarks the N. C. Daily News, as the experience of the Foreign Customs will be the gain of the German Authorities in facilitating the trade of their recent concession.

It is stated in the Shanghai vernacular papers that the Empress Dowager has issued commands for the formation of a body of Solon (a Manchur tribe, near the Amoor) cavalry numbering some 10,000 men, and that the command of the new cavalry division will be given to Jung Ho, a cousin of the Generalissimo Jung Lu. The men will be armed, it is stated, with Mauser cavalry carbines.

The anti-foreign outbreak near Fenchow, was conveyed to Shanghai in the following telegram to the N. C. Daily News:—

Fenchow, 16th June (12 45 p.m.)

It is reported that serious anti-foreign troubles have occurred at Kienning. The Church and Mission House have been burnt down, but the Missionaries escaped to Ninghia, on the way to Fenchow.

Later: 9 p.m.

News confirmed. Three native converts have been killed, and the Hospital is in danger. There is great anxiety about the Rev. H. S. Phillips and his wife.

The North China Daily News estimates that the damage done by the big fire in Fenchow road, Shanghai, on the night of June 11, will probably reach Tls. 200,000. The burden will fall on almost every European Insurance Company operating in Shanghai. The limited supply of water at the commencement had doubtless something to do with the fire spreading to the buildings immediately adjacent, but the brisk southerly breeze prevailing did much to retard the efforts of the firemen. Some of the buildings were fairly substantially erected, but in the great majority of cases were only of a most ramshackle order. In all 46 tenements, made up of dwellings, brothels, and shops, principally, were totally destroyed and six seriously damaged. The fire was caused, it is supposed, through the accidental upsetting of a kerosene oil lamp in a Chinese book-shop.

On Sunday, June 11, shortly before noon, a boat, containing blue-jackets belonging to H.M.S. Woodlark who were returning from church parade, was capsized in the Shanghai river under somewhat peculiar circumstances, namely, the carrying away of the small awning guy on the starboard side, thus causing the awning, which runs fore and aft the boat, to show its broadside to the wind, which at the time was a bit fresh, and so causing a side pressure which the small craft, already laden, was unable to withstand. Boats were lowered, life-buoys thrown, and every effort made, but, says the N. C. Daily News, had it not been for the plucky conduct of Lieut.-Commander Barton one of the men must have lost the number of his mess, for when rescued by the gallant officer, who dived after him, he was completely exhausted and on the verge of drowning. The remainder of the crew were quickly got on board their vessel, and the up-turned boat was recovered by a party from the Hermione.

The Shanghai sportsmen who went to Wel-hi-wei at the invitation of the British Fleet had a rare good time. The ship on which they travelled to Great Britain's latest "lease-hold" in China had barely come to an anchorage when she was surrounded by boats from the various men-of-war in port, the Centurion (flagship), Victorious, Bonaventure, Iphigenia, Aurora, Alacrity, Phoenix, Brisk, and Linnet, and the visitors were taken off to the ships in accordance with the hospitable arrangements for accommodating them which had been previously arranged, the Captain of the Shanghai team, Mr. W. J. Tyack, being assigned quarters in the flagship, and the Admiral very kindly permitted signals each day to be made conveying Mr. Tyack's wishes to his companions. The destroyers Fame and Whiting were also in port, but could not, of course, offer much cabin accommodation to visitors. After breakfast on the first day the visiting team devoted their attention to practice on the local cricket ground, where the guard room had been turned into a pavilion. The visitors found this ground very different to their own fine expanse of turf, as it was nothing but hard gravel, which made fielding very erratic work, while the pitch was covered with coconut matting painted green. The boundaries of the cricket ground were limited, but the entire conditions were so strange that much more practice was needed than could be afforded in one day. From the ground the visitors could observe in the surrounding buildings the effects of the bombardment in 1895, and could look down on the remains of the Chensuen still lying in the northern part of the harbour, while many other relics of the fight were strewn on the beach. In the evening most of the visitors were entertained at dinner by the Admiral on board the Centurion. At cricket Shanghai found the Navy more than a match. Going in first, the visitors made 220; the Navy followed and knocked up 311. Shanghai in its second innings made only 116. Defeated at cricket, Shanghai—to quote its leading journal—in a weak moment chose to rest their reputation on football as being a game in which they were bound to excel, and they challenged their hosts accordingly to a game. Alas! the defeat in football was more pronounced than in cricket, for a match of 6 a side resulted in 8 goals for Wei-hi-wei against 1 goal for Shanghai. In the evening a grand dinner was given in honour of the visitors in the Wardroom of the Centurion, at which the Admiral and Captain Jellicoe were present, and the speeches on this occasion rose beyond the usual after-dinner platitudes. The dinner was followed by an impromptu dance on deck, when the members of the Shanghai team displayed their versatility by representing the gentler sex in the masquerade. Thursday, the 8th, was devoted to tennis matches, and here again Shanghai was outclassed, being hopelessly beaten in both doubles and singles. On Friday, the 9th, several of the visitors were conducted to the mainland to witness the drilling of the Chinese Regiment, and were much and agreeably surprised to witness the wonderful progress that has been made in a few months' time. The physique of the men is good, and they appear to be keen on their work. They are neatly dressed in blue, wearing turbans, tunic and trousers, with service boots, and they find quarters in a former bean-oil factory. A polo match, followed by a Gymkhana filled the bill on the 10th, and this concluded the Festival.

IMPORTANT CONTRACT CASE.

Judge Fujise and two associate Judges heard yesterday in the Yokohama Chito Saibansho the claim of H. Lucas & Co., Kobe, against the Tugara Railway Company for the payment of 37,900 yen with interest at 7 per cent. For the plaintiffs it was alleged that a contract was entered into between three directors of the company and Messrs. Lucas for the supply of a locomotive, rails, etc., for 180,000 yen. Mr. Shibahara, a member of the House of Peers, and one of the directors, admitted that a contract, but not a formal contract, was concluded and signed by three directors. As to the payment of bargain money to the Kobe firm to the amount of yen 28,400 and yen 9,500, witness stated that he was told by Mr. Uyeda, one of the directors, some time after the signing of the contract, that the sum should be paid by the Company in accordance with a promise in the Kobe firm, but witness refused the payment of such money, as the contract concluded before, being in the form of a provisional contract, was not duly signed in the name of the Company. It was absolutely impossible to make such a contract for the purchase of such costly articles, seeing that the Company's capital was not fully paid up by the shareholders. Other witnesses were called, and judgment was reserved to Saturday.

KOREAN NOTES.

The Korean Independent has reappeared, taking the place of the Korean Weekly Reporter. In its first editorial, headed "Resurrection," it says it "has not been in any sense dead, but merely, like Bre'r Rabbit, laying low." It hopes to be an educating power, and will turn the search light on events in the capital. "We shall show no quarter to wickedness or oppression in high or low places, but trust we shall be enabled to reveal without judgment, as we do not occupy the position of judge to any. All may depend that we shall endeavour to carry out our motto, and, while whittling down nothing, yet set down nothing in a spirit of hatred. We are sure that those who do well have nothing to fear, while those you do evil will want to cover it up. Now that we have revived again and have not 'three men and a boy' to keep things going we shall be glad of the help of our former contributors and correspondents and any new ones who would like to contribute in the success of this paper. Let us hear from you often, our old friends 'Columbus,' 'Molayo,' 'The Man with a White Hat,' 'Pepper,' 'Salt,' 'Old Residents,' 'Casuals,' etc., etc."

The people of Ko Po and Heung Tuk in the South Chulla Province recently rose in rebellion against the magistrates on account of the harsh treatment they receive at their hands. They call themselves "Young Hak Party." The authorities telegraphed to Seoul for soldiers to be sent to assist in putting down the outbreak and in compliance with this request the War Department issued orders for the Kang Who detachment to be sent down immediately. The soldiers were despatched, but shortly afterwards news was received that twenty of the ringleaders had been captured and that this check was likely to end the whole affair without the help of the military. The orders were therefore cancelled.

The Emperor a few days ago reviewed the whole of the troops of Seoul together with the students of the Military School. The regiments presented quite a gay appearance in their new uniforms purchased for the occasion. His Majesty expressed himself as being dissatisfied with the way in which the soldiers went through their drills, and especially with the fact that out of a muster of seventy officers only twenty were in any way qualified to drill the troops in their charge, and they only in a very indifferent manner. The Imperial Guard made a somewhat better show.

and arches, with various other attractions, marked the dedication of this valuable piece of property to Japanese trade in Korea. It is a splendid piece of work and improves alike the look and the value of the harbour.

Nam Myong San, the new Commissioner of Police, is, says the Independent, as notorious a character as the present President of the Privy Council, for the high-handed manner in which he deals with those under him. When he was Magistrate of Young-am South Chulla Province, the people endeavoured to get rid of him by shooting him, but were unsuccessful. It is an open secret that he paid the sum of twelve thousand dollars for the privilege of holding his present position. The Ministers have raised strong objections to his appointment, in consequence of which the Minister of the Home Department, who gave him the position, has resigned.

The reception of Prince Henry of Prussia in Seoul and Chemulpo seems to have been very cordial. He was accorded an interview with the Emperor, who afterwards returned the call. On Sunday, June 11th, a grand review of 3,000 troops took place, with His Majesty as Commander-in-chief and the Crown Prince as his first aide de camp.

The Independent throws no fresh light on the recent explosions in Seoul. From the small amount of damage done, except in the attack on the house of Prince Pak, it is probably that the agent used was gunpowder, and not dynamite. The only hurt the majority of the houses received, were that the walls and in some instances the doors were blown down. At Prince Pak's house two men were killed. Seventeen arrests were made.

JAPANESE IN HAWAII.

(WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

The Japanese are now the most numerous people dwelling in the Hawaiian Islands. According to the census of 1896 the number of pure Hawaiians was 31,019, but the Japanese now easily number 35,000. Of these, according to the Japanese Consul in Honolulu, 24,000 are employed upon the sugar plantations. Almost all of them are contract labourers. The contracts are made in Japan through various emigration companies. They run for three years, and the wage now given is fifteen dollars U.S. gold per month. The plantation furnishes houses, fuel, and medical attendance, and pays all taxes. Sunday labour is forbidden by law in Hawaii. For women, ten dollars per month is paid. Engineers, carpenters, and other tradesmen, and men who show special skill often receive much more. On one plantation I found some men receiving $50 per month and one or two as high as $65 per month. A species of profit-sharing has been tried on a few plantations with excellent results for both the Japanese labourers and the plantations. The planter prepares the ground, plants the cane, and gives it one watering. It is then turned over to a company, or squad, of labourers who care for it till the cane is ready to cut—a period of about eighteen months. During this time money is advanced month by month to meet necessary expenses. The cane is then cut, delivered at the mill, and bought in by the manager at so much per ton. This plan is peculiarly adapted to the independent spirit of the Japanese and very nearly doubles their profits.

Beyond question the Japanese labourers greatly improve their pecuniary condition by going to Hawaii. Even at the ordinary contract price of 15 dollars it is not difficult for them to save from $5 to $8. Such a net earning of ten to sixteen yen by a Japanese peasant is, as we all know, an unheard-of thing.

However, life on a sugar plantation is not an easy or agreeable thing to a Japanese. The hours are not long to them, but the labour demanded is continuous and often severe. It is untried labour to all, and of course the luna, or boss, even where not unkind, seeks to get as much work out of them as is possible—with ignorance of the language this inevitably results in some hardship. I think it probable that the plantations I visited on the three islands of Mani, Oat u, and Hawaii, were all of the better class, perhaps the very best. So far as my observation went there was no intentional unkindness. The Japanese were spoken highly of. Some said outright that they are the best labourers on the Islands.

The children of all the labourers have free education in the public schools. These are supplemented by kindergartens for the younger children which are in operation or planned for on several of the plantations. These are supported by the "Free Kindergarten and Children's Aid Association," a Christian institution composed of the ladies of Hawaii, many of them being the wives or daughters of the planters. In Honolulu this society has kindergarten for the Chinese, Japanese, Portuguese, and Hawaiian children. I doubt very much whether there is another community of equal size anywhere in the world where so much is being done for alien races. The Hawaiian Evangelical Association has evangelists on a number of the plantations and Dr. M. C. Harris, of the California Methodist Conference, is working in the same way. These evangelists are often a great boon to both planter and labourer by acting as interpreters and go-betweens. The planters usually furnish them a house free of rent, and in many cases pay a part, and in some the whole, of their salaries.

The most unsatisfactory thing in the treatment of the Japanese labourers on the Islands is the condition of their camps. The houses are too small. One misdeed in them the raised floors and the tatami which keep the Japanese house so clean. Too many persons are crowded together, a fact which seems to be far truer of some of the plantations which I did not see than of those I visited.

The arrangements for water supply are inconvenient and inadequate. This doubtless affects the health of the labourers, and especially that of their children. This is particularly true of the arrangements for bathing. As I took the liberty of saying through one of the Honolulu daily papers, "some better arrangement that would separate the sexes and prevent exposure of the person is loudly called for in the interests of decency and morality."

I have spoken of the net earnings of the labourers. A large amount of money is thus sent to Japan. Those under contract, I am told, send much more than free labourers. After the contract expires the lives are less strenuous, work becomes more irregular, and spending more easy. Very few labourers renew their contracts immediately upon expiration. The usual way is to return to Japan and renew there. About five hundred, the Consul tells me, have decided to remain permanently in Hawaii, all the others plan to go home sooner or later.

There is a good deal of distrust of the Japanese on the part of the planters. This comes from their proneness to combine in reckless attacks upon other labourers or upon their overseers. Not long ago a gang of them attacked and murdered an overseer who was of their own nationality. Thirty or forty of them confessed the deed, making it difficult to secure conviction. More recently they murdered four Chinamen in a very brutal way. Such conduct has produced distrust and fear, and in a recent conference of planters it was agreed that hereafter the Japanese labourers on any plantation should not exceed those of other nationalities. The Japanese show special aptitude for work in the sugar mills, and in some mills with the exception of a very few "white men" the work is all in their hands. While there is distrust of the Japanese in the mass some individuals are thoroughly trusted and have great responsibilities put upon them. I have in mind one man—a Christian—who has charge of a camp of one hundred and fifty men.

CHINESE "RIGHTS" IN AFRICA.

(FROM THE "CHINA MAIL.")

Whilst the nations of Europe are employing themselves in carving out spheres of influence in Africa and China, it must not be forgotten the Chinese themselves once had extensive trading interests on the Somali and Zanzibar coasts, and might on this ground put in a claim for recognition in the Indian Ocean not inferior to that advanced by certain Europeans in the China seas.

The trade between Southern India and the maritime ports of China was in full swing long before the appearance of the Arabs in the Far East, but it was not until after Mahomet's time that the Koran and the astrolabe went hand in hand upon voyages of missionary and commercial enterprise east of Ceylon; nor was it until the Chinese traders had met the Arabs in Cochlin and Malabar that they ventured in the contrary direction westwards of Ceylon. Neither the Arabs nor the Chinese seem to have had very definite ideas whether the African coasts belonged to a continent or to a series of islands; but there is sufficient unity in their descriptions to shew that they often refer to the same countries, or provinces. It is evident that the Chinese at least regarded the southern coast of Arabia and the eastern coast of Africa as being in one almost continuous line, starting from Muscat and going on as far south as Zanzibar: it was not until the 15th century that they discovered, through conversations with Arab traders at Cochlin, that there was a sea route up the Red Sea to Mecca, or its port. They considered the whole of the trading ports lying along the above described line as being in the Southern Ocean, by which they meant the western half of the same vast sea as the one which contained Borneo, the Moluccas, Java, Sumatra, and Ceylon.

The first distinct mention of relations with Africa occurs in the year 1,017 of our era, when an envoy arrived from a very distant country in the southern seas called Dzangdan. He explained that he had taken 160 days to sail (by way of Calicut and Sumatra) to Canton; and that his master's title or name was Amir-Amiran, the tenth in succession of a dynasty which had up to then ruled for nearly 500 years. The ruler's capital was seven English miles from the sea. Twelve years later, another envoy named Dzangani arrived from the same country. Probably it was from these two men that the following further particulars were gleaned:—"The language spoken is the same as that of Arabia, and the country is warm even in spring and winter. Amongst the animals are sheep, goats, sand-kine [hippopotamus], water-buffaloes, camels, horses, rhinoceros, and elephants, which last they use for riding purposes. They grow both rice and wheat, but fish is also eaten. The better classes wear turbans, and the clothing consists of patterned cotton cloth. The Government strikes the coinage, of which it has a monopoly, gold, silver, and copper being all used in certain proportion."

Nearly a century before this, two envoys from Arabia, one of whom bore the name of Mahomet, had brought to China amongst other presents some black slaves described by a name (Kunlun), the precise meaning of which in this application has not yet been ascertained, and in the same year (1017) in which Dzangdan first sent tribute, the Arab ruler of Sahaza in Sumatra also sent to China a present of slaves similarly christened. As this ruler is said to have been a Hadji, there is thus specific Chinese evidence of his Arab origin, apart from the fact that Arab dynasties are well-known to have then ruled in Sumatra. Even the Ming history speaks of "small black boys", being sent from Borneo in the 15th century as tribute. It is easily probable by a tortuous but sure process that these slaves must have been from the Zanzibar coast. In the first place, the Russian sinologist, Dr. Bretschneider, about thirty years ago discovered in a Chinese book nearly three centuries old an account of a country in the south-west seas where black slaves,—styled Kunlun as above, with the addition of the word Dzang-gi,—were bartered away to traders in exchange for foreign produce. In this country were found birds of enormous dimensions. Ten years later, Mr. Consul Phillips of China found a similar extract in a work published in 1739, together with a wood-cut of a huge bird, and of an unmistakable negro wearing nothing but a clout, in charge of a light-coloured man carrying on his head an embroidered conical cap such as the Arabs of Ceylon wear to this day. Moreover, this work refers to the fact that, so early as the year 813, a Javanese state had sent four of such slaves to China. On looking up the Chinese histories, I find that in this earliest instance the slaves are described as Sanggi, without the incomprehensible addition. Finally, a small popular Chinese picture-book in my own possession gives a woodcut of a clouted native of Dzang-gi country, together with the following legend: "It is an island in the south-west sea, where there are enormous birds whose wings obscure the sun. The natives are able to eat camel flesh: it takes a month to get there with the north-east monsoon."

Turning now to the Rev. Samuel Lee's translation of Ibn Batuta's travels in 1339, I observe that the Arab traveller, after noticing that the inhabitants of the Somali coast lived chiefly on fish and camels' flesh, sailed from Magadoxa "for the country of the Zanû," spent one night at Mombasa, and then went on to Kulwâ, by which he evidently means the Quiloa of the Portuguese as marked on modern maps.

Mr. Phillips has clearly shown that Zangnibar or Zanzibar is merely an Arab corruption of the Persian words sangi "black," and bar "a country,"—in other words "the country of the Zanûj"; and he goes on to identify the Chinese word Dzang-gi with the same Persian word for "negro." As Ibn Batuta gives us the first syllable kul, and the Portuguese nasal la is equivalent to lan, we practically get the mysterious Chinese word kun-lun, the original meaning of which was a mythical Himalayan mountain or state, but which the later Chinese (as in their fashion) also use for other places such as Condor Island, near Saigon, to this day; and, as we now see, did probably once use for Quiloa. I may say that I visited the French penitentiary of Pulo Condor in 1888, and found traces of an old British fort there: both Annamese and Chinese still call it Kunlun.

The above testimony is reasonably conclusive; but the later Chinese histories contain much more positive evidence of the fact that their junks repeatedly visited the Somali and Zanzibar coasts, and that they were before Marco Polo in their knowledge of that locality.

For instance Jubb, a town at the mouth of the river of that name (sometimes written Juba), which now forms part of the boundary between the Italian and the British possessions, was actually visited by a Chinese envoy nearly 500 years ago. The same man on two occasions (1416 and 1430) went from Quilon on the Malabar coast to Baravah and Magadoxa a little north-east of Jubb, and he specially mentions that these three territories are coterminal. On a third voyage to one or more of these three places, he seems to have set out from a point near modern Galle in Ceylon, and on all three journeys his junk performed the transit in either twenty or twenty-one days with the monsoon. Melinda, which is on the other side of the River Jubb, in the direction of Zanzibar, sent tribute to China along with its three neighbours in 1416: in fact, Melinda seems to have set the ball a-rolling by first voluntarily sending presents of a giraffe and a zebra in 1415. The fact that amongst other names the zebra is described both in 1017 and 1416 by almost the same foreign word (jungluh fuhluh) suggests an attempt to imitate some Arab or Somali word having the same signification. There can be no doubt whatever of the identity of these places, for, even in Chinese dress, Chubu, Pulawa, Mukutshu, and Malinti are perfectly recognisable. Moreover, according to the Chinese chart used by the Dutch envoy, a copy of which Mr. Phillips gave me ten years ago, the places are actually marked in the following order. Melinda appears to be the extreme limit of Chinese navigation, and the port of Manpassa (Mombasa) is marked; then come Baravah and Magadoxa, and in the corner Hafuni (Cape Hafoun), with Atau (Aden) across the strait, and Sukutala (Socotra) to the west.

The Chinese lay stress upon the barren character of the whole coast; the absence of vegetation; the fact that even horses, camels, cattle, and sheep are fed on dried fish; the wealth in frankincense, ambergris, amber (i.e. the Arab perfume); the presence of ostriches, lions, &c., &c. Finally, the account of these countries comes immediately after that of Tanfar (Zafar) in Arabia; and it was precisely from Quiloa to Zafar that Ibn Batuta set sail on his way to India and China.

Marco Polo is usually said to have been the first to mention Madagascar; but, as Colonel Yule points out (edition of 1870), there is every reason to suppose that he confused this place with Magadoxa. Like the Chinese, he speaks of Saracens, elephants, ambergris, giraffes, wild asses (zebras), and the eating of camel-flesh. Ibn Batuta also describes, just as the Chinese described, the way in which lobân (olibanum) is obtained from the frankincense tree. Marco Polo's "four sheiks, who rule the entire country" would seem to be the rulers of the four states which, as we have seen, were known to the Chinese. He mentions that ships come from Malabar in twenty days; that Zanzibar lies beyond Madagascar; and that "mariners cannot reach the other islands lying South of Madagascar and Zanzibar owing to the violence of the current."

There is nothing in the Chinese Annals to show that Kublai or any monarch of the Mongol dynasty ever sent messengers to the African Coast, as stated by Marco Polo, "to obtain information about the country, and also to release one of his subjects who had been made prisoner." Numerous missions were despatched to Malabar and Quilon, besides one or two to Ceylon; and full particulars are given of the envoys' names, the articles of tribute brought, and so on. To all these places Kublai sent messengers to hunt for strange objects; and as a matter of fact Malabar sent a zebra in 1287 and a curious leopard in 1291, both of which were probably brought to Malabar from Africa; but there is absolutely no mention between 1206 and 1368, i.e. between the rise of Genghis and the death of Kublai, of any place on the Arabian and African coasts.

The direct relations between China and Africa may therefore be thus summed up, so far as they are officially recorded. Between 1071 and 1083 there were missions from Zangnibar Arab rulers to the Chinese emperors who preceded the Mongols. Between 1415 and 1430 there were missions from the four Arab sheiks of the Zangnibar coast to the Chinese emperors who succeeded the Mongols; and official Chinese envoys reached Hormuz, Aden, and as far south as Melinda. One of these envoys sent an officer up the Red Sea, in an Arab ship, from the Malabar coast to Mecca; and this is all that can be said.

I remember to have seen somewhere in Gibbon a statement, made on the authority of Cosmas, that the Zingi conducted a trade along the coasts of Africa; and I also remember to have seen it stated somewhere that Sir John Kirk found numerous traces of old Chinese porcelain at Zanzibar. Marco Polo did not himself visit the places he speaks of as Madagascar; but his relation is perfectly correct if applied to Magadoxa and its three neighbouring states, which were known to the Chinese 200 years before he heard of them, and visited by the Chinese officially 150 years after his visit to Arabia. Even the yarn about the roc is the same. The only unexplained point is half of the word Dzangdan. Possibly it is a form of star, making the whole Zangnidan instead of Zangnibar; for the syllable tan is much used by the Chinese in that sense. But the particular character here used means "Sandah," and may refer to the sandal trees Marco tells us were there; and there is a good precedent, for the Chinese name for the Sandwich Islands is Sandal Islands. NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The Siberian railway has been opened as far as Irkutsk.

The new Japanese cruiser Tokits arrived at Malta on the 1st inst. en route to Japan.

The Coroner in Singapore, Dr. Mugilston, has justified the shooting of the Malay amoker by Captain Koenig, on board the steamer Sri Pontianak, near Singapore.

Corporal Almond, of the Welch Fusiliers, has been publicly decorated in Hongkong with the Royal Humane Society's Bronze Medal, for a gallant attempt at saving the life of an Italian soldier, while the regiment were in Crete a year ago.

The Toyo Kisen Kaisha steamer America Maru (Captain Cope), from Hongkong via ports, arrived at the quarantine station yesterday afternoon at 4 o'clock. A case of sickness was discovered on board, and the steamer sailed for Nagahama (Government Quarantine Station) at 5 o'clock this morning.

Attempts are being made to save the cargo of the sailing ship Selkirk, which was wrecked on the west coast of Mindoro, in the Philippines. The Campana Maritima steamer Castellano has already succeeded in saving 1,361 bales of hemp out of the cargo of 10,000 bales. The cabins, &c., were looted by natives.

A fire broke out about 12.15 on Wednesday morning in a godown at the rear of Messrs. Brett and Co.'s premises, No. 60. The Fire Brigade was soon on the scene, and prevented the fire spreading to the main building. The godown, which contained drugs, was destroyed, and a considerable amount of damage was done.

The new Chinese cruiser Haitien left Portsmouth for China on the 23rd May. She is an Elswick-built vessel, and is the fastest cruiser in the world, having made no less than 24.1 knots an hour under forced draught on her trial trip. She is of about 4,500 tons displacement, and carries two 8-inch and ten 4.7-inch quick-firing guns. A sister ship, the Haichi, has also been completed.

A Godown keeper formerly in the employ of Messrs. Boyes & Co., says the Higo Evening News, has been sentenced in the Kobe District Court to six months' imprisonment, and subsequently to six months' police surveillance, for stealing 250 cartons of dyes from the firm in March last. He had sold the dyes to three different purchasers for a total of yen 192 50.

It is reported that a duel with sabres was fought, recently, at the military school at Potsdam, between the son of the Shah of Persia and a German officer. In the fifth round, the Crown Prince was badly wounded on the head, and according to latest advices was not then out of danger.

The homeward French transport Colombo which left Singapore on the 23rd May for Marseilles, broke her machinery when about 800 miles off Penang, and the Austrian steamer Silesia, from Trieste to Singapore, falling in with her, took her in tow to Penang. The Colombo when she left Singapore had 644 civil and military passengers from Indo China going home.—Free Press.

The North-German Lloyd liner Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse has again beaten her previous Atlantic record (averaging 22.29 knots) by covering the distance from Cherbourg (France) to Sandy Hook (New York), of 3,148 nautical miles, in five days 20 hours and 48 minutes. The average speed was 22.33 knots per hour. The daily runs constituted 416, 547, 549, 556, and 524 miles respectively.

The lady managers of the Benevolent Association acting in connection with the benefit performance in the Public Gardens, Bluff, next Monday evening are as follows:—Mrs. Irwine, Mrs. Eldridge, Mrs. W. B. Walter, Mrs.

Thomas Thomas, Mrs. Grauer, Mrs. J. Walter, Madame de Micheaux, Mrs. Mitchell, Mrs. James, Mrs. Bonar, and Mrs. McMillan, of Tokyo. The entertainment should be a great success.

Mr. Diozy has consented to give a free lecture to members of the Japan Society, and others who may be interested, on Tuesday 27th inst., at 4 p.m., in the Hall at No. 54 Tankiji, Tokyo. The subject of the lecture will be the Past, Present, and Future Work of the Japan Society of London. Sir Ernest Satow has kindly consented to take the chair. All interested are cordially invited to be present.

The Sumatra Post finds it "encouraging" that three Chinese who have been treated in the Pasteur Institute at Batavia and returned to Medan after the "cure," have all become mad, and one is already dead. So many mad dogs are at large in Medan that the garrison was told off by the Resident with sharpshooters to kill dogs on the public roads beyond the town.

In Hongkong the plague is still very prevalent. Two foreigners have been struck down by it, one being Sanitary Inspector Reidie. The disease unfortunately seems to have got a little hold at Penang, also. On the 5th June there were two fresh cases and three deaths, and on the 6th one fresh case and one death. Gibraltar quarantines all ships coming from Egypt.

The Sorin Club (Osaka) held some bicycle races on Sunday on a track near Ajikawa Station. Cyclists from Tokyo, Kyoto, Yokohama, and Kobe were among the competitors. The vernacular papers especially mention the "fancy riding" of Mr. Vaughan, a well-known cyclist of Yokohama. The railway fare on the Nishinari line had been reduced for the occasion, says a Kobe contemporary, and as many as 14,000 tickets were issued during the day for Ajikawa station.

Staff-Lt. Col. C. Aguilar was sent from Zamboanga by the Spanish authorities, to go to Baler, east coast of Luzon, in the steamer Saturnus, to inquire about the Spaniards there. He reached Manila on June 2, and reported that he had no difficulty in effecting communication. Lt. Martinez is still holding out bravely, with 33 men, the other 21 out of his original force of 54 being dead or missing. The rebels are utterly unable to get at them, but offer to let them go free if they give up their weapons. This they refuse to do, and say they will hold out till Doomsday, even if all the armies of Aguinaldo try to beat them.

An engineer named Germain in the French Ministry of Posts and Telegraphs, has brought out an invention which he claims will revolutionise the telephone. By an ingenious adaptation of the telephone wire the microphone is made to develop and intensify the vibration received so that it is unnecessary to place the receiver to the ear or stand with the mouth close to the transmitter, and conversation is easily carried on between two persons, both of whom may be several yards distant from the instrument. The invention has been several times officially tested and pronounced a complete success.

On the suggestion of the American Asiatic Association of New York, a meeting will be held at the United States Consulate, Yokohama, on the 26th to consider the question of forming a branch of that Association in Yokohama. The objects of the Association are as follows:—To foster and safeguard the commercial and other interests of citizens of the United States of America in Japan. To promote acquaintance and association among Americans in Japan, and by union and permanent organization to give more effective aid in behalf of measures intended to advance such interests. To gather and distribute information of importance to its members, to act in concert with and aid in the purposes of the American Association of New York and of China and such kindred associations as may hereafter be formed.

in the Orient. The following officers have already been elected provisionally: Messrs. T. L. Brower, J. W. Copmann, J. Lindsley, J. R. Morse, E. R. Smith, and L. H. Abel, honorary secretary pro tem.

Amos Hadaway, the second engineer of the Zafro, was killed on June 14th by falling from a verandah at Mrs. Lewis's boarding house in No. 3, Wyndham Street, Hongkong. He had been about the city during the day, and returned to the boarding-house about eight o'clock at night rather the worse for drink. The men seems to have taken off his hat and coat and boots on getting into his room and placed them on a chair and then gone on to the verandah, where he apparently went to sleep. At about a quarter past one o'clock in the morning Mrs. Lewis, hearing a thud, went to see what was the matter, and found deceased had fallen from the verandah, a distance of about 50 feet, on to the street. The skull was smashed in and he apparently was killed instantaneously.

A fire broke out on board the British steamer Amara—then in Hongkong harbour—on Saturday, June 10. It was caused through the carelessness of a Chinaman. This man had gone into the storeroom to get some kerosene oil, taking a lighted lamp with him. Whilst he was pouring the oil from one vessel into another, the oil ignited, and, on dropping the vessel he held, the oil saturated his clothes and he became quickly enveloped in flames. Rushing out of the room crying for assistance, he was met by Mr. Wright, the second engineer, who threw a mat around him and extinguished the flames. It was not until a few minutes afterwards that Mr. Wright observed the storeroom was aflame. Every effort was made by those on board to extinguish the fire, but the flames spread in an alarming manner. In response to fire signals, parties of men were sent from the Powerful and Undaunted, and the Government steam fire engine also arrived. The fire spread to the engine room and then to the No. 3 hold. A large amount of water was pumped into the ship, giving her a heavy list, and the fire was drowned out. The cargo is insured.—China Mail.

CRICKET.

MR. DUFF'S TEAM V. MR. CRAWFORD'S TEAM.

This match was played on Saturday afternoon on the Recreation Ground, the former XI. being badly beaten. Mr. Duff's team went first to the wickets, and all were dismissed for 97, the only stand being by Kingdon, whose 43 not out was a good performance, including five hits for 4. Mr. Crawford's team gave the other side a lively bit of leather-hunting, F. E. White (33) and K. F. Crawford (35) being the principal scores. Crawford hit two 4's and five 3's, and F. E. White five 4's. In this innings the position at the fall of each wicket was not recorded. Score:—

(REUTER'S SPECIAL SERVICE.)

THE TRANSVAAL CRISIS.

Shanghai, June 16, 3 p.m.

The Raad has approved President Kruger's franchise proposals, on condition that they are endorsed by the Burgers to whom they will be referred. President Kruger, in thanking the Raad, said that it was impossible to know what was going to happen. Great Britain had conceded nothing. He did not want war, but was unable to give anything more.

Mr. Chamberlain's reply to the Petition of the Uitlanders has been published. It constitutes an exhaustive indictment of the political, financial, and judicial administration of the Transvaal. It is based on Milner's despatches, which finally disprove the idea that there is any unreality in the grievances of the Uitlanders. The English newspapers generally applaud the reply as a masterly exposition of the situation. The Daily Chronicle alone condemns it, declaring that the publication of the despatches is mischievous and untimely.

Shanghai, June 19, 2.30 p.m.

The Financial Times says that the German Consul at Pretoria has been instructed from Berlin to inform President Kruger that Germany considers Great Britain's demands fair and reasonable, and that she (Germany) desires President Kruger to accede as far as possible.

The Right Honourable Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, speaking at Ilford, in Essex, said that nothing had occurred to justify military preparations against the Transvaal.

Shanghai, June 20.

The burghers have held a large meeting at Puarde Kraal, and have adopted a resolution declaring it impossible to concede anything beyond the proposals formulated by President Kruger to the Bloemfontein Government (the Orange Free State).

Shanghai, June 21.

The Marquis of Lansdowne, Her Majesty's Secretary of State for War, held a lengthy conference with the principal officials of the War Office on Monday, the 19th instant. The conference is believed to have had reference to affairs in the Transvaal.

A large exodus of women and children has taken place from Johannesburg and Pretoria. The natives are quitting the mines.

Various preparations are in progress in the Cape Colony to facilitate the speedy movement of troops against the Transvaal.

The Daily Telegraph says that, in the event of hostilities in the Transvaal, the troops will be commanded by General the Rt. Hon. Sir Redvers Henry Buller, V.C., G.C.B.

FRENCH POLITICAL UNREST.

Shanghai, June 16, 3 p.m.

M. Poincaré is organizing the new French Cabinet.

Shanghai, June 17, 8.20 p.m.

M. Poincaré has been foiled in his attempts to form a Cabinet owing to the exacting attitude assumed by the Radicals. President Loubet is now consulting with the Presidents of the Chamber of Deputies and of the Senate.

Shanghai, June 19, 2.50 p.m.

M. Waldeck-Rousseau is endeavouring to form a Cabinet. He has offered the Portfolio of War to M. Casimir-Perier.

Shanghai, June 20.

M. Waldeck-Rousseau has failed to form a Cabinet.

The President of the Republic has summoned M. Bourgeois from the Hague to confer about forming a new Cabinet.

Admiral Decuville, Chief of the French Naval Staff, and delegate at the Peace conference, has been superseded for publishing a letter adversely criticising the condition of the national defences.

Shanghai, June 22.

The Dreyfus affair is the real cause of the difficulties experienced in forming a French Cabinet. Politicians shrink from the probable consequences of the court-martial before which Dreyfus is to be again arraigned. The military element of the nation is still violently anti-Dreyfus.

THE VENEZUELA QUESTION.

Shanghai, June 17, 3.30 p.m.

The tribunal for discussing the Venezuela question has assembled in Paris.

THE INDIAN SUGAR DUTIES.

IMPORTANT DEBATE IN PARLIAMENT.

A debate has taken place in the House of Commons on the motion of Sir H. Fowler for disallowing the Indian countervailing duties on sugar. Lord George Hamilton, in the course of a speech opposing the motion, said that he entertained a strong impression that the Currency Commission would be able to submit a report containing propositions for establishing a stable rate of exchange. The motion was rejected by 293 votes to 153.

TROUBLE IN THE BALKANS.

Serious conflicts have taken place on the Serbian frontier between the Serbian troops and Albanians who were engaged in raiding. An exchange of notes is taking place between the Porte and Serbia.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

A DEADLOCK.

The Peace Conference has come to a deadlock on the question of Great Britain's scheme for a system of organized arbitration, owing to Germany's opposition.

THE NIGER COMPANY.

PROPOSAL TO TRANSFER TERRITORY TO THE CROWN.

Shanghai, June 20.

Mr. Balfour has announced that the Government intends to introduce a Bill for taking over the Niger Company's territory.

THE SAMOAN QUESTION.

IMPORTANT DECLARATION IN THE REICHSTAG.

Herr Von Bülow, speaking in the Reichstag, declared that Germany is opposed to any encroachment on the privileges secured by the Samoa Treaty, and that she will demand an indemnity for loss of property and for illegal arrest suffered by her subjects.

AUSTRALIANS' CRICKET TOUR.

Shanghai, June 17.

In the second test match between England and Australia, the first innings of the English team closed for 293 and the Australians made 427. In the second innings England has lost 4 wickets for 94 runs.

Shanghai, June 19, 2.50 p.m.

The Australians have won the second test match at Lords by ten wickets.

Shanghai, June 22.

The Australians have won the match against Oxford University, Past and Present, by ten wickets.

Following is the record of the Australian cricket team to date:—

May 8.—South of England at Crystal Palace; drawn.

May 11.—Essex at Leyton; won by Essex by 126 runs.

May 15.—Surrey at Kennington Oval; won by Australians by an innings and 71 runs.

May 22.—Yorkshire at Sheffield. (Abandoned rainy to rain.)

May 25.—Lancashire at Manchester; won by Australians by an innings and 84 runs.

May 29.—Oxford University at Oxford; drawn.

June 1.—First Test Match at Nottingham; drawn.

June 5.—M.C.C. and Ground at Lord's; won by Australians by 8 wickets.

June 8.—Cambridge; won by Australians by 10 wickets.

June 12.—Yorkshire at Bradford; drawn.

June 15.—Second Test Match at Lords; won by Australians by 10 wickets.

June 19.—Oxford University Past and Present at Portmouth; won by the Australians by 10 wickets.

Record to date: 7 wins, 1 loss, 4 draws, 1 abandoned.

GERMANY IN THE PACIFIC.

The Reichstag has adopted the bill embodying a loan for the purchase of the Carolines. The Minister for Foreign Affairs, Herr von Bülow, speaking with reference to the bill, predicted a splendid future, both political and commercial, for the islands, and expressed the hope that their possession by Germany would lead to increased intimacy with her new neighbours, the United States and Japan. The Minister added that Germany had never entertained any thought of closing the path to the active and talented Japanese.

GREAT BRITAIN'S MILITARY PROGRAMME.

Mr. G. Wyndham, under Secretary of State for War, has introduced a bill in the House of Commons authorizing the Government to raise a sum of four millions sterling for the purpose of arming the defences abroad with heavy guns, and building barracks both at home and abroad. The bill is merely a continuation of the policy inaugurated by the Government in 1897.

THE REPORTED MASSACRE AT FOOCHOW.

MR. PHILLIPS AND PARTY SAFE.

(FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.)

Shanghai, June 20, 7.30 a.m.

The massacre of missionaries near Foochow is untrue. The Shanghai Mercury has received trustworthy reports that Mr. Phillips and his party are safe at Kiening-foo.

FRENCH AFFAIRS.

Saigon, June 16.

M. Poincaré has accepted the task of forming a Cabinet and hopes to succeed.

Saigon, June 17.

M. Poincaré continues his efforts to organize a new Cabinet.

Saigon, June 18.

In consequence of the opposition of the Radicals M. Poincaré has abandoned the attempt to form a Cabinet.

The Tribunal of Correctional Police has condemned six of the persons engaged in the demonstration on the race-course at Auteuil to punishments ranging from fifteen days to three months' imprisonment.

Saigon, June 19.

The President of the French Republic has offered to M. Waldeck-Rousseau the commission to form a new Cabinet. M. Waldeck-Rousseau has made his definite acceptance conditional upon obtaining the cooperation of certain persons, among them M. Casimir-Perier, whom he desires to have as Minister of War.

Saigon, June 20.

M. Casimir-Perier refuses to accept any portfolio.

M. Waldeck-Rousseau, at noon on the 19th instant, declared to the President of the Republic that he hoped to have a Cabinet organized before the evening of that day.

M. Waldeck-Rousseau has failed in his attempt to form a Cabinet, owing to the refusal of M. Krantz and other moderates to accept portfolios.

(M. Krantz was Minister of War in the Dupuy Cabinet.—ED. J.M.)

Saigon, June 22.

The President of the French Republic has summoned M. Bourgeois and invited him to organize a Cabinet. M. Bourgeois was formerly President of Council in a Radical Ministry, and is now French Representative at the Hague, where he received the President's summons. He has refused the task of organizing a Cabinet, but offers his services to the President for the purpose of negotiating with his Radical friends in order to facilitate the forming of a Cabinet.

(FROM THE "CHINA MAIL.")

AMERICA AND THE PHILIPPINES.

Manila, June 12.

General Lawton has scoured the country southward from the Pasig and Laguna de Bay to beyond Paranaque. The general line of troops then advanced to Paranaque. There were few casualties on the American side, but many cases of amputations. The enemy quickly vanished as the troops advanced, making little or no stand.

The Law Courts commenced working to-day, and are giving general satisfaction to the Europeans and natives.

SERIOUS FIRE AT SHANGHAI.

Shanghai, June 12.

Sixty shops in Foochow Road, Shanghai, were destroyed by fire last night. The damage is estimated at over a lakh of dollars. The Hongkong Fire Insurance Company is interested to the extent of $8,000.

ADMIRAL DEWEY AT SINGAPORE.

Singapore, June 12.

The U.S. flagship Olympia, with Admiral Dewey on board, arrived here yesterday. Admiral Dewey has decided to remain at Singapore till Friday.

12 Q x Kt(c) B x Pch

6 Castles B Kt5

13 R x B Q Q8ch(d)

7 P KR3 P KR4!

And Black mates in three more moves.

NOTES.

(a) Black threatened mate in three with 11—R to R8 ch, &c. If 11—Kt to B3, then 11—P takes B ch, 12—R takes P, 12—R to R8 ch, 13—K takes R, 12—Kt takes R ch, winning the White Q next move. White's best defence was 11—P takes P, 11—Kt takes P, 12—R to K sq, 12—R to R ch, 13—K to B2, 13—Q to R5, 14—R takes R, 14—Kt takes R ch, 15—R to Kt sq, 15—B to Q3, 16—B to K3, &c.

(b) The greatest representative of dash and brilliancy is not satisfied with the gain of the hostile Q, which he can win by 11—P takes B ch, 12—R takes P must, 12—B to R8 ch, 13—K takes R, 13—Kt takes R ch, winning the Q next move, but flies at higher game.

(c) Nothing can save the game for White. If 12—B to K3, 12—P takes P ch, 13—B takes P (if 13—R takes P, 13—B takes B), 13—B takes B ch, 14—R takes B, 14—R to B8 ch, &c. 12—Kt Q3 would only prolong the agony, as 12—R to R5, 13—B to Kt5, 13—R takes Q, 14—B takes Q, 14—B takes P ch, 15—Kt takes B, 15—P takes Kt ch, 16—R takes P, 16—Kt takes R, &c.

NOTES.

In an interesting chapter of reminiscences appearing in a recent number of M.A.P., Sir Wyke Baylis, President of the Royal Society of British Artists, says:—"Chess was always a delight to me, and I greatly wonder that so few players are found amongst artists. Ruskin, indeed, is a great lover of the game, as have been many of the most distinguished men of letters. Turning, as it does on such high faculties as imagination, analysis, synthesis, the chess board should be in every studio. In this also, as in every thing else, my father and I were chums, and while still a child beat everyone I knew but himself. Staunton, who was a friend, could give me only the smallest odds; he could not give me the odds of playing without smoking his pipe. I could easily play half a dozen games simultaneously without seeing the board. Now, in the merchant, who has no cares when he leaves his office; for the parson, who has nothing to think about but his next sermon, and doesn't think much about that; for the lawyer or doctor, who learned all they want to know in the days of their youth; for the Parliament man, who has only to stand in the lobby and feel which way the wind whistles through his brains, it is all very well to take life easily, to sing or dance, or go to the theatre, or play tennis, or take a boat up the river. But for the artist who never can lay the ghosts which haunt his brain—who day and night, and night and day, is seeing what no one else can see—visions that he is striving to crystallize into beautiful and permanent shape, who wears his life out in honest work that makes the brain sweat—for the artist I say, some quiet, simple, easy, unobtrusive, refreshing recreation is needed, and I find this in Chess."

PRIZE POETRY.

Some time ago the London Weekly Dispatch offered a prize for the best 16 lines of original verse illustrating the Italian proverb, "It is no time to play chess when the house is on fire." The winning answer (author, Mr. T. H. Bunge, Chelsea) was as follows:—

THE PARLIAMENTARY GAMBIT.

Two prominent players, both skilled, more or less,
Are engaged in the game of political chess.
Each eyes his opponent and marshals his men,
And victory certain appears to his ken.
With eager excitement their partisans sound
Follow every move, and with plaudits abound, Whilst at each cry of "Check" such a tumult they make
That one really would fancy their souls were at stake.
And so, like two desperate gamblers at bay,
They sacrifice all their passion for play,
"Tis vain to expostulate—reason is blind,
The affairs of the nation may drift far behind;
Stagnation, ay, ruin, may come if they will,
Yet the fierce strife of parties is carried on still;
But "a plague of your houses!" the Reds cry in ire,
"Tis no time to play chess when the house is on fire."

IMPORTS.

Raw cotton is a shade weaker, as might be expected in view of holders having to clear for the new crop. In yarns a fair business has been doing at upward rates, and the market has a healthy aspect. Shistings are dull, but the prospects of movement are good. Very little is doing in fancy cottons; fancy woolsens are firmer, in sympathy with an advance of prices at home.

TEA

There is a large stock—8,300 piculs against 4,200 last year—of rather low quality, but business is not active, as buyers are disinclined to give the prices holders demand. Quotations are not materially altered from last week. Settlements so far have been 125,000 piculs against 114,000 piculs last year. The samples of the new crop to hand are of fair cup quality, but the leaf is rather light and chaffy.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, JUNE 17TH, 1899.

DEATHS.

At No. 20, Bluff, on the morning of the 10th inst., SELENA CHARLOTTE, widow of the late Edward Morris of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, aged 57 years.

At Yokohama, on Thursday morning, June 15, GEORGE W. COFFIN, Captain, United States Navy.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

LIEUT. COLONEL PICQUART has been set at liberty provisionally.

THE Sfax, having Dreyfus on board, has sailed from Cayenne.

THE floods near Kobe last week caused a lot of damage to river works and crops.

RUMOUR has it that several Japanese are implicated in the dynamite outrages at Seoul.

THE Central Staff of the Tea Guild on the 15th received a telegram from New York to the effect that the tea market has a downward tendency in view of an increasing import.

A house owned by Mr. Thwaites on Rokkoso, Kobe, was burned down on Wednesday.

HOLLAND and Germany are advising President Kruger to yield to the protests of Great Britain.

A CONFERENCE of Superintendents of Custom Houses is sitting at the Financial Department.

MR. SOWE, Minister for Agriculture and Commerce, will proceed to Paris next year, for the Exhibition.

DURING the week Miss Janet Waldorf has appeared at the Public Hall in several Shakespearean roles.

THE Tokyo Electric Light Company held a general meeting on the 12th and decided to declare a dividend of 7 per cent.

MR. ARTHUR DIOSO made a racy speech in Yokohama on Sunday evening before the Japanese Business Men's Association.

A MAT factory has been established in Hongkong with up-to-date machinery. The idea is to compete with the Japanese product.

THE Tribunal of Correctional Police at Paris has sentenced the Baron de Christiani to four years' imprisonment, for assaulting the President.

VISCOUNT WATANABE, ex-Minister of Finance, has joined the Liberal Party on the recommendation of Baron Suematsu and Mr. Hoashi.

A FIRE broke out on the 10th at 6.45 p.m., at the Yukosha Paper Mill, Kakigara-cho, Tokyo, and destroyed a godown and an engine shed.

THE opening of the new dock at Uraga, on Sunday last, was attended by some 600 people who proceeded from Yokohama on the Kobe Maru.

THE baseball match on Saturday between teams captained respectively by Merriman and Blake resulted in a fine game, the former side winning by one run.

WITH the exception of France and Austria-Hungary, the whole of the new Treaties come into force in Japan on July 17th—the other two on August 4.

It is said that the Toyo Kisen Kaisha intends reducing its freight charges by yen 2 per ton, and opening competition with the other steamship companies.

MARQUIS YAMAGATA, the Premier, is better and on the 13th inst., attended the Cabinet Council. He will remove to his official residence within a few days.

THE construction of the long projected elevated railway connecting Shinsensacho at Shiba and Eirekucho at Kojimachi, will, it is said, be commenced within the current fiscal year.

On the 14th a telegram from London was received in Tokyo to the effect that the Russian Government has issued loan bonds amounting to £2,975,000 at 99 bearing 4 per cent. interest.

MESSRS. HAMADA RENJIRO, Yabu Masahichi, Fujimoto Sohichi, and Yasui Sei will probably be the commissioners despatched to the Paris International Exhibition as representatives of Osaka exhibitors.

On Saturday a fisherman living at Honmoku found two wrecked junks and the corpses of a man about 24 or 25 years old and two boys 15 or 16 years old. The matter was reported to the police, and on further search another body was discovered.

THE rumour of the amalgamation of the Kanagafuchi and Shanghai Cotton Spinning Companies has received some confirmation. The Companies hold their general meetings on the 3rd and 4th proximo.

THE International Committee of Yokohama were entertained at dinner at the Imperial Hotel on Monday by the Japanese Committee which has been engaged in the introductory work for the new state of things.

FAMINE and disease are causing fearful ravages in the Eastern provinces of Russia, while the recent cold weather is ruining crops in the north and centre, and drought is doing the same thing in the south.

SANCTION for the establishment of the Forinosan Bank was granted on the 13th inst. by the Minister of Finance, and the Directors are almost all appointed. The bank notes are being printed and business will begin on the 1st Sept.

On the 13th at 5.30 a.m., a woman was run over on the railway near Tamagawa iron bridge, Kameto village, Tokyo. The victim appeared to be about 20 years of age, and was well dressed. It is believed to be a case of suicide.

A KOREAN despatch dated the 12th inst. announces that Mr. Yuen U Chong, Chief of Police, has been discharged because he failed to arrest the persons concerned in the dynamite outrages. Mr. Nam Myon Son, a military official, has been appointed to the post.

On the night of the 8th instant a medicine dealer named Hanai Takajiro (32), living at Ibaraki Prefecture, murdered his adopted mother named Ayu (44), her nephew Katsujiro (10) and her niece Kune (19), and inflicted serious wounds on her other niece Hatsu (14). The man was arrested.

A MAIL carrier in the employ of the Tokyo Post and Telegraph Office has been arrested on a serious charge. He threw several hundred letters and post cards into the water from Edo bridge, thinking it was too much trouble to deliver them. He has also been guilty of theft.

AN OUBANG OUTANG, two years old, from Borneo, and a snake from Sumatra have been added to the live-stock at the Zoological Garden at Ueno Park. The latter is said to be the largest snake ever brought to Japan. It measures about 17 feet in length and 2½ feet diameter across the middle of the body.

A POLICEMAN named Sugeno Torajiro (24), at the Isezaki Station, Yokohama, has been committed for trial. He was known as an active and intelligent constable, and enjoyed the confidence of the Chief of the station. He seems, however, to have accepted a bribe of 5 yen and some cakes from a gambler whom he was to have arrested.

In a debate on China, in the House of Commons, Mr. St. John Bradrick, Under Secretary to the Foreign Office, stated that the British Government had proposed that in order to hold China to her undertaking not to alienate the provinces bordering on the Yangtze, England will see that a force be stationed upon the Yangtze valley, sufficiently strong to protect the merchants.

AFFAIRS IN FRANCE.

Wednesday, June 14.

Another Ministerial crisis has occurred in France, and the cause appears to be very trivial—some alleged roughness on the part of the police. The telegrams received in Tokyo with reference to the Socialist demonstration at Longchamps conveyed no idea of any serious trouble between the police and the people. On the contrary, they spoke of an absence of incidents and described the few fracas that occurred as quite insignificant. But the Socialists themselves took a different view of the matter, and apparently the Chamber of Deputies endorsed their opinion. It has probably seemed surprising to some people that a socialist demonstration should have been organized in favour of the President. Recent events have shown, however, that both Radicals and Socialists are disposed to approve rather than to oppose the revision of the Dreyfus case, and it thus becomes easy to understand the motive of the Longchamps demonstration as a reply to the insults of which the President had been the victim a few days previously at Auteuil. Since the Dreyfus case passed within the purview of the highest judicial tribunal in France, there have many indications that, in spite of all the excitement and controversy provoked by the affair in some circles, the great mass of the French people are comparatively indifferent to it, and have been content to leave it in sole possession of the political agitators. That disposition is confirmed by the action of the Socialists. Their Longchamps demonstration shows that they have sufficient perspicacity to distinguish between the Army, as a body, and the few officers who, whether by improbity or mismanagement, have shown themselves unworthy of their cloth. When they cheered the President in one breath and the Army in the next, the Socialists entered a strong protest against the folly of supposing that a service is altogether rotten because it includes two or three individuals of the Esterhazy, Henry, and du Paty de Clam genus. The Socialists are not, as a rule, distinguished for tact, but they have certainly scored on the present occasion. Still it is difficult to understand why a Cabinet should fall because the police have been over-zealous in restraining a mob. We may possibly find, when fuller details arrive, that the Cabinet received from the retirement of M. de Freycinet a greater shock than was supposed at the time.

Thursday, June 15.

The sentence passed upon Baron de Christiani by the Tribunal of Correctional Police in France certainly does not err on the side of leniency. According to previous telegrams the Baron did not inflict any injury on President Loubet, but merely struck his hat with a cane. That an assault so trifling should be punished by four years' imprisonment seems out of proportion. Doubtless the idea is to sternly repress all demonstrations calculated to provoke political trouble, but experience does not show that harsh punishments have that effect. However, it is impossible to pronounce any definite opinion on such a subject without full knowledge of the details. When we learn the exact facts submitted to the Police Court in evidence, we may find that the circumstances of the assault were of a nature very different from our present estimate of them.

Friday, June 16.

Reuter this morning confirms the telegram received yesterday by the Legation of France to the effect that Baron de Christiani has been sentenced to 4 years' imprisonment for his assault upon the President of the French Republic at Auteuil. A very similar case was that of Robert Pate, an ex-lieutenant of Hussars, who struck Her Majesty Queen Victoria on the face with a stick as she was leaving the Duke of Cambridge's residence in her carriage on June 27th, 1850. Pate was sentenced to 7 years' transportation, a precedent which goes to show that Christiani has been treated leniently. The passage of half a century, however, has greatly softened the public estimate of these crimes, especially when they take the form of a mere demonstration evidently without any intention of inflicting grave physical injury. The silly French nobleman would have sufficiently expiated his crime by a briefer incarceration, in our opinion.

THE NEW LOAN.

Saturday, June 10.

Reuter informs us this morning that only twelve per cent. of the Japanese loan has been subscribed and the remainder has been underwritten and is quoted at 1½ discount. This issue must be more or less unwelcome to the Japanese, as seeming to reflect on the credit enjoyed by their country in Europe, but it fully justifies Count Mutsu's acceptance of the Syndicate's terms. Had the bonds found subscribers at a price much higher than the figure accepted for them by the Minister of Finance, the latter's judgment might have been called in question. But it must now be admitted that he did as well for his country as there was any possibility of doing.

Monday, June 12.

Tokyo journals persist in referring the unsuccessful result of Japan's new loan to the opposition of the Rothschilds. It is admitted that the time was not very favourable, but no serious difficulty would have been experienced on that account had not the great capitalists employed their immense influence to impede the transaction. As to the motive of their opposition, the general impression is that, having originally sought to finance the transaction themselves, they were chagrined to find that it had been entrusted to a syndicate of banks. But the Chuo Shimbun advances another explanation which it professes to have learned from a secret source. It is that the Russian Government, rendered uneasy by Japan's rapid development, persuaded the Rothschilds to adopt this hostile course. The Chuo adds that such a rumour is not to be lightly credited, but that the fact of the Rothschild's opposition appear to be beyond doubt. We do not, for our own part, see that there would be anything strange in the adoption of such a policy by Russia, for it is not to her advantage that Japan should develop great military strength, and the most effectual way of averting that result is to contrive that the foreign money market shall be closed to the Japanese Government. Yet it is difficult to believe that Russia has interfered. The more likely hypothesis is that the Rothschilds, regarding themselves as the most legitimate channel for the transaction of such loans, have taken steps to demonstrate the hopelessness of the banks to operate independently. Many people will naturally be disposed to refer the result simply and solely to Japan's defective credit. But it has to be remembered that the syndicate of banks did not consider Japan's credit defective, and they are excellent judges. Had not some unlooked-for difficulty presented itself, the forecast of the banks would doubtless have been justified by events.

In connexion with this matter it should be noted that Japanese War Bonds also have depreciated of late. On the 26th of April they were quoted at £103 8s. 8d. and they now stand at £100 3s. 1½d. Only a small part of the difference is due to depreciation, however, the former quotation being cum div. while the latter is ex div. If due allowance be made on that account, the actual fall is only a petty fraction on each bond. Still there has been a fall. To what is it attributable? Naturally the very fact of Japan's coming into the market to obtain further accommodation must exercise a depressing influence on her previous securities. That alone amply suffices, in our opinion, to account for a depreciation so insignificant as one-third of one per cent. It is further evident that if the 5-per-cent. War Bonds are selling at £100 3s. 1½d., the new 4 per-cent. bonds should not fetch more than £80 2s. 6d., other things being equal, whereas sales have been made at £89, approximately. Other things are not equal, however, for the War Bonds become redeemable from 1902 at latest, whereas the new bonds run without redemption until 1909.

Tuesday, June 13.

Many and various are the rumours circulated with reference to the new loan. The latest is contained in the columns of the Asahi. It is to the effect that Messrs. Samuel Samuel & Company have telegraphed to their Yokohama Agent instructing him to submit to the Japanese Government a proposal for opening the market to the new bonds. We do not understand the nature of the proposal, nor did the person who communicated it to the Japanese Government, unless he has the misfortune to be unable to express his meaning in intelligible language. At any rate the story is evidently a mere fragment of the facts, if, indeed, there be any facts.

EDUCATIONAL.

Count Kabayama, the present Minister of Education, is said to be very strongly in favour of a more progressive policy in that branch of administration. It has often been pointed out that the number of high schools and of universities is quite inadequate, the result being that many youths are obliged to be content with an elementary education though their ambition is to acquire larger knowledge. Rumour alleges that Count Kabayama, although his career has been connected altogether with military and naval affairs, would be content to see a check put upon military expansion if the funds thus economised were devoted to educational purposes. Since it became known that the Minister entertained that view, numerous representatives of provincial districts have waited on him, each urging that its own particular locality is in urgent need of a new school. The number and earnestness of these delegations are sufficient proofs of the timeliness of Count Kabayama's proposals. By the Miyagi Prefectural Assembly a still more decided step has been taken, in the form of a decision that Miyagi Prefecture was prepared to put up a sum of 200,000 yen for the establishment of an university in Sendai—the Tohoku (north-eastern) Daigaku. One of Count Kabayama's plans is said to be the abolition of the preparatory military schools. The saving thus effected would suffice to found four or five high schools. Of course there is plenty of room for retrenchment in military matters, but whether the Japanese are prepared to consent to any sacrifice of that kind seems problematical.

MR. DIOSY ON JAPANESE CREDIT.

We wholly disagree with Mr. A. Diosy's remarks on Japanese finance, as set forth in the speech delivered by him to the Business Men's Association of Yokohama. Mr. Diosy's view is that the new Japanese loan has not been readily subscribed by British capitalists because the reputation of the individual Japanese for commercial morality is not good. Further, he draws a picture of a crowd of Englishmen "coming tumbling over each other to offer their surplus capital to China—dying, rotten, paralysed China"—because "China is known to be honest" and because "merchants have long known that they can believe and trust a Chinaman in business." Elsewhere in the same speech Mr. Diosy speaks of "little traps prepared day after day by the Japanese to catch the foreigner," and of the foreigner "getting angry" because of the attempt to ensnare him in these traps "so clumsily made that only a born idiot would be caught by them." We fear that the intelligent Japanese will get angry when he peruses this lecture of Mr. Diosy's, so palpably contrary to facts with which all educated Japanese have long been familiar. The commercial morality of the individual Japanese has nothing, absolutely nothing, to do with the unwillingness of British capitalists to subscribe to a Japanese loan. The Japanese Government is the borrower, and no one can pretend that the history of the Japanese Government's financial transactions with other countries contains a single incident warranting the view taken by Mr. Diosy. If scrupulously honest dealing and punctual discharge of obligations constitute any title to credit, the credit of the Japanese Government should be of the highest class, and is of the highest class. Surely it might have occurred to Mr. Diosy that if a syndicate of London bankers, who know everything there is to be known about the commercial morality of the Japanese merchant, consented to underwrite a Japanese Government loan, the cold reception accorded to the loan by the comparatively ignorant British capitalist must be due to some cause other than the moral laches of the individual Japanese trader. But Mr. Diosy's strange explanation in that context pales before his wonderful picture of the reception accorded to the Chinese loan. Does he not know that the Chinese loan is accompanied by ample security, and that the security is controlled by foreigners—by British subjects, we may almost say? Does he imagine for one instant that if China came into the market as Japan has done, and asked for a loan without offering any security, her proposition would elicit anything but derision? We should welcome any valid proof Mr. Diosy could offer of the disadvantages to which the average Japanese trader's improbity exposes him, but such a statement of the subject as he presented to the Business Men of Yokohama will only make them smile.

The Nichi Nichi Shimbun is at some pains to defend Mr. A. Diosy against charges of sycophancy supposed to have been laid at his door. We do not think that any defence is required, for Mr. Diosy's only accuser, so far as we know, has been the anonymous correspondent of a local newspaper which bears such a character that its applause alone could hurt the reputation of a respectable man. Mr. Diosy has delivered several speeches and addresses since he came to Japan. They have been reproduced, more or less in detail, by our vernacular contemporaries, but it has not seemed to us that any occasion existed for translating them into these columns. We take the opportunity of offering our testimony, however, that Mr. Diosy has had much to say which is not by any means of the sugar-plum variety. He has spoken with wholesome frankness, and has established a fair title to the approval of even that peculiar class of persons who appear to think that the test of honesty is to be condemnatory where the Japanese are concerned. But in truth it is inevitable that the reception given by the Japanese to Mr. Diosy should evoke some unfavourable comments. The altogether extraordinary character of the welcome accorded to him seems to many people to be out of proportion to any obvious reason, and it is asked, with some show of justice, whether the margin of potential hospitality has not been somewhat recklessly trencched upon in a case not warranting any such inroads. We can not deny that we ourselves sympathise, to some extent, with this criticism, but, at the same time, the critics seem to forget that Mr. Diosy is not welcomed in his public character only. During the many years of his remarkable interest in things Japanese he has found innumerable opportunities of befriending men of this nation when they visited London. Hence if the Japanese seize the occasion of his sojourn among them to return these kindnesses with interest, no one has any right to find fault with the fulness of their measure of gratitude. For the rest, Mr. Diosy, as the founder of the Japan Society of London, has placed this country under obligations which we are sincerely glad to see recognised.

"AMERICAN IMPERIALISM."

It was of course inevitable that a section of the American people should denounce the war with the Filipinos. Wherever there are Anglo-Saxons, there will be an Exeter Hall. One might have foretold that the outbreak of war would be followed quickly by an outbreak of brochures condemning the action of the Washington Government. Three of these booklets are now before us. They are called "American Imperialism," "The Cost of a National Crime," and "The Hell of War and its Penalties." They state the case against President McKinley and his advisers forcibly enough, but not convincingly. It is an easy case to present. "We set out," say the writers in effect, "to fight Spain in order to free certain populations from the curse of her misrule. It never was part of our purpose to fight those populations themselves for the sake of bringing them under our sway. Yet that is what we are doing now, and it is a criminal act on our part." Now when the war began and when the probable course of the American Pacific Squadron was matter of conjecture, we expressed the opinion that Admiral Dewey would not go to Manila, and the reason we assigned for thinking so was, as we clearly stated, that the United States would find itself with the Philippines in its hands, and would be perplexed to know what to do with them. It never occurred to us or to any one else at that time that the idea of granting complete independence to the Filipinos could be seriously entertained. Everything known about them indicated their unfitness for such a trust. Yet now America's alleged crime is that she does not leave them a free hand to try the experiment. When it is pointed out to her critics that her responsibility was not limited to freeing these semi-civilized people from Spain's arbitrary government, but that it extended also to providing them with competent machinery for the preservation of law and order, the reply is that the liberated peoples should have been left to work out their own salvation in their own way—"left to fight it out" is the exact form of expression we have heard used in one instance. It is a peculiar contention. A humane man may properly interfere if he observes that the keeper of certain partially tamed animals is treating them with needless severity, but surely no principle of humanity prescribes that he shall thereafter abandon them to their own instincts rather than employ force to bring them under orderly control. The one thing above all others that the critics should endeavour to prove is that the Filipinos are qualified for self-government, yet that is precisely what they give themselves no concern to demonstrate. They talk a great deal about the horrors of war and the fruitless sacrifice of lives and treasure entailed by a contest against such a foe as the Filipinos and under such circumstances as those that exist in Manila. Considerations of that kind appeal strongly to sentiment, but it is somewhat late in the day to adduce them. They might have had some cogency as arguments against the anti-Spanish enterprise at the outset, but they are valueless to show that the enterprise, having once been undertaken, should not be carried to its legitimate conclusion. When we speak of "legitimate conclusion" we do not mean that the Philippines should necessarily be added to America's dominions. What we mean is that America is bound to give them a measure of good government and security against foreign aggression. If the Filipinos will not accept her dictation to the extent of achieving both these aims, they must be coerced into accepting it. Perhaps there was some want of tact or decision in America's manner of conveying to them her own resolve and her estimate of their duty. That is a question apart. But how she can now do otherwise than she is doing, we fail altogether to perceive.

THE KEIJU TETSUDO.

Tuesday, June 13.

The importunity of the widow in the Bible was not a circumstance to the persistence shown by vernacular newspapers in promoting the cause of the Keifu (Sōul-Fusan) Railway. The capital needed for the purpose is 2½ million yen, and according to Mr. Oye Taku, who recently visited Korea, one-fourth of that sum would suffice to commence operations. Hence it appears that Japanese capitalists can not be induced to put up a bagatelle of sixty or seventy thousand pounds on account of a work which everybody agrees in regarding as of the highest political importance. Is that surprising? Private individuals are very seldom willing to subscribe money for political purposes. The English are probably as emotional and as patriotic a race as can be found anywhere, yet statesmen never think of submitting their sentiment and patriotism to tests of a pecuniary nature. An ordinary individual puts money into enterprises out of which he thinks that money can be taken, and leaves the State to devote public funds to political purposes should such a course seem advisable. Railways in China illustrate this fact. Certain journalists recently wrote a great deal about railway concessions being secured by Powers other than England, and denounced the Queen's Ministers for neglecting to push the interests of their nationals. But it presently turned out that British subjects had obtained all the railway concessions sought by them, and that others were simply stepping into the vacant spaces. There would be difficulty, we think, in indicating an English journal which, however fervent its patriotic mood, has ever urged an association of private individuals to undertake the building of a railway or the establishment of a line of steamers for the sake of the country's foreign politics. Enterprises of that kind fall to the duty of the State, not of individuals. The Russian Government, not a Russian company, is building the Siberian Railway and its trans-Manchurian branch. Even had the clearest demonstration been furnished that such a line was quite essential to the interests of Russian imperialism, the work might have waited for centuries had it been abandoned to private initiative. We do not expect to see the Sōul-Fusan Railway undertaken by private capitalists unless its commercial prospects can be proved to warrant the investment.

Wednesday, June 14.

We took occasion to point out, a few days ago, that no practical value seemed to attach to one of the arguments advanced by the promoters of the Sōul-Wiju Railway, namely, that it would subsequently be connected with the Chinese system, and Japan would thus become the half-way house between the Occident and the Far East as well as Australasia. The reasons we stated for that opinion are now put into the mouth of Russia by one of our Tokyo contemporaries. She is made to say that Vladivostok and Talien are to be the sea-ports of her trans-Asian lines, and that she does not at all desire to divert the traffic into Korea. Two other views also are attributed to her. The first is that even if she possessed the Sōul-Wiju road, it would either be destroyed by Japan or inure to the latter's advantage in the event of a struggle between the two countries in the Korean peninsula; the second, that Russia has become convinced of her inability to oppose Japan in Korea. Concerning the former of these contentions, it cuts both ways. The Sōul-Wiju railway would be used by whatever Power could obtain command of it, and that might be Russia as well as Japan. Concerning the second view attributed to Russia, it is obviously a mere conjecture. The fact is that the value of the Sōul-Wiju road for strategic purposes depends chiefly on the hypothesis that the Power possessing it contemplates the defence of the northern frontier of Korea. It could not be of much service to a Power invading Korea from the north, until that Power had completely driven back the defending force. But these contingencies are very remote. At present Korea lies at the mercy of any Power holding the command of the sea.

CHINESE AND MIXED RESIDENCE.

The Japanese are now face to face with the problem, how shall the Chinese be treated after July next when they visit this country? In former days China was a serious stumbling block to Treaty Revision. Not on the score of jurisdiction, however, but on that of tariff. Her treaty with Japan was quite independent of the latter's treaties with other Powers, and did not contain any most favoured-nation clause. Hence the complete opening of the country to the subjects and citizens of Occidental States did not necessitate its opening to Chinese subjects. Japan, at that time, had no intention whatever of allowing the Chinese to have free access to every part of her realm for residential or trading purposes. She preferred to limit them to the open ports, and, so preferring, she was content to leave them under the jurisdiction of their own Consuls. But it was essential that she should bring them under the same tariff as that applied to western countries, for had they alone been exempted from the payment of increased duties, they would have monopolized the whole trade, either as principals, agents, or temporary substitutes, and the new tariff would have become a dead letter. On the other hand, the Chinese Government was not likely to agree to an increased tariff without the same quid pro quo as that given to Western Governments, namely, the opening of the whole country. While Japan was pondering over that difficulty, the war of 1894-5 provided an effectual solution, for one of the results of Japan's victory was that she divested herself of all future treaty obligations towards China. Hence she is now entirely free to choose whether or no the Chinese shall be discriminated against from the 17th of July; whether they alone shall be denied unrestricted access to the interior for trade or residential purposes. Opinions are divided. Some publicists are strongly conservative. They wish to exclude the Chinese, and would confine them strictly to the present settlements. The Fiji Shimpō espouses that cause, but makes an exception in the case of Chinese of the middle and upper class. It does not tell, however, how the differentiation should be effected. Others contend that it would be unneighbourly and unworthy to discriminate against the Chinese; that they should be placed on the same footing as other foreigners, and that it will be possible at any moment to withdraw the privilege of free trade, travel and residence should experience dictate that plan. It is an embarrassing question for the Japanese.

PARALLELS.

The stole and surplice of a Buddhist priest of high rank are made of magnificent brocade. No material could be richer or more beautiful, as many an European or American collector can testify. But these robes are invariably constructed of small pieces sewn together like a patch-work quilt. Curious theories are propounded about such a destructive manner of tailoring. The favourite belief is that, desiring to prevent contingencies like the sale of sacerdotal garments for secular uses, the founders of Buddhism laid down a rule that all costly materials should be snipped into fragments before conversion into stoles or surplices. There is, however, another and a far more attractive hypothesis. It is that since the cupidity of fair participants in religious services would be excited were these grand brocades flaunted before their gaze in broad expanses, the snipping process was devised to guard against the sin of covetousness. We could accept that explanation with greater readiness if brocades such as the priests wear had any part in the garments of Japanese females. But they have not, and the theory consequently fails unless we assume that ladies covet pretty things without reference to their utility. Meanwhile, it is interesting to place in this context the latest doctrine advanced with regard to a custom which prevails in Christian communities; the custom that a woman must cover her head in a place of worship. Probably very few people have ever paused to think why such a usage should exist, and probably those reflecting about it found a sufficient explanation in the "tidying" that a woman has to do after removing her head-dress. There would have to be a looking glass and perhaps packets of hair-pins in the vestry if ladies came into church or chapel without their bonnets. But that is a crude, common-place fancy compared to the one to which vogue has now been given. A woman must cover her head inasmuch as she "has a power on it because of the angels." That is St. Paul's dictum. It requires interpretation. The first chapter of Genesis tells us that "when men began to multiply on the face of the earth and daughters were born unto them, the sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair, and they took them wives of all which they choose." Angels, in short, fell in love with mortal women, begot giants, as the record proceeds to relate, and introduced all kinds of wickedness and evil among the dwellers upon earth. These angels had to be punished, at last, by imprisonment in "a deep, dark hole in a desert," and the human sinners were chastised by means of a deluge. It is to obviate a recurrence of such catastrophes that women have to cover their heads in places of worship. They have to "avoid the danger of tempting the angels." Dr. Paul Carus is believed to be the author of that theory. It may fairly be placed side by side with the doctrine of the patch-work stoles and surplices. Buddhist priest have to guard against exciting the cupidity of their female parishioners by wearing grand garments, and Christian women have to guard against attracting the love of angels by displaying their uncovered heads.

REUTER'S TELEGRAPHIC SERVICE.

From to-day we publish the telegrams of Reuter's Service without taking them from the columns of another newspaper. During several years, as most of our readers probably know, the Japan Mail was the only journal in Yokohama which procured these telegrams. That was before the introduction of the system of press rates. The expense was consequently heavy, and it was out of the question for one newspaper alone to bear the cost of the whole service. Hence at a time when foreign news possessed special interest, our local contemporaries formed a coalition to procure a fuller service, but declined to admit the Japan Mail unless it consented to pay about double as much as the average cost to each of themselves. Rather than submit to such unjust discrimination on the part of journals which for years had copied our telegrams without compensation, we arranged for an independent service of our own. After a year the Yokohama coalition fell to pieces, and, at the same time, press rates came into operation between Japan and Shanghai. We should then, as a matter of course, have procured the telegrams transmitted by Reuter via India, Ceylon, Singapore, Hongkong, and Shanghai. But the Japan Times began its career, and, in conjunction with the Yiji Shimpō, purchased the service. Naturally we should have joined that combination had not our time of publication been such that the Japan Times went into circulation at an earlier hour in the morning, and its telegrams were consequently at the disposal of all journals appearing later in the day. Now, however, the coalition of newspapers subscribing for the service has been enlarged, and we have obtained admission to its ranks, so that our telegrams will in future appear in a special service.

BRIGADIER GENERAL FUNSTON.

The latest addition to America's list of general officers is a man with a remarkable career. Frederic Funston was born in 1866. At 16 he competed for a West Point cadetship and was beaten by a competitor who is now a lieutenant likely to pass soon under Funston's command. At 18 he entered Kansas State University, but "owing to difficulties which he experienced with some of the text books" he did not graduate. At 21, he became city editor of the Fort Smith Tribune. Then he tried life as a conductor on the Santa Fe railway. Then he essayed the business of collecting botanical specimens. Then he made a wonderful journey on foot in the Arctic regions. Then he went to Central Africa, and tried coffee planting unsuccessfully. Then he entered the Cuban army as a private under Garcia, and came out as a Lieut.-Colonel and Chief of Artillery. At last he had found his vocation. Entering the United States' service, he distinguished himself again and again. His favourite feat seems to be crossing rivers under fire with a handful of men and attacking all and sundry that oppose. He has done that three times in the Philippines, and in deference to General MacArthur's strong recommendation the President has nominated him a brigadier-general.

THE KOREAN DYNAMITARDS.

Some excitement seems to have been caused in Tokyo by the news that several Japanese subjects have been arrested in Seoul on suspicion of being implicated in the recent dynamite outrages. Of course the suspicion may turn out to be baseless, but arrests would scarcely have been made without some tangible proof. One of our Tokyo contemporaries appears disposed to regard the affair as the result of the impatience felt by the reform party, which, seeing that all its peaceful efforts have failed, concluded that the wisest course was to resort to violence, and thought that it saw an opportunity in the disturbances now taking place in Chollado. Another conjecture is that the outrage was the work of the relatives of the political refugees now enjoying asylum in Japan and elsewhere. It appears that the Korean Government contemplates resuscitating the old-time law which extends the punishment of a political offender to his parents, wife and children. These unfortunate people, being thus confronted by a terrible fate, sought to delay the threatened legislation by killing or maiming its chief promoters. There is, of course, no clear reason for crediting that hypothesis. As for Pak Yong-ho, in whose house a bomb exploded while in course of preparation, he is now in Japan, and it is difficult to imagine that he can have been privy to such proceedings. There has been nothing whatever to suggest that the Korean refugees in this country are engaged in any plots. They are apparently leading quiet, orderly lives. But it will not surprise us to learn that Japanese adventurers have taken a part in these new troubles. Such complications will always be liable to occur so long as Korea remains outside the pale of progress.

TELEGRAPH CONCESSIONS IN KOREA.

It is alleged by the Shogyo Shimpō that Mr. J. R. Morse has obtained certain concessions for laying lines of telegraph in Korea. The statement is put forward in a very vague manner, but with an evident suggestion that Japanese enterprise should not leave Korea to be exploited entirely by foreigners. We agree with the Shogyo. But since the Japanese do not show themselves very active in utilizing the concessions they possess already, one can not be surprised that they do not seek others. As to Mr. Morse, this allusion to his connexion with lines of telegraph is probably explained by the following "official telegram" which we find in the columns of the Japan Times :—

M. Morse, the American concessionaire, paid 200,000 yen to the Korean Government as stipulated tribute on the profits realized from operating the rich gold mine at Ulsan in P'yong-an-do. He has secured the consent of the Korean Government to his proposals to pay into the Treasury an annual sum of 200,000 yen in place of one quarter of the profits arising from the mine, as formerly agreed in, and that in consideration thereof Korea shall increase the term of the original lease granted him from 15 years to 25 years, and that a branch line of the Sōn-Wiju telegraph system be constructed between Sōn and Ulsan at the expense of the Government. The putting up of wires will shortly be commenced.

A London telegram dated May 14 says that Admiral Dewey, upon his return to America, will act as President McKinley's adviser on naval and colonial affairs.

MISSIONARIES AND PREACHING.

It seems to us that no one reading Mr. Frank Muller's letter, which we publish elsewhere, could clearly recognise the original subject of discussion, or form any definite idea of the opinions expressed by us and now traversed by our correspondent. Mr. Muller makes us say, "Not one missionary can lecture about ethics or morals in such a way as to dignify the subject." We certainly did use those words, but when separated from their context they convey a meaning very different from the sense in which we employed them. The whole point under consideration was the possibility of any foreigner's acquiring such command of the Japanese language as would enable him to lecture or preach eloquently in that language on theological, ethical, or moral subjects. Mr. Muller of course intends the linguistic qualification to be understood, but, by omitting any explicit statement of it, he places us in the position of denying the general competence of missionaries to do the very thing to the doing of which they devote their lives and abilities. We were not guilty of any such shallow impertinence, and, further, we really must protest against being represented as saying that "no missionary can lecture acceptably on these matters." It is one thing to lecture "acceptably"; another, and a very different thing, to lecture eloquently, and with such a choice of phraseology and command of idiom as dignify the subject. We wish to direct our correspondent's attention to the fact that our article was entirely a consideration of the evangelizing competence of missionaries using the Japanese language in Japan as compared with the competence of the same men using an Occidental language in an Occidental country. Nothing could have been plainer than our exposé of the subject. "It has always seemed to us," we wrote, "that this question narrows itself to an easily stated issue: are foreign missionaries competent to carry on evangelization in Japanese with any prospect of success proportionate to that which men of equal endowments might expect to achieve in an Occidental country?" We answered in the negative, and our answer was based solely on the linguistic difficulty. Our conviction is that, as a rule to which there has not yet been any exception, no foreigner commencing the study of Japanese after he has emerged from his teens, can master it so thoroughly as to use it with full effect for purposes of preaching. But that does not involve the much larger assertion that "no missionary can lecture acceptably on ethics or morals." He may lecture very acceptably yet without reaching the standard of success which can be attained only by the gift of really eloquent speech. The point we make is this—and we may be excused for setting it forth with greater clearness—that since the highest measure of success in the field of preaching and lecturing does not appear to be within reach of foreign missionaries in Japan, the average missionary would do well to devote a part of his energies to a field where he undoubtedly does achieve much success, the field of education, education being, in our opinion, one of the most effective means of propagating Christian morality, and the prime object of the missionary being to make good men whatever form of creed they profess. The original problem was whether missionaries are justified in devoting any part of their labour to education, and we offered to its solution our contribution of experience and inquiry. Assuredly we never intended to suggest that foreign missionaries should desist from preaching and lecturing and devote themselves wholly to education, and we are much surprised that such an interpretation should have been put upon our words. We repeat our repudiation of any intention to assert that the foreign missionary in Japan can not lecture in the Japanese language, and can not preach in the Japanese language, so as to be acceptable to his hearers. He can do both, but not so well, we think, as to justify him in relying solely on either.

THE LATE ARCHDEACON WARREN.

The news of Archdeacon Warren's death must have profoundly grieved many people. It was a shockingly sudden affair. The venerable gentleman slipped and fell on his head while inspecting the underground storey of a house at Fuku-yama. The accident did not suggest serious consequences, as the Archdeacon was able to walk home. But on reaching his residence he complained of pain in his head, and, lying down, lapsed into a state of unconsciousness from which he never rallied. Medical assistance, both foreign and Japanese, was speedily procured, but proved unavailing. Archdeacon Warren was one of the oldest members of the missionary body in Japan, and his decease will be a heavy loss to the cause he served so faithfully. Possessed of great energy and of remarkable linguistic ability and powers of organization, he devoted himself, for more than a quarter of a century, with unflagging earnestness and zeal, to missionary work in connection with the Church Missionary Society. No one who was brought into contact with the Archdeacon could fail to recognize in him in many ways a remarkable man. His conversational and other social powers made him ever a kindly and charming companion. But it was the work of the Church that called out his ripest and fullest powers. Quick in decision, clear in judgment, ready in debate, and possessing an almost unrivalled knowledge of the colloquial, he exercised a unique influence in the counsels of the Japanese Church. He leaves a large circle of friends and relatives to mourn their sudden loss, to whom we desire to offer our sincere condolences.

WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY.

Wireless telegraphy is no longer a theoretical phantasy. It has been employed with complete success to bridge the English Channel. A vertical steel mast on either side of the water is the main feature of the apparatus. The condition of the atmosphere or the state of the intervening sea does not in any way effect the transmission of the messages. But there is one difficulty—the broadcasting of the telegrams. That has two results in practice: first, the signals could be read by any one employing apparatus to tap them; secondly, interference of systems would result. The latter objection is illustrated by the fact that when signals are being sent from the South Foreland to France, they affect the receiver on board the Goodwin lightship. Thus if the messages transmitted between two points are continuous, all intervening and neighbouring places are paralysed, and, of course, that trouble increases in proportion to the power of the system. It is calculated that a system powerful enough to send signals from England to America would interfere with the working of all similar systems in Europe. There seems, also, to be a mechanical limit to the usefulness of the invention. There must be direct atmospheric connexion between the two signalling stations. Thus, where seas intervene, the terminal steel masts must be high enough to correct the curvature of the earth's surface. It results that in order to telegraph from London to New York, the masts would have to be over a thousand miles high. Evidently, therefore, Marconi is still on the threshold only of his discovery.

ENGLAND AND THE TRANSVAAL.

Recent intelligence by mail had more or less prepared us for the telegraphic news which we publish this morning on the authority of The Times, namely, that Germany and Holland are bringing pressure to bear on President Kruger to induce him to yield to England's demands. The German Emperor's celebrated telegram is not easy to reconcile with the attitude now attributed to him. But the world long ago recognized that His Majesty's message of congratulation to the stout old Boer was not really prompted by the sinister motive attributed to its writer in the first moment of public excitement, and, besides, the relations between Germany and England are different now from what they were then. If Great Britain to-day considered it necessary to bring the Boers finally to a submissive mood, she could undertake the task without fear of being harrassed in the rear by either Germany, or France, or Russia. The Boers would doubtless make a brave fight, but they could not hope to hold their ground long, and Kruger must know very well that by a large number of Englishmen the prospect of wiping out the disgrace of Majuba Hill would be gladly welcomed. Holland's action in the matter is also gratifying; the more so in view of the fact that, on the eve of the meeting of President Kruger and Sir Alfred Milner, an attempt was made both in Vienna and in Amsterdam to prejudice the Dutch against England by declaring that, were the strength of the Boers broken, Great Britain would next proceed to appropriate the Netherlands colonies. Kruger will probably yield, unless he relies blindly on assistance from the Orange Free State and on his ample stock of breech-loaders. But that the Boers will have to be fought sooner or later can not be doubted, and the sooner the better in our opinion.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

The Nishi-nari Railway Company of Osaka has increased its capital from 350,000 yen to 3½ millions, and has decided to extend its line to Sakura-jima and to add 200 cars to its rolling stock. Apparently the Company is determined to forestall all competition.

It appears that Italy has decided to admit Japanese habutaye duty free. The fabric is not manufactured by her own people, and she naturally thinks that instead of buying habutaye dyed in France, her better plan is to encourage its direct import by abolishing all duty. Such is the intelligence sent by the Japanese Consul at Lyons.

We learn from the Yomiuri Shimbun that the degree of Doctor of Letters (Bungaku Hakushi) has been conferred by the Imperial Japanese University on Dr. Carl Florenz, Professor of German Language and Literature and Comparative Philosophy in the Imperial University. This is the first instance, we believe, of a Japanese University degree being conferred on a foreigner.

The War Office, we learn, has now concluded the history of the China-Japan War, after a long interval of preparation. The narrative of military and naval events was finished some time ago, but the political story, including the interference of the Three Powers, involved additional labour. We trust that this work will be translated into English. There does not exist any really good account of the war in any foreign language.

Some months ago, the Emperor of China sent to the Emperor of Japan the Grand Cordon of the Dragon and Jewel. The dragon was in massive gold, set with 80 diamonds and with several magnificent pearls. The same decoration was sent to the Empress of Japan, there being no special Order for women in China. The Sovereign of this country has now sent to the Chinese Emperor the Grand Cordon of the Chrysanthemum, and to the Empress Dowager the Grand Cordon of the Crown (Hökwan).

It will be remembered that the Diet, last session, passed two laws presented by the Department of Communications, a Law of Shipping (Sempaku-ho) and a Law of Ship's Crews (Senin-ho). These laws contained clauses to the effect that the detailed regulations for their enforcement should be subsequently compiled by the Minister of Communications. That provision has now been complied with, and the regulations appeared in the Official Gazette of the 12th instant.

The Constitutionalists (Liberals) held a grand meeting in Kyoto on the 8th instant, by way of counter-demonstration to the meeting recently organized by the Progressists in the same city. Newspaper reports estimate the number of those attending as 3,500. There is nothing special to record about the affair. The principal resolution passed was that, Japan being now in a transition stage from the old to the new, the Party's policy must be positive. That, of course, amounts to denouncing the retrenchment policy of the Progressists.

The journalistic campaign against the peers continues. A very drastic course is recommended by the Jimmin, namely, that in every case a title should be reduced by one degree in the second generation and should lapse altogether in the third. Thus the son of a Marquis would be a Count, and the latter's son would be plain "Mr." That is a pretty radical suggestion. There is no idea, however, of suppressing titles altogether. Conspicuous public merit should still be rewarded with patents of nobility, but the patent would be held for two generations only.

Tokyo newspapers speak very enthusiastically about the action taken by British Columbia in refraining from imposing any veto on Japanese immigrants. The Asahi regards the act as an evidence of the spirit of justice by which the British nation is animated, and expresses an earnest wish that Japan's friends, the Americans, would be equally liberal. The Yomiuri goes farther. It sees in the incident a proof that its own long cherished hope of an Anglo-American-Japanese commercial alliance has entered the region of practical politics.

Several vernacular newspapers have alluded of late to the dimensions of next year's Budget, and all concur in alleging that it will show an increase of some 12 million yen as compared with the figures for the current year. The Departments of Home Affairs and of Education are said to be chiefly responsible for the increase, and it is added that, if their demands are complied with, the transfer of the prison expenditures to the charges of the Treasury will have to be postponed. These assertions seem to us rather premature. Nothing can yet be predicted with any certainty about the form which the Budget will assume before it finally leaves the hands of the Minister of State for Finance.

Hitherto all writers commenting on the fact that Japan does not enjoy in foreign countries financial credit proportionate to her competence, have attributed her misfortune to the suicidal policy of political parties, which by wrangling about paltry increases of taxation and declaring the burden of the people to be intolerably heavy, have succeeded in creating an entirely false impression abroad. The Nippon, which is nothing if not original, insists that the fault does not lie with the people or with politicians, but must be laid at the door of the Government, which resorts freely to bribery and corruption, and thus brings the country into disrepute. That is an idea worthy of the Nippon.

An extraordinary story is published in the columns of the Nichi Nichi Shimbun. The principal figure in it is a Mr. Watanabe Takejima, who has been serving as a Japanese police constable in Chemulpo for many years. He is said to be quite familiar with the Korean language, and to have married a Korean wife. Two or three months ago, so the tale goes, the Emperor of Korea sent for him and asked him to assassinate a certain An, now residing in Japan, promising to give him a reward of 2,000 yen if he succeeded, and threatening to kill his wife if he declined. Watanabe is said to have scouted the proposition in a manner becoming a virtuous man. If he desires to maintain that character, he had better deny the canard at once.

There has been much vague talk lately about schemes of educational expansion entertained by the Authorities. The rumour is now assuming more definite outlines. It takes the form of "Count Kabayama's eight-year programme." The Minister of Education, we are told, has drafted a plan the principal features of which are that by the year 1907 the organization of the Tokyo and Kyoto Universities shall be completed, and two new universities shall be established, one in Kiushiu and one in the north-east. The exact locations of these new universities are not yet fixed, but it is believed that they will be in Sendai and Kumamoto. Each of the four universities will be fed by three high schools, which means that the total number of high schools will be doubled: instead of being only six, as at present, it will be twelve.

The Official Gazette of the 12th instant contains a convention signed by their excellencies Viscount Aoki and Sir Ernest Satow, as representatives respectively of Japan and Great Britain, and dated May 3rd. It relates to cases which may happen to be sub judice in Her Majesty's Consular Courts in Japan at the time when, in consequence of the Revised Treaties going into operation, the jurisdiction of such Courts ceases. The Convention provides that all cases which have not been finally disposed of on the date of the Anglo-Japanese Revised Treaty's becoming operative, shall remain under British Consular Jurisdiction until they have been carried to a conclusion. This agreement is an obvious and necessary precaution.

The difficulty raised by the German Representative at the Peace Conference seems perfectly reasonable. The civilization of the world has not advanced sufficiently to permit the use of such machines as permanent tribunals of arbitration, and Germany's peculiar circumstances require her to be doubly cautious in pledging herself to any such arrangement. It is not difficult to imagine two countries which have so much in common as England and America agreeing to submit all their disputes hereafter to an arbitration tribunal. Yet if not even England and America could agree in that sense, is it not a little extravagant to propose anything of the kind for the agreement of all nations?

In the Shogyo Shimpō we find it stated that according to a telegram received in Tokyo, the Russian Railway Loan amounts to £2,975,000; the rate of interest is 4 per cent., and the issue price is £99. The prospectus was published on the 9th instant. That is considerably better than the price obtained by Japan—if Russian gets what she seeks—but it seems to us that the Japanese transaction was distinctly favourable when the facts are taken into account that no Oriental State had ever before entered the European market as a borrower on a large scale without security, and that Japan reserved to herself the right of redeeming the bonds in quantities determined solely by her own convenience during fifty years subsequent to 1908. She will be able, in short, to convert the debt should the market be adapted for such a transaction.

According to vernacular journals, the struggle between Number 89 of this Settlement and the Guild of Japanese Druggists is becoming sharper every day. A conference was recently held, but no plan of agreement could be devised, and the result was such as attends all failures of that kind, namely, increased bitterness on both sides. The Guild is said to have extended its field of operations to Nagoya and Osaka, and to have come to a determination to give short shrift to all weak-kneed elements. As for the Japanese supporters of the foreign firm, they are credited with the intention of buying up the moderates belonging to the Guild, employing for that purpose certain monies which they expect to receive from the American Iodine Syndicate. The Yomiuri Shimbun predicts that the "blood-showering phase of the struggle" is not far distant, a form of speech which is, of course, to be taken figuratively.

A great deal of unnecessary interest has been excited about the loss of five thousand yen from the treasury of the Bank of Japan. The money had not emerged officially from the Issue Department when some nimble-fingered individual appropriated it to his own uses. There were five parcels, each consisting of a hundred 10-yen notes. The theft was suspected as long ago as April 28th, but could not be definitely asserted until May 4th, after a special examination had been made. Of course it was not immediately noised abroad, since that would have impaired the prospect of detection. Meanwhile, forty of the notes have come back to the Bank in the ordinary routine of business, and as they were in one case accompanied by the original wrapper, it became possible to determine that the theft had preceded the appointment of the present head of the Issue Department. The Fiji Shimpō actually devotes a leading article to it. But we do not see that there is any special cause for surprise or interest.

Apparently the Tokyo Tram Company and the Shinagawa Company are to be amalgamated. Such was the decision come to at a general meeting of the former Company held on the 10th inst. The financial arrangement is that the Tokyo Company pays a sum of ten thousand yen to the Shinagawa Company and also hands to the latter a thousand shares. To obtain these shares as well as funds for the above payment and also for the improvement and working capital of the new line, the Tokyo Company adds 4,000 shares to its stock, of which shares it gives 1,000 to the Shinagawa shareholders and sells three thousand to its own shareholders for 200,000 yen. We regret to have to record this arrangement, for the Tokyo tramways, as they are at present managed, must be called a public nuisance. Their directors seem to have no sense of responsibility to the citizens, and the officials of the Municipality appear to think that, when once a company has been allowed to lay trams, it has a right to convert the streets into quagmires if it be so minded.

DEATH OF CAPT. COFFIN, U.S.N.

A Naval veteran of the United States passed away, in the person of Capt. G. W. Coffin, on Thursday at his residence, No. 45-A Bluff. The deceased was last in command, in these waters, of the U.S.S. Charleston, but just at the out-break of the war with Spain was invalided home, owing to heart trouble. On reaching the States he was appointed to a post on the Pacific Coast, but the rapid progress of the disease compelled him to resign, and Capt. Coffin returned to Yokohama only to die. He had a distinguished career in the Navy, and there is no doubt he was heart-broken when he left it, and fretting gradually brought about his death. Mrs. Anderson, wife of the Surgeon-in-charge of the U.S. Naval Hospital, Yokohama, was a daughter of the deceased.

On Tuesday evening an entertainment was given by Messrs. Bowden Brothers, in honour of the visit to this country of Mr. Herbert Bowden, to a number of Japanese who have business connections with them, at the Sanomoro, Otamachi, Yokohama.

THE NEW TREATIES.

SEVERAL questions have been raised lately about the Revised Treaties. The first relates to the date of their operation. That date was originally intended to be July 17th, and was so entered in the British and other treaties. But owing to a misunderstanding, the negotiators of the French Treaty fixed on August 4th. An obviously embarrassing situation is thus created. It is scarcely possible to discriminate between French citizens and the subjects and citizens of other States in such a matter as the opening of the country. The police can not require a Frenchman to carry a passport while other nationals are allowed to dispense with any such instrument. Yet that differentiation would have to be made if the settlement system were abolished in the case of Occidentals generally on July 17th, but retained in the case of French citizens until August 4th. The easiest way out of the difficulty would be to postpone the operation of all the Revised Treaties until August 4th, and doubtless the Japanese Government would have adopted that course had option been possible. But in point of fact, there is no room for choice, inasmuch as the date for putting some of the new treaties into force is absolutely fixed. In the case of the United States' Treaty, for example, the XIXth Articles says:—"This Treaty shall go into operation on the 17th of July, 1899, and shall remain in force for the period of 12 years from that date." Under these circumstances the Government has decided that all the treaties shall go into force from July 17th with the exception of the French and the Austro-Hungarian, which will become operative from August 4th. An Imperial Ordinance in that sense was promulgated on the 15th instant in the Official Gazette. The arrangement is decidedly awkward, for the reasons stated above, but there is no alternative. The Austro-Hungarian Government's position is special. In a diplomatic note addressed by M. GOLUCHOWSKI to Mr. TAKAHIRA, the Japanese Representative in Vienna, the former expressly stipulated that, even after the 17th of July, should any Power retain the privilege of Consular Jurisdiction, the same privilege should be secured to Austria-Hungary. Mr. TAKAHIRA assented, on behalf of Japan, and apparently Austria-Hungary has been unwilling to modify the stipulation. It is evident that if Austro-Hungarian subjects or French citizens choose to travel or trade in the interior without passports after July 17th, there will be no feasible means to prevent their doing so, whereas if they commit any offence in the interior, it will be necessary to conduct them to the nearest open port for trial by their own Consular Authorities. There is very little probability of such incidents occurring in the short interval of 18 days between July 17th and August 4th, but it is unfortunate that this complication should mar the inauguration of the new system. We may add that, so far as the question of taxation is concerned, either date would have served equally well, for it is probable that the foreign residents will not be held liable to pay any taxes during the first half of the present fiscal year, namely, until October 1st.

Another question has to do with the registration of business carried on by foreigners. It has been suggested that as the law requires that the registration of a business shall precede its practical inauguration by a certain interval, and as registration can not be effected by foreigners until they have actually passed under Japanese jurisdiction, the merchants in the Settlements may find themselves obliged to put up their shutters during the time required for obtaining a duly recognised status according to Japanese law. There should not be any necessity for saying that no solid grounds for uneasiness exist on that score. The Japanese Government is understood to be fully alive to the situation, and to have arranged that due notice, accompanied by clear and sufficient instructions, shall be conveyed to the foreign communities by the local authorities so as to obviate all chance of inconvenience.

Passing from these general questions to special points, we observe that doubts are again expressed about foreigners practising as barristers or physicians. It is asserted, as to the former, that the services of a foreign legal adviser will not be available to foreign business men in their commercial disagreements. A somewhat false impression may be conveyed by that assertion. It is true that foreign barristers will not have a recognised status in Japanese law courts. They will not be entitled to appear there and plead. That restriction is not peculiar to Japan, of course: it exists also in Western countries. But the services of foreign legal advisers will be just as available as ever for purposes of chamber practice, and, although they can not themselves discharge the duties of counsel in court, they can be present in court to watch the interests of a client and to advise his counsel. Such an association as that already existing between an eminent English barrister of this Settlement and a well-known Japanese colleague will meet all the requirements of any case. As to physicians, it is altogether a mistake to allege that foreigners will not be allowed to practice. Arrangements have already been made for the recognition of foreign diplomas. Medical men who are actually exercising their profession at the time when the Treaties go into operation will experience no difficulty whatever, and those that come here subsequently, armed with proper credentials of competence, can at once obtain Japanese licenses.

COST OF JAPAN'S WAR WITH CHINA.

THE final accounts of the expenditure incurred by Japan on account of her war with China have now been published by the Treasury. They cover the period from June 1st, 1894, to March 31st, 1896, an interval of 22 months, though the actual fighting with China came to an end in April, 1895. Five military expeditions were conducted between June, 1894, and April, 1895; namely, first the expedition which drove the Chinese from Korea, and, marching through that country, crossed the Yalu and moved northward in the direction of Mukden; secondly, the expedition that struck westward from the Yalu and, reaching the Liao River, ultimately attacked Newchwang; thirdly, the expedition that crossed to the Liaotung peninsula and captured Talien and Port Arthur; fourthly, the expedition that marched up the Liaotung peninsula, and finally formed a junction with the Manchurian army (second expedition) at Newchwang; and fifthly, the expedition which sailed from Port Arthur to Shantung and captured Wei-hai-wei. While these various military operations were in progress, the ships of the Navy were constantly at sea, convoying transports, watching the enemies' fleet, fighting at the Yalu and at Wei-hai-wei, and blockading ports. After the conclusion of peace with China the subjugation of Formosa had to be undertaken, and for that reason, as well as for convenience of account, the financial statement is made to extend to the end of the 28th fiscal year, or March 31st, 1896. When the war commenced, the Government had recourse, first to the Second Reserve Fund; then to the accumulations of surplus revenue; then to domestic loans, and ultimately to the Chinese Indemnity. The total expenditures incurred in connexion with the military operations were 164,520,371 yen, and those in connexion with naval operations, 35,935,137 yen, making an aggregate of 200,475,508 yen.

With regard to revenue, the sources were these:—

	Yen.
Take from accumulations of surplus revenue	23,439,086
Voluntary Contributions ..	2,949,546
Domestic Loans	116,804,926
Interest Income	1,510,305
Revenue from occupied territory.....	624,445
Revenue from Formosa and the Pescadores	935,679
Taken from the Indemnity	78,957,165
Total	225,230,127

It thus appears that the revenue raised exceeded the actual expenditure by 24,754,619 yen, which sum was returned to the Treasury and drafted into the ordinary Budgets.

The various items of Military expenditure were these:—

	Yen.
Salaries and Allowances.....	15,393,744
Provisions	24,875,825
Clothing	20,836,651
Arms and Ammunition	11,213,766
Horses	7,782,896
Outlays on account of sick and wounded	1,445,021
Camp Equipage	866,166
Various purchases	3,963,587
Posts and Telegraphs.....	553,304
Transport	33,953,108
Travelling Expenses	3,194,086
Wages of hired men	18,384,435
Fortifications	5,632,382
Sundry Expenditures	2,058,508
Secret service	369,283
Chartering steamers	3,697,866
Cost of civil administration in occupied districts	200,244
Submarine cable from Osumi to Formosa.....	1,247,769
Light-houses and buoys in Formosa...	128,983
Religious service for the dead	10,000
Expenses of Formosan Government.	2,420,045
Rewards	6,226,490
Medals	61,377
Military water-works at Hiroshima...	10,820
Formosan railways and harbours (surveys)	7,925
Total	164,520,371

The Naval outlays were:—

	Yen.
Salaries and Allowances	1,694,865
Provisions	1,179,302
Clothing	461,237
Necessary articles for war-vessels ..	4,176,712
Arms, ammunition, and torpedoes ...	10,079,751
Expenditures of ships	12,825,830
Hospital Expenses	46,153
Expenses on account of prisoners ...	138
Office Expenses	228,243
Travelling Expenses	256,049
Miscellaneous Salaries	310,881
Transport	1,282,913
Repairs	806,134
Sundries	21,275
Secret Service	106,880
Special Supplies	233,995
Armament construction	1,260,749
Surveys of coasts (for light-houses) ...	12,009
Rewards	955,704
Medals	16,104
Compilation of Records.....	213
Total	35,955,137

It is worthy of special note that the total outlay in both services on account of arms and ammunition was only 21½ million yen, or a little over 2 millions pounds sterling. Thus the actual business of fighting involved only 10 per cent. of the total outlay on account of the war. This figure shows, at all events, that the Japanese forces did not waste ammunition. On rewards, too, the expenditure was very small—only 7,182,194 yen, or about seven hundred thousand pounds sterling.

Naturally the Japanese Government endeavoured to avoid hard-money payments as much as possible, and to use only paper and copper. How far it succeeded the following table shows:—

	Yen.
Payments in paper and copper coins	183,981,744
Payments in 1 yen silver pieces	11,051,481
Payments in silver subsidiary coins...	2,611,028
Payments in silver ingots	300,000
Payments in Mexican dollars	850,000
Payments in sycee	1,099,293
Payments in military cheques	104

On the whole, the specie reserves of the Treasury were reduced by only 3,600,000 yen, approximately. In Korea payments were greatly facilitated by the fact that Japanese bank notes and coins were freely current there before the war. But as the troops penetrated into the remote districts of the peninsula, some difficulty was experienced, and an arrangement was made with the Soul Government for the issue of notes redeemable in the copper cash of the country. It does not appear, however, that the plan was actually put into practice. With regard to the Liaotung Peninsula, the authorities made provision of Mexican dollars and sycee, as well as of ingots such as are employed by the people of that region; but it was found that, as the troops advanced, Japanese notes and coins were received by the people without hesitation, and that the Japanese one rin pieces circulated at par with Chinese cash. In Formosa and the Pescadores the people at first showed great dislike of paper money, and, if they received silver coins, melted them down at once. The Japanese authorities were soon able to correct that tendency. As for the military cheques mentioned in the table, they were intended for temporary use, with the idea of avoiding any inflation of the volume of convertible notes. Their denominations were in taels and mace, but no occasion for their employment on any considerable scale presented itself.

The story of the domestic loans floated for the purposes of the war presents some interesting features. The first loan, issued in August, 1894, was fixed at 30 million yen, a sum such as never before had been demanded from the people. Considerable anxiety was felt about the result, but the Government decided not to give a higher rate of interest than 5 per cent., or to take less for the bonds than their face value. The result exceeded the most sanguine expectations. The subscribers numbered 119,015 and their subscriptions aggregated 77 million yen, or more than double the amount required. The highest offer was 142.44 yen for a 100-yen bond, and the average price obtained was 100.561 yen. The second loan of 50 million yen followed the first by an interval of only three months, and the Minister of Finance deemed it advisable to offer the bonds at 95 yen, while keeping the rate of interest at 5 per cent. This call evoked a response from 173,051 subscribers, representing a total of over 90 million yen. The highest price offered was 120 yen, and the average for the 50 millions was 95.632 yen. Not until March, 1896, was the third instalment of 35 million yen issued. Twenty-five millions of it were taken up at par by the Finance Department, the funds used for the purpose being the deposits of the official savings banks; and the remaining 10 millions, being placed on the open market at par, were subscribed for at an average of 100.122 yen, the highest price offered being 103 yen. In addition to the above, bonds to the aggregate face value of 4,047,500 yen were issued as rewards.

So far as direct outlays were concerned, Japan obtained from her vanquished adversary 100 million yen more than she had spent. But, of course, her indirect losses aggregated a much larger sum than her actual expenditures.

THE STATUS OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION IN JAPAN.

CHRISTIANITY has hitherto received no official recognition of any kind in Japan, nor has it been subjected to any official supervision. It has been left severely alone. Such is not the case with Buddhism. Although not in any sense the State religion in Japan, Buddhism has a certain connexion with officialdom. It comes under the operation of a system called Kancho Seido. The same is true of Shinto. Kancho means the chief prelate of a sect, and Kancho Seido may perhaps be translated "episcopal system." The powers of a Kancho are considerable. He is competent to appoint and remove the incumbents of all temples or shrines belonging to the sect over which he presides, and to promote or reduce the ministers. Every Kancho ranks as a Chokunin, and is entitled to address the Minister of Home Affairs direct. He also supervises affairs relating to the religious property of the Sect, and in doing so is required to follow certain regulations which were promulgated in 1884. He is elected by the sect in accordance with its own methods, but his appointment has to receive the recognition of the Minister of State for Home Affairs. It is not essential, of course, that every sect should have a Kancho of its own. Several sects may combine to place themselves under the same Kancho. But it is necessary that no sect should be entirely beyond the pale of such a prelate's authority. We must explain, however, that in using the term "necessary" we do not mean to imply that the law invests the Minister of Home Affairs with authority to compel a sect to nominate a Kancho. The law, indeed—which exists in the form of a notification of the Dajō-kwan (former name for the Cabinet)—merely lays down certain principles which, not being accompanied by punitive provisions, have no force greater than that of exhortations. For example, sects are told that they ought not to split up lightly into factions, or to engage in disputes with each other; but the only penalty that the Home Department can impose for violations of these rules seems to be the withdrawal of its official recognition from the Kancho. In the same way—not mandatory but advisory—the Kancho is required to report certain things for the approval of the Minister of Home Affairs. Thus, in the case of a Shinto division, reports are asked for with regard to rules of religion, status, and appellations of Ministers, and their promotion or reduction; while in the case of a Buddhist sect, the reports are to deal with the organization of the sect, the temple rules, matters relating to the status, nomenclature, and appointment of prelates, and priests, as well as the system of preserving old documents, temple treasures, and sacred utensils. These reports are addressed to the Bureau of Temples and Shrines (Shaji-kyoku) in the Home Department, and it appears that the Bureau is prepared to render its assistance in settling any disputes, or adjudicating any questions, that may be submitted to it. Evidently the system is intended to establish between the Administration and Religion a relation just sufficient to open a practical route for the exercise of the former's order-preserving and morality-guarding duty. Now the question is, shall Christianity be brought under the same system from the 17th of July? Evidently if it be necessary to apply such a system to Buddhism and Shintō in the interests of public peace, order, and morality, there is no reason why Christianity should be exempt. On the other hand, if Christianity be brought within the purview of the Dajō-kwan notification of 1884, it is definitely placed on the same footing as Buddhism and Shintō vis-à-vis the State. There are still many Japanese to whom such a proceeding would be very unwelcome. Nor can we wonder at it. The reception that public opinion in England would give to any such proposition—mutatis mutandis—is not difficult to deceive. Moreover, the question happens to be complicated, just at present, by the attitude of the new political party (Kōken-tō) towards religion. They are undoubtedly making the State recognition of Buddhism a principal plank in their platform, and they have enlisted the strong coöperation of the Hongwan-ji priests, who are distinctly a power in the nation. We do not detect the least shadow of probability that the Government will yield to such a demand, but to extend the Kancho system to Christianity would be a direct slap in the face to the new Party. Still the Government does not appear to have any feasible alternative. It is absurd to ignore Christianity any longer. It has won for itself a place which can not be overlooked. Of course it is possible to abolish all official contact with religion, and to leave the professors of every creed to manage their own affairs without administrative supervision of any kind. But that plan has obvious disadvantages. The Government is said to have decided that the Kancho Seido should be extended to Christianity after the abolition of Consular Jurisdiction—a wise decision, we venture to think.

MR. ARTHUR DIOSY AT YOKOHAMA.

AN ADDRESS TO BUSINESS MEN.

On Sunday evening the Business Men's Association of Yokohama—which comprises such representatives as Messrs. Ippei Wakao, H. Bekky, Otani Kabei, Hayashi Tamio, K. Kimura, N. Tanabe, etc.—entertained Mr. Arthur Diosy at the Chitose-ro, Sumiyoshicho. Among others present were Mr. H. A. C. Bonar, H.B.M. Consul at Yokohama; Mr. Asada, Governor of Kanagawa Ken; and Mr. Umeda, Mayor of Yokohama. The company numbered about 80. In a brief speech, Mr. Otani Kabei,

President of the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce, welcomed Mr. Diosy in Japan, making graceful allusion to the guest's interest in things and people Japanese in the years gone by, and expressing the pleasure it gave Mr. Diosy's many Japanese friends to welcome their friend and entertainer in their own land. All present would welcome a few words from the lips of a man for whom they entertained such high esteem.

Mr. Diosy rose immediately to reply. He asked pardon for speaking in English instead of the Japanese tongue, and briefly explained his reason for doing so. Of late he had become very diffident about speaking in public in Japan owing to the distorted reports that were afterwards circulated by the vernacular press. Words were put into his mouth that he had never uttered; in many cases the reported words were the exact opposite of what had come out of his mouth and, to make matters worse, these reports were sometimes translated for the foreign press by very indifferent students of English, and the foreign editor, in order to add interest to the remarks, embellished them with improvements that owed everything to the imagination. Mr. Diosy then gave an illustration of the perversion of a recent speech. He spoke at a meeting of the Seiji Gakko in Tokyo, and took occasion to remark that the qualities that go to make a statesman were not necessarily of a brilliant order. Indeed, the qualities that would enable a Japanese to manage the Tokyo Tramway Company successfully were just such qualities as would cause a Government Department to be managed successfully. Those were the simple words he used. But much to his astonishment he found that when the speech had been translated into a foreign newspaper published in Yokohama, he was said to have advised that the tram car drivers and conductors were the proper persons to be placed in charge of the Government Departments of Japan! Could anything be more incorrect or absurd? He was therefore glad to see present that evening some of his fellow countrymen, because they could afterwards bear witness to what he really said. And now, continued Mr. Diosy, I will pass on to the subject proper of my speech, and will, with all deference, offer you a few remarks upon a matter that has great interest for all here: the subject that has been under discussion so much of late by all having any interest in, or residing in Japan—I mean the subject of the new state of things which will begin next month. At least, the new order of things is expected to take place next month, though no one really seems to know when it really does begin; some saying next month, some a week or so later: at any rate, my subject is solely the state of things in Japan after the new treaties between Japan and the rest of the world come into operation. Now, to begin with, I hope you will pardon me when I say that I think that all of you, all who have discussed the matter in print or in debate, or in conversation, have given almost too much prominence to the subject. I mean to say, that the visitor coming to your land from afar is given the impression, after being here a few days, that both the Japanese and the foreigner seem to expect that on the 17th of July, or the 4th of August—whichever may be the correct date—there will be a tremendous earthquake, a great disturbance, that will turn things topsy-turvy; that, in fact, there will be an extraordinary convulsion of nature to mark the beginning of a new order of things. You will pardon my saying, after my short life in Japan, but my longer acquaintance with Japanese life, that nothing of the sort will happen. In fact, unless you are stopped in the street by a friend who has, perhaps, just read a leading article based on the event that officially comes off on that particular day, you will not, many of you, be aware that the new treaties have come into operation. I believe that the new order of things will be inaugurated with smoothness and that there will be little unpleasantness, if any; assuredly no millennium will have been begun. I think, and so do many others, that you need expect no trouble, no serious unpleasantness to be the outcome of the new state of things that begins this summer.

Now I think, if you will reflect a little, that the fears of ourselves, as foreigners, and the fears of yourselves, as Japanese, regarding these matters, are very much exaggerated; and that those fears are not exactly a credit to you or a credit to the Occidentals. It is now well on to 40 years since the foreigners came to this port—Nippon no Genkan—the entrance door to Japan. You have been in daily intercourse with foreigners from all parts of the world, and surely by now you ought to know something about them. You ought not to consider them as strange creatures, intercourse with whom must be surrounded by all sorts of precautions and safeguards. And with regard to the Occidentals, the fears that they have expressed respecting you have produced in Europe an impression that they are entirely lacking in courage and ability, an impression, in fact, that is very far from being in accordance with the facts. Europe has said, what a pitiful sight to this, a few companies of our fellow-country men are going about in fear of the terrors of passing under Japanese law; they are affrighted at the condition of the prisons, as if they expected to spend the rest of their lives there. I think you will agree with me, then, that the fears of the Occidentals are not more dignified than the fears expressed by yourselves are reasonable at the prospect of closer connection with the foreigner. I put it to you, is the foreigner so terrible a creature as your public opinion makes him out to be? Day after day I rise from reading leading articles in your newspapers dealing with the closer relations soon to be set up between Japan and the Occident, with the idea that, so far as the writers are concerned, not more than five foreigners could ever have visited Japan during the course of the last century or so. No account seems to have been taken of the hundreds of globe-trotters who have annually passed through the Empire of Dai Nippon; one would never think, to read your papers, that thousands of Europeans and Americans have been living in your midst since the treaty ports were first opened, helping to develop the resources of your country or engaged in teaching you how to best apply the discoveries and the appliances of Western learning. And what I have just stated is not confined to leading articles and essays, it is reflected in the conversation and behaviour of your people. It is now well over 30 years that the foreigners first came to Japan. Yet to-day in Tokyo, if a European or American, more especially an Occidental lady, goes through the streets and enters a shop, within a few seconds that shop is surrounded by so large a crowd of curious observers that the Occidental when he or she comes to quit the premises to gain the street, cannot obtain egress without the use of gentle force to push the people aside. Try to use a little of the most valuable commodity in the world—common-sense—and this advice I give you in all sincerity—when dealing with foreigners, and remember that they are fellow mortals like yourselves. A little common sense will teach you all that there is absolutely no reason on your part to treat us with suspicion, to regard us as some terrible kind of creature, intercourse with which must be regulated by all sorts of protective measures. If you want to further the best interests of Yokohama, if you want to further the interests of the country you all love so well—Dai Nippon—you will bear in mind the advice I now offer you: that it is absolutely necessary to treat the foreigner residing in your country just as you would the Japanese. Oh, I hear you exclaim, that is precisely what we have been agitating for, striving for, bawling for, these last 30 years. For 30 years we have striven to bring the foreigners under Japanese law. That is all very well, I reply. But what I mean is more than that; you must treat them as Japanese in other respects: you must behave towards the foreigner as you would towards another Japanese. I do not say that you are aware that you are not behaving towards him as well as you would towards a Japanese. You don't behave well towards each other in business, sometimes, and the foreigner also in this respect must take his chance. But this I want you to understand and believe, the foreigner merchant comes to Japan to trade honestly and to obey your country's laws, and if you treat him as you would one another he can have no just cause for complaint. In order to treat the foreigner fairly you must deal with him in amity and all honesty. You must learn to know and understand him properly; you must try and discern the good from the bad and judge accordingly. But this is what the Japanese public seems quite unable to do. I have often been astonished in London to hear a Japanese friend exclaim, after passing through Western lands, "how nice Occidentals are, what good qualities they have, and how different the Western man is in his own lands to the Western man to be seen in my own country." Gentlemen, therein you as Japanese are in error. And that error arises in this way, that you do not judge of Westerners in Japan by the proper specimens. You select the worst samples in the lot, if I may use the simile, and then you judge us by those. I beg of you, when you try to form an idea for yourselves of what the character of the Western man is like—I beg of you to think of some European, or American, or Australian, whom you may know in this city of Yokohama, who leads an honest, pure, and upright life: earns his living as a trader, or perhaps as a professional man, or perchance is connected with some body of high-thinking men who come to this land to endeavour to convert you to the particular faith to which he has devoted his life and whose ideals he follows to the best of his powers and ability—at all events, think of that Western man of good life, upright in his behaviour, just in his dealings, courteous in his bearing towards you at all times of social or business intercourse—then you will be able to form an idea of the Westerner's character that will be more in accord with truth. Take my advice and think of the Western men of your acquaintance who are courteous, amiable, and just; that is the only true way for you to judge us. I will not say that we Westerners are perfect, far be it from me any such boast. Human nature is human nature whether we seek it in Western or Eastern lands, but by following the line I have indicated, you will be getting nearer the character of the true Occidental than you have done up to the present. Of course there are bad amongst us I am sorry to say there are some men whose conduct and behaviour make us blush, the drunken, foul-mouthed, swaggering ruffian who cumber the Buuds and wards of the Treaty Ports. But believe me such men would not be tolerated in any decent American or European society: therefore, I say, it is unjust for you, as Japanese, to regard them as a type and judge us all by such a sample. Time after time since I have been in Japan I have heard it said, "But you foreigners are so yakamashi." True, there are some of us that are yakamashi, but they do not comprise all the community. The other day I was at the Post Office in Yokohama, posting some registered letters. At the same time there came up a man, a well-dressed individual, who, judging from his accent, was a Britisher—a Scotman, in fact—who wished to send to Holland certain postal parcels. He filled out the form and handed it in to the clerk, and was then informed, very courteously and politely, that he must fill in a duplicate, the parcels being for Holland. Thereupon this creature—I am sorry I cannot call him a man—opened his mouth and let out a torrent of filthy swear-words, using expressions that would have disgraced a barge on our rivers at home, or a stevedore, or dock-labourer of the lowest class. I turned to the man and said quietly, "Do you know, sir, that in London you would have been asked to fill in a duplicate form?" "No, I wouldn't," was the reply. "Oh, yes you would, for I know, having sent many postal parcels to Holland; while for some Continental places three forms would have been necessary. Besides, you ought to know that the language you have been using would not have been tolerated in a British Post Office. Had you used it at home a policeman would promptly have placed his hand on your collar and another at the seat of your trousers and run you out." Indeed, I felt sorely tempted to play the part of the policeman myself. Now, that is the sort of person that gives foreigners a bad name in Japan. For goodness sake don't judge us by such creatures. We would soon be associated with them; we don't own them. Look, I beg you, to the better men amongst us; look at the honest, good, upright, charitable, polite—the real sample of the real foreigner I have spoken of. And in conclusion, if you would have the foreigner treat you as an equal—I don't mean in matters of law, because under the new treaties, as is only right, proper, and natural, you will all, Japanese and foreigners, be equal before the law—if you would have him drop that air of superiority towards you—which must have been very distressing to such a proud, patriotic, and high-spirited nation as the Japanese—if you want the haughty manner of the Westerner to cease, then you must make him respect you. Many foreigners love your nation; many foreigners love your country, not only those in lands afar, but the great majority of those living in your midst love it. Yes, many of those men who write such bitter letters about you and your country to the newspapers in their home lands, would be loth to leave Japan. While on my voyage to Japan, I made the acquaintance of a well known foreign merchant of Kobe. He told many terrible stories of Japan and against the Japanese. I was rather astonished at some of them and at last began to wonder whether I dare venture to land in this terrible country. At last I said to him, "Well, if all those stories are true, you must be making a good deal of money to make it worth your while to stay among such a terrible people." "What," was his reply, "make money, why I am nearly ruined: business in Kobe is going to pieces." Now, gentlemen, such talk cannot always be taken seriously. The persons who indulge in it are doubtless most excellent people, but they have developed a habit of grumbling. Perhaps it is the hot weather; perhaps the mosquito bite and annoy past all endurance; perhaps the house is draughty, or habutaye is not selling at a suitable price—yet, despite this grumbling, these foreigners do love Japan. But, though you have earned their love, you have not gained their respect. And why? you ask. And how can you gain the foreigner's respect? All you have got to do is to be honest, open, straightforward in your dealings with him. I said this in the Kansai the other day, and I repeat it—it is excellent, sound advice. You say, Oh, but it is very difficult to follow. It is not difficult at all. Remember, all I have said is—try and deal justly and in an open way with the foreigner; try to remember that the ijinsan is not a baka: he is not a fool. When the little boys of Tokyo run after my jinrikisha and call out "Ijin baka"; "Ijin neto baka," I take off my hat to them and salute their teachers. For those little boys are merely giving expression to an idea that I find widely prevalent in Japan—that the foreign man is a fool. With all due deference to you, gentlemen, I say he is not a fool. Very far from it. Hot-tempered under provocation he may be, but a fool, no. Really, gentlemen, who were the people who invented the telegraph that enables you to send your messages to the uttermost parts of the earth in the course of an hour or so—the ijinsan; who invented the telephone into which you are calling moshi, moshi, all day long—the ijinsan; who laid down your first railway system, allowing of easier communication for yourselves and the expansion of your trade—the ijinsan; who built the first of those huge steamships that allow you to send your productions to lands afar—the ijinsan; who developed those appliances, thought out those systems of finance and commercial methods which you are so manfully attempting to adopt in order to fully develop the resources of your country—the ijinsan? And yet, though you know this fully well, you really treat us as if we were fools. Day after day, you prepare little traps to catch us, sometimes traps in business, sometimes traps in diplomacy, and yet they are so clumsily made that only a born idiot would be caught by them: and as you know the ijinsan is not caught by them. These things have earned for you a bad reputation. I know that sometimes these traps have been prepared in a most frivolous spirit, but that does not make the case any the better. You think that if they fail they can be of no importance. That is the Japanese feeling in the matter. But, believe me, the foreigner thinks very differently. If a trap of this sort fails, the Japanese laughs and says—shikata-ga-nai (what does it matter; it is of no importance). Not so the foreigner, he has quite other feelings. He gets angry. He says, these people have been trying to make a fool of me. He therefore gives a bad report concerning the Japanese, for he cannot respect them. Gentlemen, we foreigners cannot respect you, unless you give up these practices and deal with us fair and above board. And what is the conclusion I am driving at? Look at the Chinaman. The Chinaman in his silks and queue is not unknown in the coming-houses of London. He comes to us and is received with pleasure. London is ready to welcome him as a customer. China wants a loan—dying, rotten, paralyzed China; she wants a loan, and we have to set 5 or 6 policemen outside the Bank to keep order among the crowd of people who come tumbling over each other to offer their surplus capital to your neighbour. Now Japan wanted a loan: and what happened? You all know, your newspapers have told you the result, and you all know what you are thinking about it. Every mother's son of you, after he got home the other night, must have pondered over the news from London as he sat over the tobacco-box. He said Nase, nase; and pondered the matter, I hope. And before long you will be able to answer your own question—nase? Gentlemen, China knows that honesty is the best policy: it is the most valuable commodity you can have in dealing man with man. China is known to be honest; merchants have long known that they can believe and trust a Chinaman in business. Believe me, the Chinaman has not learnt to love honesty because it is a virtue; he has learnt to pursue honesty because it pays. In my country, I say, a Chinaman is trusted; in my country China is trusted. I am sorry to say that the financiers of my country do not believe in you. There are a great many lovers of Japan in England; a great many lovers of her land, her art, her history; the 945 members of the Japan Society love her—but the great majority of the financiers of England and of Europe do not trust her. They do not respect your character. Gentlemen, I think the failure of this loan is a wind that will blow you good—that it will turn out a godsend to you. You will, when thinking out the causes of the failure, eventually get upon the right track. And once on that track you will make those one or two necessary reforms that will lead you to the great change which will earn you the respect and confidence of the world. When you have learnt to discover the good character of the men who love you, learnt to know that you have no better friends than the foreigners who are living and striving to earn honest livelihoods and lead upright lives among you—then you will not be far from the time which shall herald in such a prosperity that Yokohama has never seen before. I pray that that time may come soon, and in that spirit cry—Yokohama Bansai.

The speaker resumed his seat amid loud plaudits. During dinner various dances, jugglery exhibitions, etc., took place, and afterwards Mr. H. A. C. Bonar proposed the Emperor's health; Governor Asada toasted Her Britannic Majesty the Queen-Emperor; Mr. Otani proposed the health of the guest of the evening; and Mr. Umeda the health of Mr. Bonar. All were cordially received, the company not breaking up till a late hour.

Tokyo has a dramatic treat in store, Miss Janet Waldorf having arranged to play on Monday and Tuesday evenings at the Metropolis Hotel. The company will have the patronage of the U. S. Minister.

THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE

ENTERTAINED BY JAPANESE MERCHANTS.

On Monday evening a banquet was given at the Imperial Hotel by the Committee of Japanese merchants who have been engaged in investigating the preparations for the operation of the Revised Treaties. Mr. Shibusawa, of Tokyo, presided, and Mr. Otani occupied the vice chair. The table was arranged as follows:—

Messrs.	Messrs.
Umeda (Mayor of Yokohama)	Iiagawa
C. Bianchi	Nakasawa
J. P. Morrison	Okura
E. Knapp	Nakano
James Dodds	Mitsuhashi (Foreign Office)
Capt. Bougonin	Asada (Governor of Kanagawa)
W. F. Mitchell	Viscount Aoki
H. Abegg	Count Kabayama
Otani Kahei	Shibusawa
R. D. Robinson	Count Matsukata
H. J. Holm	Baron Senke (Governor of Tokyo)
James Walter	Mitsugami (Customs)
J. Budd	Watanabe
Wint Kilby	Kinawa
G. W. Middleton	Azai
A. Woolley	Tanaka
Masuda	Okada

The room was decorated after the manner of a Japanese garden, with lanterns showing among the trees; the whole effect being extremely pretty. The various speeches were translated by Mr. Okada Takakuma, M.A., Secretary of the Yokohama Japanese Chamber of Commerce.

MR. SHIBUSAWA EICHI proposed the health of the foreign guests and of the Ministers in the following speech:—

YOUR EXCELLENCIES AND GENTLEMEN.—On behalf of the members of the Tokyo and Yokohama Chambers of Commerce and others, I beg to express my sincere thanks for the honour conferred upon us by your presence this evening. I know your committee was formed with the object of studying the Revised Treaties, which is no doubt a very important subject to be taken up. As our trade relations are growing more and more, so the intercourse with you must become closer and firmer. Let us meet together very often to exchange our views and to promote our interests, and there will be no misunderstanding among us. Japan has made rather sudden changes in the last forty years. Not long ago, some went so far as to advocate an exclusive policy, and I am ashamed to confess that I had myself such a narrow idea at that time. It seems to me just like a dream to sit down myself with you here this evening. Your excellencies and gentlemen, your patience and perseverance have lasted long, and at last we have arrived at the day of realization. I am assured of your friendly co-operation which will lead to the satisfactory operation of the New Treaties. I propose now to drink to the prosperity of the International Committee and of Ministers of State.

MR. R. D. ROBINSON, in the course of his reply on behalf of the International Committee, expressed thanks for the cordial manner in which the toast had been received, and proceeded:—

I hear often of the lack of sociability between the Japanese and Foreign Residents. I think one of the chief causes of this lack of sociability is the difficulty that foreigners have to acquire a proper knowledge of the Japanese language. In the first place, there is no doubt about it—it is a difficult language to acquire. In my country the first thing to learn is one's letters—our A. B. C. There are only 26 of them, and that is not a very serious job. But here the very fewest one has to master is 2,500 to 3,000, and that seems to me appalling, even though I had all my time to devote to a study of the language. Now we foreign residents are mostly merchants—come out here to acquire a fortune or a living by commerce, and we find that the competition now-a-days requires very close attention to one's work, and that there is very little time to devote to study. Then after work one needs relaxation, amusement, exercise, and there is where Japan seduces us from the path of duty. The country is so beautiful, and the climate so good that riding and walking, swimming, rowing, or sailing are all very delightful relaxations easy to be had, and we fall before the temptation and neglect the serious work of learning the language. Well, all this is only an excuse, and to excuse is tantamount to accuse, so I think we have to acknowledge that there is fault on our side in this direction, and I should like to promise that we will all amend our ways. If I can't do that, I can at any rate give a recommendation—and a very strong recommendation—to all young men, coming out to Japan with the object of making a career, to sacrifice themselves during the first years of their stay here—in devote an hour or so every day to the study of the language, without which even their commercial career must suffer, and without which it is impossible to cultivate the social relations that ought to exist with the hospitable people of this country. I have much pleasure in submitting the healths of the Chairman and Vice-Chairman.

MR. OTANI KAHEI, in reply, said:—

YOUR EXCELLENCIES AND GENTLEMEN.—In business, as in morals, we must do unto others as we would have them do unto us. The commercial policy of reciprocity, the policy of give and take, is the only policy possible for a nation which desires to trade with other nations on a large scale. We can not and do not approve of building a commercial Chinese wall in our country. We welcome you as friends and fellowmen whose welfare is so closely interwoven with our own prosperity. Therefore we welcome you, not in a spirit of narrow selfishness but of generous reciprocity. You have the same interests and the same aspirations as ourselves. Let us work together in this spirit, and our mutual confidence will become the link of union among our nations; and the enlarged commercial relations will knit more firmly the friendship that has always existed between your countries and our own. We tender this evening a cordial and heart-felt welcome to you.

VISCOUNT AOI also spoke.

NEW DOCKS AT URAGA.

Uraga, historically famous from its association with Commodore Perry, promises to acquire further celebrity on more substantial grounds. Hitherto the little port has been frequented only by big junks and Japanese schooners, and has never been a place of any prominence or importance, but there are signs that a larger future is before it. Two Dock Companies have established themselves in the neighbourhood, and one of them—the Ishikawajima Dock Company—has brought its enterprise to completion. The opening day was fixed for Sunday, and fully six hundred persons from Tokyo and Yokohama, including members of naval and official circles, business men, and prominent European residents of the Treaty Ports, visited the dock, being conveyed from Yokohama by the N.Y.K.'s steamer Kobe Maru (Captain R. Swain).

The steamer left the Hatoba at 10.30, and under the skilful pilotage of the Captain was soon steaming down the Bay, showing the qualities of speed and steadiness which have made it and its sister ships such great favourites with the travelling public. Ample as is the accommodation provided by the spacious promenade deck, which runs almost from end to end of the steamer, it was fully taxed by the great number of passengers, and the saloon, smoke room, cabins, and corridors were all packed with visitors in every conceivable style of Japanese and foreign dress, from the frock coat and tall hat as colourless and respectable as the City could show to the kimono and sori pure and simple, with all possible and impossible variations between the two extremes. For about an hour and a half the company were thrown on their own resources, which generally meant tea-drinking, conversation, smoking, and a lazy survey of the pleasing panorama—a symphony in blue and green—of earth, air, and sea. Just before noon the steamer slowed down, and commenced her soundings preparatory to anchoring at Uraga. Numerous launches had been provided, and the disembarkation was quickly accomplished.

Arrived on shore, the visitors soon found that Uraga was, for so quiet a place, quite in a state of bustle. Daylight fireworks were going off with a most imposing amount of noise; flags were flying from every available spot; and a triumphal arch had been erected. The steamer Fulami Maru, one of the N. Y. K.'s Australian mail boats, and a beautifully fitted specimen of the floating mansion, was in dry dock, and was a wonderful source of interest to some of the more bucolic visitors who had come from the surrounding villages. Two 700 ton steam barges, which are being built to the order of the Osaka Harbour Works Commissioners, were also subjects of considerable attention. The hulls are fairly far advanced, and are already beginning to look ship-shape. The workshops, fitted in approved modern style, were also open to inspection, and some of the residences destined for the use of officials were utilised as waiting and reception rooms. The length of the dock is 451 feet, its breadth 50 feet, and its depth 33 feet. It will take vessels up to 3,500 tons, but is not of sufficient dimensions for the large European and American mail steamers entering Yokohama. The work of excavating the dock was commenced in 1896, and finished in November 1898.

A platform had been erected under an awning, and from this speeches were delivered in Japanese by Mr. Shibusawa, Chairman of the Company; the Vice-Minister of the Navy, representing the Minister; the President of the Marine Bureau, Mr. Yamagata, representing the Minister of Communications; Mr. Kinchi, President of the Industrial and Commercial Bureau, representing the Minister of Agriculture and Commerce; Mr. T. Senke, representing the Governor of Tokyo; Governor Asada, of Kanagawa Kencho; and Mr. Gihei Usui, member of the House of Peers, representing the people of Uraga. At the close of the speeches Mr. Iwaya called for a "Banrai" for the new enterprise, which was lustily given.

A tiffin in foreign style followed, and the rest of the afternoon was spent in visiting the Fulami Maru, watching various dances and theatrical exhibitions, and social intercourse. The return journey was commenced at four, and after a very pleasant trip back the Kobe Maru drew alongside the Pier just before six o'clock.

The Uraga Dock Company's dock at Uraga is in a very advanced stage of construction, and will probably be completed by the end of October. It is a very big undertaking, as will be seen from the following statement of its dimensions:—Extreme length (from the entrance to head) 500 ft.; length on keel blocks 454 ft.; breadth at entrance, top 70 ft., bottom 60 feet; depth over all at ordinary spring tide 24 feet; depth over all at highest spring tide 27 feet; rise of tide 6.8 feet; height of blocks 4.5 feet; time of filling 1 hour; time of pumping dry 2½ hours. The dock lies south east and north west.

MISS JANET WALDORF.

A very slim house gathered at the Public Hall on Tuesday evening, when Miss Janet Waldorf opened her short season in Yokohama. We are sorry to see the community so unappreciative of really genuine talent, for Miss Waldorf's powers as a delineator of Shakespeare's heroines are, beyond all question, of a very high order. We preferred her Rosalind to either Juliet or Beatrice. As Juliet she seemed too mature and demonstrative—but 'tis purely a matter of individual taste. For what actress has ever represented upon the stage the ideal Juliet that every true lover of the great dramatist has evolved exclusively for himself? Not even Miss Ellen Terry herself can hope to dethrone from the jealously guarded shrine the Juliet of our dreams and highest fancies—'tis a task no mortal may achieve. So we will be thankful to Miss Janet Waldorf for her rendering and bestow the homage that is her due. Miss Waldorf's Rosalind was very charming; and we hope to see her play again in doublet and hose the part of that high-spirited, wapward, saucy, but altogether most adorable daughter of the banished Duke, who has had the world at her feet since first Will Shakespeare gave her life and being in the Forest of Arden.

TOKYO DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

At a meeting of the Tokyo Dramatic and Musical Association held June 8th at the house of the Secretary of the Legation of the United States, the following report of the Honorary Treasurer was presented and accepted. A general meeting of the Society has been called for the 21st inst., at 3 p.m. at the United States Legation.

TO THE COMMITTEE OF THE TOKYO DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:—As Honorary Treasurer of this Association I respectfully submit through you to the Association the following report.

During my absence from Tokyo in 1897, Mr. Josiah Conder, acting for me, presented a financial statement to the Association which was audited and passed. Since that time, no general meeting of the Society has been held. The year 1897, and part of 1898, were a period of non-activity of the Association, on account of the decease of Her Majesty the Empress-Dowager of Japan. On February 5th, 1898, the Society resumed its work with a dramatic representation. Since that date entertainments have been given at the following times,—May 17th and December 7th, 1898, and on January 10th, February 14th, and May 5th, 1899.

At the last general meeting, held in March, 1897, the Society had as a balance to its credit yen 219.36. During the course of the then current financial year the Association received yen 72 from the subscriptions of twelve of its members. The receipts from the entertainment given before the close of that year, Feb. 5, 1898, were yen 228.00. Of this entertainment all members of the Society, whether they had or had not paid their subscriptions, were equal sharers in the privileges that members enjoy, in the purchase of tickets of admission. For the year 1897-98 the Association's expenditures were confined to the wages of the care-taker of the Society's properties, the rent of the electric light fixtures used in the Sho-ri kai, and a few small delayed obligations.

During the Association year of 1898-99 now closed, in which, considering the circumstances the performance of February 5th, 1898 may be included, the Association has received yen 3,675 61. Of this amount yen 486 has been derived from the membership subscriptions of eighty-one persons; the remaining amount, excepting a small interest payment on funds in bank, coming from the sale of tickets for the six entertainments. The expenditures made during the year were in total, yen 3,303 60, leaving a balance now to the Association's credit of yen 372.01, which with a further small interest payment of yen 9.68 on account of our bank deposits, leaves at the Society's command at present the sum of yen 381.69. A statement in detail is given below.

Prior to the last financial statement to the Association, the sum of yen 455 had been given to various local charities, as hereinafter named. This amount was limited mainly on account of the exceptional expenses necessary at the start to fit and furnish the Sho-ri kai so that it would be suitable for the Society's purposes. During the year just passed the sum of yen 1,059.65 has been distributed among several benevolent agencies established among the Japanese. In the course of the past year considerable expenditure for permanent properties, furniture, &c., in which expenditure purchase of the electric light fixtures for yen 130, that has hitherto cost a yearly rental of yen 66, and the preparation of a commodious "green-room," and orchestra gallery are included. The Society, consequently, at the present time is possessor of stage properties, furniture, and many other conveniences that in the past were either borrowed from generous friends or rented at a heavy expense for each of our entertainments. Roughly speaking, during the past year the Society's expenditures have been equally divided into donations to charities, purchase of permanent properties, and cost of the dramatic and musical presentations.

I append here a summary of the Association's gifts to local charities to date:—

1896.	Yen.

MRS. PATTON'S CONCERT.

Both Mrs. Patton and her pupils may be congratulated on the success of the ninth concert of the Tonic Sol-fa Juvenile Choral Society on Wednesday. The more purely musical part of the programme proved most satisfactory the sound principles on which the teaching is conducted and the careful attention given to pupils collectively and individually. The solos and duets, vocal and instrumental, were far from poor, and the part singing was excellent. The second part of the programme was of a miscellaneous character, and afforded the young performers opportunities of displaying their precocious stage talents. The Highland fling was very prettily danced by Master Colin Hutchinson, and Miss E. Gillett and Master E. Steele, in quaint costumes, introduced a Russian song and dance, seen, we are assured by the programme, for the first time in Japan. The dismal fate of the over-particular "Three maids of Lee" was humorously depicted, though perhaps in the second scene the old maids were too old. When one is so decrepit as those unfortunate little old maids one is more interested in watching the undertakers' advertisements for offers of a cheap funeral than in worrying about the chances of a husband. However, it was very amusing. "The Bold Gendarmes" was a happy idea, and capably carried out. They were all very little boys in very smart uniforms and very big helmets, but the leader was less than little—he was absolutely Lilliputian. The deportment of this small hero and his troop was most amusing.

A large party of Filipinos, banished by the Spaniards to the Marianas, returned to Manila on the 29th May.

IS DR. KATO'S TEACHING DEMORALISING?

(COMMUNICATED.)

In his "Practical Introduction to the Study of Japanese Writing," Mr. B. H. Chamberlain, on p. 342, says of Dr. Kato Hiroyuki: "Though he is a highly cultured and most amiable man, all his work (so far at least as we are acquainted with it) has a profoundly demoralising tendency. It is materialistic to the core,—the materialism quite naïvely expressed, as is the Japanese way." Mr. Chamberlain is undoubtedly a great authority on Japanese literature, to the study of which he has given the best years of life. His opinion on any subject connected with that literature will carry weight with a large number of readers of his works. But it is important to bear in mind that Mr. Chamberlain's attention has been chiefly centred on ancient Japanese literature, and that he is one of those sinologues who find it difficult to become enthusiastic over the literary productions of the Meiji era. If we may judge from his own admission in the passage quoted above, he does not profess to have made anything like an exhaustive study of Dr. Kato's works. His criticism of Dr. Kato is simply a repetition of what has been said by certain Japanese writers and by a few of the missionaries. The charge brought against Dr. Kato by Mr. Chamberlain is a very serious one; nevertheless it is supported by no evidence whatever. This is unscholarly, to say the least of it. No one expects Mr. Chamberlain to imitate Exeter Hall methods of stirring up feeling against persons or opinions. Feats of term-throwing one anticipates when listening to a Protestant or Roman Catholic special pleader or to other narrow-minded religious zealots, but scholars like Mr. Chamberlain are naturally supposed to be above resorting to such ways of obtaining popular applause.

The present writer has for the past 20 years been an ardent admirer of Dr. Kato as a philosopher and a public speaker, and has translated for publication in the columns of the Japan Mail a large number of his essays. There is no feature of Dr. Kato's teaching with which he is unacquainted. The conclusion he has reached is that Dr. Kato's views on philosophy and morality are decidedly elevating, instead of being demoralising. But assertions without evidence on one side or the other are of little use; and so we proceed to go into details. After saying that Dr. Kato's work is demoralising, Mr. Chamberlain explains himself by adding that it is materialistic. This is the old theological way of trying to settle a controversy by applying an opprobrious epithet to an opponent. The most popular epithets formerly kept in the slings of Christian David to throw at unbelieving Goliaths were, "Atheist, infidel, sceptic!" the very utterance of which made pious old ladies and orthodox young ones put on their shocked looks and led them henceforth to regard the individual to whom the term of reproach had been applied as too wicked to associate with. To-day the correct thing to do is to call a man a materialist if his views on ethics, religion, and philosophy shock your susceptibilities. Now it is important to distinguish between the different meanings attached to this term materialist, and to decide in which sense Mr. Chamberlain uses the word. Materialism may be understood as the denial of the existence in man of an immaterial substance that alone is conscious, distinct, and separable from the body; or it may be taken to represent the metaphysical doctrine that matter is the only substance, and that matter and its motions constitute the universe. Philosophical materialism holds that matter and the motions of matter make up the sum total of all existence and that what are known as psychical phenomena in man or other animals are to be interpreted in an ultimate analysis as simply the peculiar aspect which is assumed by certain enormously complicated motions of matter. But the word is often used to describe opinions based on purely material interests, to represent any low view of life, that is, it is made to refer to material things or interests as opposed to spiritual things or interests. It is quite evident that Mr. Chamberlain uses the word in this depreciatory sense. Used in its scientific or philosophic sense, Mr. Chamberlain must be perfectly well aware that to any unbiased mind it could not possibly become a term of reproach. For after all, the great battle between the school of thought known as materialism and that known as idealism is to a very large extent a question of the meaning to be attached to terms. The materialist gives a definition to matter that is sufficiently broad to comprehend mind and its phenomena as known to mankind by actual study, and the idealist on the other hand defines mind as the chief reality of the universe, as the basis and source of all matter. In the one case mind is one of the modes in which matter manifests itself; in the other matter is one of the modes in which mind manifests itself. The materialist philosophers assert that there is no reality apart from matter. The idealists, on the other hand, whether they belong to the school of Berkeley, of Fichte, of Hegel, or of Kant, maintain that all reality is in its nature psychical. Now if all philosophers are to be pronounced idealists or materialists, then undoubtedly Dr. Kato is a materialist. He believes that it is the study of matter and all its various phenomena that is the real source of most of the exact knowledge that we possess bearing on the laws and processes of nature. And he is of opinion that Japan has learnt more solid truth in this Meiji era from Western scientists than she learnt from all the speculations of Buddhist idealists in a thousand years. Dr. Kato maintains that as a method of studying the universe idealism has signally failed. Will the results of the investigations, he asks, of hundreds of subtle Brahmins, scores of keen Platonists, or of the followers of Kant, Hegel, and Fichte bear comparison with the brilliant discoveries of those men whose whole lives have been devoted to an exhaustive study of matter and its laws? But it is quite incorrect to say that all philosophers are either idealists or materialists. Though Dr. Kato is no idealist, if the word be understood in the sense indicated above, he is certainly an idealist of a very high type in the sense of having ever before him a lofty ideal, as we now hope to show by reference to his writings.

Before us lies a volume of short essays, which originally appeared in the Taiyo, but have since been published in book form under the title of the Tensoku Hyakuwa. In order to give an idea of the amount of matter the book contains, we follow the excellent plan adopted by Literature, and a few other periodicals, and state its size in inches. It measures 9 in. by 6 in. and covers 300 pages, including expositions of Dr. Kato's views on all the principal scientific, philosophical, and ethical questions of the day. Dr. Inoue Tetsujirō observed not long ago that for wide influence on modern thought in Japan there was nobody to be compared to Dr. Kato and Mr. Fukuzawa. Mr. Fukuzawa's teaching has been condemned alongside of that of Dr. Kato by Mr. Chamberlain. We purpose discussing the views of the Mita Sage in a separate article, but of Dr. Kato we may say that undoubtedly his books have been read with delight by a very large section of the educated public and that in the main his views are those of the vast majority of thoughtful Japanese. The Kokumin Shimbun some time ago and Dr. Inoue Enryō quite recently maintained that Dr. Kato is principally responsible for the trend of modern thought on religion and ethics. This, in our opinion, is attributing too much importance to the influence of a single individual, however gifted he may be. Dr. Kato in Essay 49 laughs at the notion. Though, as President of the University for some time, as a member of the House of Peers, and of a number of learned societies, in addition to writing for leading magazines, Dr. Kato has undoubtedly exercised wide influence, yet the modern Japanese thinker is not in the habit of pinning his faith to any individual writer. Among the professors of the University whom the Kokumin

Shimbun says Dr. Kato led astray, there is no such thing as the slavish following of any one mind. The President of an institution of that kind in Japan has little connection with any of the teachers and still less with the students. The source of the tendency of modern thought in Japan is to be found in Western literature. The Japanese are an ambitious people and they strive to keep pace with the progress of ideas among ourselves. If they are agnostics, so, according to the most reliable authority, are the majority of thoughtful people in Europe and America. If they have rejected the supernatural, so have thousands upon thousands of London Church-goers. It was only a month or two ago that the Saturday Review which, far from being opposed to Christianity, often goes out of its way to defend what is capable of defence both in Christian ritual and doctrine, writing on the subject of Christ's resurrection, expressed itself in the following terms: "The primitive Christian celebrated Easter without the shadow of doubt crossing the horizon of his mind, and striking the chill of a terrible anxiety into his heart, but the thoughtful modern Christian no longer enjoys that attitude of unsuspecting belief. The resurrection of Christ is matter of history, and they are no mean authorities which affirm that the attestation of history to this fact is direct, cumulative, and ample. That may be the case as long as the character of the fact is left out of count, but when this is reckoned with, who can, on the basis merely of the evidence, affirm the Resurrection? What at best is the value of human testimony? Experience accumulates examples of the insecurity of that basis for belief; but, allow its sufficiency, what is the actual testimony which we possess to the fact of Christ's resurrection? Can it be successfully disputed that the New Testament documents are mutually inconsistent? . . . Is the description of the risen Christ in the narratives of St. Luke and St. John either coherent or even thinkable? How can we reconcile in a single conception a body which passes as a ghost through doors and walls and that which has flesh and bones and nourishes itself with material food? And even if these difficulties can be removed, in there any escape from Harnack's position that 'however firm may have been the faith of the disciples in the appearances of Jesus in their midst, and it was firm, to believe in appearances which others have had is a frivolity which is always repented by rising doubts.' " The doctrine of the resurrection of Christ gone, as it undoubtedly has gone in the case of the majority of thinking laymen, the whole of the so-called supernatural fabric built thereon falls like a pack of cards, leaving that part of Christianity only which Dr. Kato, in common with English writers of note, values at its true price. Dr. Kato has over and over again spoken highly of the moral teaching of Christ.

In order to give readers some idea of the views of Dr. Kato, after a careful perusal of all the principal essays in the Tensoku Hyakuwa, we furnish a very brief account of the position he holds in reference to religion, ethics, and philosophy, giving in each instance the number of the essay which contains the statements summarised in our review.

I. RELIGION.—In Essay No. 47 he congratulates the nation on that article in the Constitution which allows liberty of belief in the matter of religion, and shows that in granting this liberty the Japanese Government, while imitating Western nations, has in point of fact gone beyond them. In Europe and America the concessions made practically amounted to allowing people to adopt what form of Christianity they pleased or to become Jews, since no other creeds have any wide influence in the West. But Japan's concession was a concession to an alien creed, and that notwithstanding the fact that she has two very ancient forms of faith that may be said to be to a large extent national. There is no mistaking the meaning of Art. XXVIII. of the

* Saturday Review, April 1st, 1899, Art. entitled "Easter."

Constitution. It has special reference to Christianity and must be so interpreted and acted on.

In Essay No. 19 Buddhism is discussed. The general conclusion reached is that, though originally one of the best religions in the world, in Japan at the present time it is quite corrupt and effete, and that hence it promises to be replaced by Christianity before many years are past.

Essay 45 deals with Buddhist superstitions and errors.

In Essay No. 30 Dr. Katō maintains that scholars, though needing no religious teaching, have a fixed faith of their own, which influences their lives in various ways and which they think has a far more sure basis than is the case with men who still believe in supernaturalism.

In Essay No. 34 the evils of superstition are set forth.

In Essay 21 the reform of religion in Japan or the evolution of an entirely new creed is pronounced alike impossible, on the ground that the spirit of the age is against granting to any individual or to any religious body the necessary authority for accomplishing such a purpose.

In Essay 29 religion is declared to be like a firefly in a dark night and like a narcotic to the man or woman in pain. Though man is called the lord of creation and though his rank among created things is undoubtedly high, as a conscious being his suffering is far keener than that of any other animals, and religion has been devised as a solace and a deadener of pain. But the highly cultured man can no longer derive comfort from the doctrines that satisfy the masses, and he is driven to adopt other methods for obtaining such alleviation of his sufferings as is to be had. As for that which can't be cured, he endures it with a brave heart.

Essay No. 74 contains a comparison of Confucianism, Buddhism, and Christianity. While acknowledging that the three cults have all done much to improve the state of mankind and to lead them into the ways of righteousness, Dr. Katō proceeds to argue that Buddhism and Christianity are both pessimistic in character, and hence less suited to play the roles of reformers than Confucianism, to which the past and the future are alike indifferent. There are several other essays that treat of religion, but the above give a fair notion of the attitude assumed by Dr. Katō to existing creeds.

II. ETHICS.—Dr. Katō's ethical teaching may be described as Utilitarian.* This accords well with his admiration for Confucian ethics. In Essays 17 and 73 he elaborates the theory that morality has no object more worthy of consideration than the preservation of society. The ethical creed which satisfied the subtle mind of John Stuart Mill commends itself to Dr. Katō, who, in not in Mill's own words, which we quote below, in spirit says to his opponents:—"If the impugners of the utilitarian morality represented it to their own minds in its true character, I know not what recommendation possessed by any other morality they could possibly affirm to be wanting to it: what more beautiful or more exalted developments of human nature any other ethical system can be supposed to foster, or what springs of action, not accessible to the utilitarian, such systems rely on for giving effect to their mandates." If any one doubts the loftiness of Dr. Katō's ethical standard we would recommend him to peruse Essays 94 and 98. In Essay 80 Dr. Katō discusses the position he maintains in Ethics. He there states that he entirely rejects the theory of the intuitionists, that is, the doctrine that the perception of primary moral truth is immediate and direct, and declares himself an experientialist. In Essay 54 he shows conclusively that from age to age the standard of morals in a progressive nation undergoes changes. He illustrates this fact by reference to the moral sentiments of the Japanese in regard to three time-honoured customs. (1) For many centuries the vendetta was practiced in this country and morally approved of by the consciences of the best people. (2) The same was the case with the practice of certain retainers' committing suicide on the decease of their lord, in order to accompany him to the land of shades. (3) Then it was universally felt that the nation was under a moral obligation to prevent foreigners from settling in the country. To slay any who persisted in trying to do so was considered a moral duty. Public opinion has entirely changed in reference to these matters, and what was formerly regarded as morally right is now deemed morally wrong. Dr. Katō argues that as long as the world progresses morality will progress too, and that there can be no such thing as a fixed standard for all times and all nations alike. He goes into the whole question of international morality in essays 72 and 88. In Essay 96 one characteristic of Christian ethics is discussed, namely, the importance it attaches to the future life as compared with this life, which Dr. Katō thinks to be a decided weakness. The need of practical morality and the importance to be attached to ethical teaching in schools are constantly dwelt on by Dr. Katō.

III. PHILOSOPHY.—Dr. Kato's philosophical views need no lengthy comment. He is an advanced evolutionist, and his philosophy leans more to the practical type of English lines of thought than to the metaphysical subtleties of the Germans. In Essay No. 1 he discusses the relative value of knowledge and the rank which various studies are entitled to hold. He entirely condemns the tendency to exalt matter above mind as a subject for investigation, and rightly maintains that it has been by means of philosophy and by the study of the mind and the laws of thought that many of the most valuable of the deductions of science have been reached. Philosophy, psychology, and sociology, he thinks worthy of equal rank with physics, chemistry, astronomy, and kindred subjects. In Essay 6 he discusses the influence of the theory of evolution on philosophy generally, showing that the general recognition of the principle has created a new philosophical era. Many of the old landmarks he declares to have been entirely removed by Darwin's discoveries. Some very interesting and very curious questions, which no one pretending to be fond of philosophy can well avoid considering, are discussed by Dr. Katō. One is the use that has been made of error in the development of the world's civilisation. This subject is treated in Essay 31. In that essay he cites as instances of errors that have done an enormous amount of good work in the way of restraining vice and inciting to virtue the Buddhist and Christian doctrines concerning heaven and hell, the Devil and sin. Schopenhauer has written fully on this subject, and Dr. Katō's views correspond with those of the German philosopher. In a volume of Essays of his translated into English by Mrs. Rudolf Dircks (London: Walter Scott), in the part entitled, "A Dialogue on Religion," it is argued that the world is so constituted that the majority of people cannot comprehend truth in its nakedness and that it needs to be adulterated in order to suit their weak digestion. One of the disputants in that dialogue maintains that all the religions in the world can never be true in sensu proprio, but only in sensu allegorio. "There," says the speaker, "lies the incurable mischief; the permanent evil; and therefore religion is always in conflict, and always will be, with the noble striving after pure truth." The same speaker further on is made to say:—"Religion is a fraus, it is indeed a pis-fraus; that cannot be denied. Then priests become something between deceivers and moralists. For they dare not teach the real truth, as you yourself have quite correctly explained, even if it were known to them; which it is not. There can, at any rate, be a true philosophy, but there can be no true religion: I mean true in the real and proper understanding of the word, not merely in that flowery and allegorical sense which you have described, a sense in which every religion would be true, only in different degrees. It is certainly quite in harmony with the inextinguishable mixture of good and evil, honesty and dishonesty, goodness and wickedness, magnanimity and baseness, which the world presents everywhere, that the most important, the most lofty, and the most sacred truths can make their appearance only in combination with a lie, nay, can borrow strength from a lie as something that affects mankind more powerfully; and as revelation must be introduced by a lie. One might regard the fact as the monogram of the world. Meanwhile let us not give up hope that mankind will some day attain that point of maturity and education at which it is able to produce a true philosophy on the one hand, and accept it on the other."

The above is the gist of Dr. Katō's contention in the essay quoted and elsewhere. And now we leave readers to answer the question for themselves with which we set out—Are Dr. Katō's views demoralising? Only one answer can be expected from many orthodox Christians—Dr. Katō is an agnostic and a sceptic, and that is enough to condemn him. But we have never hoped to convince such readers of this article. To the calm judgment of unbiased minds we commend this imperfect statement of the views of the only Japanese philosopher of modern times whose writings have received lengthy notices from his German confidants and whose exalted position as a teacher renders him a worthy subject of study to all those who wish to understand the serious and deeply earnest side of Japanese modern life.

CORRESPONDENCE.

EVANGELIZATION AND EDUCATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR.—Under the above heading there is, in the Japan Mail of May 27, an editorial note commenting on a letter that appeared in the Japan Times advocating the retirement of missionaries from all educational enterprises, and the devotion of all their energies to direct evangelization.

In this note the writer says: "We should have been greatly pleased to read some lucid comparison of the facilities enjoyed by missionaries and the facilities possessed by them, for propagating Christianity in this country." Now had the writer of the letter, who is evidently a missionary, piped about the facilities possessed by his brethren I am not so sure that the editor of the Mail would have danced. Rather would he have lamented the lack of that self-effacement which he considers becoming in the Christian propagandist.

There is, however, now no necessity for the missionary to speak of himself, for we can see his facilities as others see them; and the opinion is, like all that the editor expresses, illuminating and entertaining, though I cannot altogether agree with it. Concerning the facilities of the missionaries we are told: "Not one missionary can lecture about ethics or morals in such a way as to dignify the subject." And, with regard to the facilities that they might enjoy if they would, we read in substance: "Is not the instilling of high principles into young minds as much a part of the Christian propagandist's duty as the expounding of the gospel?"

This opinion of one who has had ample opportunities for observation is of more value to the missionary than any comparison that might be drawn by one of his number between his facilities and facilities. But if another who is not a missionary may be allowed to speak on his much-debated question he would say, in the first place that it is a question neither of facilities, nor of facilities, but of faithfulness to a command. "It is required in stewards that a man be found faithful."

The question of the proper relation of education to evangelization—to use the words in their ordinary sense—is a broad one that has been much discussed in India and elsewhere. This is no place to enter into it anew, but even the most earnest advocate of education does not urge that the whole energy of the foreign missionary body should be given to it. Yet the argument which we are considering seems to be that since the missionary cannot preach he should teach.

* Utilitarianism, 7th Edition, p. 25.

Not very much is promised him as the reward of his labours. With regard to results we are told: "We believe . . . that the educational work done by the missionary greatly furthers the cause of Christianity, or, at any rate, of Christian morality." If a clothing on of Christian morality be all that is to be hoped for, the steward of Christ might well say that he would have neither part nor lot in the matter. "If any speak not concerning Jesus Christ," wrote Ignatius, "I look upon them as tombstones and sepulchres of the dead, on which are written only the names of men."

Likewise with regard to lecturing on ethics and morals the missionary might say that to do so is no part of his duty. I am surprised at the statement that no missionary can lecture acceptably on these matters, but I accept the testimony of a competent witness. Now what I ought to do must be something that I can do, and if, of all the missionaries that have been in Japan, there is not one who can lecture about ethics we may well doubt whether to do so is any part of the burden laid upon the missionary.

But when we come to consider testimony I can testify to what any one may observe in the churches, that many a missionary can preach acceptably, both to believers and to unbelievers. After all, what is the missionary sent to do? "Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations . . . teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have given you," said the Master. "Christian propagandist" is a long title with which we have become familiar, but "missionary" is a term more in accord with Scripture. Disciples are not sent primarily to propagate a system—that is the duty of the propagandist—but to deliver a message. And the message is not directly about ethics and morals. These will follow on the acceptance of the message along with Christian education, and other fruits which are fruits and not roots.

The delivery of a message, or, in short, evangelization does not consist wholly, or even in large part, of set preaching. Paul crossed over into Europe to carry the message, and after abiding in Philippi certain days he went out of the city by a river side and sat down and spoke to the women that resorted thither. He did preach sometimes as he preached at Athens, where those who wanted to hear a new thing listened to his lecture but mocked at his message. He tells the elders of Ephesus, "among whom he had preached the kingdom of God," that he had "not ceased by the space of three years to warn every one night and day with tears."

But whether the duty be preaching or the care of the churches, or the training of evangelists, or the perfecting of the saints, or the talking with men by the way side, it cannot be that the messenger is sent to do what he can not do. Is it that preaching may do for Africa and the Isles of the sea but that educational methods are what is needed for a country with so difficult a language as Japan?

We read somewhere of the sending of one of the first messengers into the land of Egypt, and he said: "O my Lord, I am not eloquent, neither heretofore, nor since thou hast spoken unto thy servant; but I am slow of speech and of a slow tongue." To him the answer was, what it has been to messengers since, "Who hath made man's mouth? Have not I the Lord?"

Thanking you for presenting with so much authority one side of the question.

I am, Sir, very truly yours,

FRANK MULLER.

MISSIONARIES IN THE CAROLINES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—In the Weekly Mail of last Saturday, referring to the Caroline Islands, you seem to imply that American Missionaries reside on Ascension Island, or Pohnpei, as you give it, or Ponape, as it is more commonly known. As a matter of fact, while Ponape was the centre of the mission work in the Caroline Islands, the missionaries were expelled a few years after the Spanish occupation which dates from 1887, and have not been allowed to revisit or to communicate with their native converts. There is, however, a station upon the island of Kusaie, and another in the sub-group called Ruk. The missionaries at Kusaie have been for several years, although on Spanish soil, in close relation with the German authorities in the Marshall Islands, and their work has won the commendation of the Governor General, Dr. Irmer. The report from which I quote may be found in the Deutsches Kolonialblatt for March, 1896, a copy of which, at the request of the American Department of State, was kindly forwarded by the Foreign Office at Berlin with this memorandum:—"The relations between the state management of the Marshall Islands and the American mission are satisfactory."

The report contains the following paragraphs:—

The location of the mission with its many neat buildings scattered along the slope of the verdant hills is very pleasant. Upon the first ridge stand the dwelling of Dr. Rife, the leader of the mission, and the farm buildings. Several neatly kept paths of stone and sand lead up to the ridge. Higher up are the lodgings of the boys, and on the summit the house for the female teachers and the girls. Behind all rise ragged and steep the wooded peaks of the interior of the island. On the other side of the bay is the mission for the Gilbert Islands. All these buildings are connected together by telephone, and one is surprised at their convenient, substantial, and yet airy constructions and the attractive neatness of their interior arrangements, as well as of the grassy slopes and shrubbery around them. The arrangement of the rooms and sleeping apartments is excellent, and I understand now how it is that our Kanaken (native preachers and teachers), even after years of absence, look back to these scenes of their youthful training as to a paradise, and show their gratitude for these pleasant recollections by strong attachment to the mission. . . .

In short it must be acknowledged that, with the help of the magnificent natural advantages of Kusaie, leaders of the mission have done every thing to make the stay of their pupils with them and their education pleasant. The instruction, too, is given in an earnest and judicious manner, and the female teachers especially made a most favourable impression by their strict yet friendly demeanour towards the girls. The neat dresses of the pupils, their unconstrained joyousness, and their healthy appearance show that careful attention is paid to their physical well-being.

Owing to the natural advantages of which Dr. Irmer writes, it was found best to place the schools, that is, the higher schools connected with the work in the Marshall and Gilbert Islands, at Kusaie, which is a convenient centre. A small schooner with auxiliary steam plies between Kusaie and the neighbouring islands. Another schooner of rather larger size is usually stationed at Ruk for similar service. A third much larger still forms the connection with the base of supplies at Honolulu, 1,100 miles away.

It is hoped that under the new jurisdiction the missionaries will be able to return to Ponape, where there were in 1889, 4,509 enrolled Christians; fifteen native pastors; sixty-one native preachers and teachers; four training schools with 117 students; three seminaries for girls with seventy-nine pupils; forty-three common schools with 2,422 scholars. Whether looked upon from a religious or a humanitarian point of view the work was a brilliant success.

The leader of the first band of missionaries at Ponape was the late Rev. L. H. Gulick, M.D., who afterwards resided for several years in Yokohama as the Agent of the American Bible Society.

Communication between Yokohama and Ruk is not infrequent; for several Japanese vessels are engaged in trade with the Eastern Carolines, taking down a variety of Japanese goods and bringing up chiefly dried coconut, from which palm oil is prepared in Tokyo.

Thanking you for the space you have kindly allowed, I remain, Yours, etc.

THE MARQUIS AND THE CARDINAL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR.—Might I suggest that, in the Summary of the Religious Press (June 7th), in the conversation quoted of Marquis Saionji and the Cardinal, what the Cardinal did say was a quotation from Proverbs 9.17, which, in the Vulgate, reads, "Aque furtivae dulciores sunt," which, to one unacquainted with the Bible, might readily be rendered, Subtle kiji wa umaki mono nari.

Yours sincerely,

THE BOOKSHELF.

The Plunder Pit, by KEIGHLEY SNOWDEN. Methuen's Colonial Library: Yokohama, Messrs. Kelly and Walsh, Ltd.

We do not know Mr. Keighley Snowden, and presume him to be a beginner in authorship. If so, we should advise him to rest content with his maiden effort. It will be better for himself, and will certainly be to the advantage of the general public. Mr. Keighley Snowden hardly possesses a single qualification for his trade. His style of narrative is clumsy; his plot is only distinguished from entire commonplace by an obscurity which renders it occasionally incomprehensible; much of the book is written in Yorkshire dialect, and conveys no meaning to the ordinary Englishman; the characterisation is feeble; and the literary style poor. But the incidents are intended to be stirring, and some people may find the book readable.

BASEBALL.

Saturday's baseball game was one of the best matches we have had here for some time. The fielding was smart all round, while the batteries were exceptionally good. Cameron, the new pitcher, is an acquisition. He sends in a very swift ball with a most deceptive outward curve, and is sufficiently varied to puzzle batters till the end of play. As catcher, Goodwin is very smart, and he plays "good ball" all through: it is a pity that his stay in Yokohama is limited. Mr. Putnam was umpire on Saturday, giving entire satisfaction; and Mr. E. Mendelson was scorer. As will be seen in the details given below, the result hung in the balance till the very last innings, when Merriman's side put on four runs and thus won with only one run to spare.

CHINESE AFFAIRS.

It is reported from Peking that the Chinese Minister at Berlin has been instructed by the Tsungli Yamén to contract with the Vulcan works at Sietin, Germany, for the construction of two armour-clads, of about 8,000 tons, and six protected fast cruisers of 3,500 to be completed within 30 months, for something like ten million taels. An order for fifty quick-firing field guns will also be placed in Germany.

The North China Daily News translates from the Universal Gazette—a Chinese newspaper published in Shanghai—some details of a story that was recently current in Japan and caused at the time some incredulous comment:—"The Japanese Government has been recently in close negotiations with the Chinese concerning the return of the remnants of the Peiyang fleet which survived the Battle of Yalu and the Siege of Weihaiwei in 1894-95. The transaction is termed 'a gift of Japan to China' and the vessels to be returned will be the armour-clads Cheniyuen and Ping-yuen, the protected cruisers Tsien and Kuangping, and the Armstrong "mosquito" gunboats Chenpien, Chenchung, Chentung, Chennan, Chenhsi, and Chenpei, or a total of ten vessels." Commenting on this news our Shanghai contemporary says—It is confidently asserted among Chinese officials here that there is to be quid pro quo in the matter, and that, if the deal takes place, there will be some important changes in Fokien province. A high Chinese official now in Shanghai on business, from the North, further states that the return of the old Peiyang Fleet to China will mark the era of an offensive and defensive alliance between Japan and China and that, as an outcome, the Chinese armies and fleets will have a large proportion of Japanese officers and instructors to drill them. From indications it would seem that Chinese officialdom here talk freely and confidently as if the affair were an accomplished fact already.

The Universal Gazette states that General Yuan Shih-kai, whose troops were recently quartered at Tschou on the Chihli-Shantung border, awaiting developments in Shantung, has been commanded by Imperial edict to return to his cantonments at Hsiao-chan, near Tientsin. Steps have also been taken by the Generalissimo Juang Lu, to raise 10,000 Mongol cavalry in view of the presence of large numbers of Russian Cossacks in Manchuria, and a certain Mongol Prince has offered to raise and arm 5,000 more from his own tribe should China be involved in war, in the near future.

At Haining, Chekiang province, where the people earn their living by raising silkworms, a quantity of Japanese silkworm eggs have been imported as an experiment, and while it is stated that the Japanese worms spin a finer and a stronger silk than the native worms, the only drawback is that the former eat almost twice more mulberry leaves than the latter. It is, however, predicted, remarks a China contemporary, that the Japanese silkworm has come to Haining to stay.

Shanghai has sent the following gentlemen to Wei-hai-wei to take part in the sports, and cricket and other matches against the British Fleet:—Messrs. R. C. Farbridge, W. T. Tyack, G. F. Lanning, V. H. Lanning, A. E. Stewart, J. Mann, W. P. Lamp, J. C. Johnstone, E. Lynch, J. H. Teesdale, N. Ramsay, W. M. Wood, P. E. Beeston, Captain C. G. Close, and Dr. R. J. Marshall. Wei-hai-wei won the first cricket match by 8 wickets on the second innings.

Governor Ya, of Hunan province, recently issued a proclamation prohibiting the export of antimony from the province, on the ground that all antimony found in Hunan will be bought up by the authorities for use of the Government.

The Ostasiatische Lloyd states that immediately after the Agreements between the German and Chinese Governments with regard to the railway constructions had been signed in Peking, the contract of the railroad in the hinterland of Kiao-chow was placed with the Shantung Syndicate under the management of the Deutsch-Asiatische Bank. The same paper also states that steps have already been taken to push on the work of the line from Tientsin to Wehsien without delay.

The Universal Gazette reports that Great Britain intends to demand the opening of Tinghai, one of the Chusan Islands, and an independent sub-prefecture of Chekiang, as a treaty port, which accounts for the recent hydrographical survey of a British man-of-war around the Chusans. The Commander, it is said, has wired to the British Government, and if the demand is granted steps will be commenced after six or seven weeks to have the port opened.

According to the Universal Gazette, the Tls. 1,200,000 indemnity obtained by the French Minister at Peking for the destruction of R.C. property in Szechuan by Yü Man-ze and his followers will be divided by the R.C. mission among the 8,000 odd converts who suffered through the depredations of the rebels during the past twelve months or so.

According to the Ostasiatische Lloyd the Anglo-French Quicksilver and Mining Concession Co., having secured the right, is about to commence the development of cinnabar deposits in Kweichow province, and a mining engineer has already arrived from Europe. The deposits are said to be very rich, the ore yielding 4 per cent. of quicksilver, whereas the only other worked mines in the world, in Spain, Austria, and Southern California, yield 1 per cent. Further the deposits are situated within 8 days' journey of the coast downward, while the upwards journey takes a matter of six weeks.

NOTES ON AMERICAN TOPICS.

Discussing the prospects of the Democratic party in the next Presidential election, the Argonaut says:—As yet it is too early to make any satisfactory forecast of the men and the issues that will occupy the public eye and dominate the public mind in the Presidential campaign of the coming year. But rumours are multiplying, individual opinions are being disclosed, and general interest is rising to such an extent that the subject already occupies innumerable columns in the daily press. The contest within the Democratic party over the question of again entering the lists with Bryan as its champion knight, panoplied in the same silver armour that was battered almost out of existence in 1896, and with the scarred motto of "16 to 1" on his shield, is still the most picturesque feature of this formative period of opinion and the demarkation of Popocratic lines. A peculiar feature among anti-Bryan Democrats is that no one seems anxious to be a candidate. Mr. Croker has made the only definite suggestion when he names General Miles for President and Augustus Van Wyck for Vice-President. As a military candidate the recent career of General Miles would scarcely fill a bill which demands an enthusiasm to offset the personal popularity of Mr. Bryan, and it would be extremely doubtful whether Mr. Van Wyck, who was defeated in the race for governor of New York last fall, could carry his own State.

The Chicago River is combustible, according to the opinion of firemen of the city, who declare that it should be watched with the same care as picture-frame factories and other inflammable things. It actually caught fire the other day, and blazed until the fire boat turned on streams of water to quench it. The bridge at Kinzie Street was damaged to the extent of five thousand dollars, by the flames, and other bridges and adjoining warehouses suffered. The cause of the fire is believed to have been oil which ran into the river from a sewer and covered the surface.

Mark Twain's lawyers have bought for him the old frame house in which he was born at Florida, Mo. It is said that the new owner will renovate the place and restore it to the condition it was in during his boyhood.

In accordance with the request of Admiral Dewey, Mr. Secretary Long has presented to Mr. A. W. Robbins, master of the British ship Buccleuch, a fine chronometer in recognition of his services to the Asiatic Squadron immediately after the battle of May 1st, in communicating with the Spanish Governor-General at Manila for Admiral Dewey. Captain Robbins placed himself in the disposition of Admiral Dewey to convey messages to the Spaniards at Manila. The Admiral sent a request to the Spanish Governor-General to be allowed to use the cable connecting Manila and Hongkong, threatening if the request was not complied with to cut the line. The Spaniards refused and the cable was cut. There were several matters which the Admiral desired to present to the attention of the Spanish authorities, and Captain Robbins was generally the medium of communication.

A scheme to heat the United States postal service has been evolved by Chicago men. The plan is to gather up all the second-class mail matter of large commercial houses, ship it to Mexico by freight, change their American money into Mexican money at a ratio of two to one, buy Mexican stamps, and with them mail the matter back to the United States through the Mexican post-office. It is estimated that one-half cent could be saved on each letter and package thus handled. It is claimed that the government could not interfere without the aid of new legislation.

Miss Maude Adams has been setting the critics by the ears by her new reading of the rôle of Juliet at the Empire Theatre, New York. All are agreed, however, that she played the part as a natural girl—"with an abundance of youth" in fact, as one critic puts it. One writer summed up the performance in these sober words:—"Beyond peradventure Miss Adams is as wrong as wrong can be, yet she persists in playing Juliet in her own fashion, to the joy of the vulgar and the confusion of the learned. She flaunts tradition by carrying Juliet from art into nature. There is nothing finished in her performance. It is rough, uneven, in many matters uncouth, but in all particulars forceful, impassioned, and earnest in feeling. In her conception Juliet is more heart than head. Her business is to love Romeo, not to tickle the ears of the auditors with fine speeches. A hundred faults might be found in her style, not one in her sentiment. Those who go to hear her—as the old fogies do, closing their eyes and preparing to revel anrally in eloquent blank verse—will be disappointed. But watch the play of lights and shadows over her face, the quick, nervous gestures, the absolute suiting of the action to the word, and the skill with which she paints a picture on air in the potion scene; and if you are not erudite, but simply of the common people, you will find more Shakespeare in Maude Adams' Juliet than in any other Capulet of modern times."

In a special message to the Alabama legislature, Governor Johnston urges it to follow up its work in repealing the bill for a constitutional convention by the adoption for submission to the people of a constitutional amendment to eliminate the votes of the Negroes.

The Texas senate has passed an anti-trust bill, modelled after the law in Arkansas, and including the provision against insurance combinations on rates, whether such combinations exist within or without the State. Some amendments added make the measure more drastic than the Arkansas law. One would make the membership in a trust a bar against the collection of money in Texas for goods sold.

The New York Times, in discussing the system of retiring pensions for college professors, says: "The men who spend their lives in honouring and in bringing fame to a seat of learning should not be forgotten. Educators, as a class, are notoriously improvident, but very often their entire salaries are expended for the benefit of the institution that employs them. They become old; they are retired with the empty title of professor emeritus. Very often they pass the declining years as objects of delicately bestowed charity. Still, it is charity. It should not be so. The German professors, the French, and the Italian can look forward to a tranquil old age—provided they don't offend their governments. It should be so with American educators."

The following telegram is labelled "Recent American Humour" in the paper from which we take it:—

Norfolk (Va.), May 17.—Mrs. John O'Keefe, wife of a well-known sign artist of this city, has presented her husband with three sons. To-day the father named them Dewey, Sampson, and Schley, in honor of the three naval heroes of the late war.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

It is announced that H.M.S. Egeria, surveying vessel, has been commissioned for the purpose of surveying the route for the proposed Pacific cable.

A cablegram has been received in Yokohama recording the death on Monday by sunstroke at Manila of Captain H. E. Nichols, U.S.N., commanding the Monitor Monadnock.

The Endymion, cruiser, now attached to the Medway Fleet Reserve, Chatham, has been ordered to be brought forward at Chatham for Commission. She is to relieve the Grafton, Captain F. W. Fisher, on the China Station.

There was a football match at Singapore on the 9th May between the Tanjong Pagar Club and H.M.S. Orlando's team. The civilians scored two goals to nil. On the second goal being scored, the Orlando's claimed "off-side," and as the referee's decision was given against them they walked off the field.

The house belonging to Mr. Thwaites on Rokkasan, near Kobe, was burnt down on Wednesday morning. The man in charge left the house about half-past three o'clock to come to town, and when he returned found the house destroyed. The building is understood, says the Hirogo News, to have been insured. Mr. De Ath, we understand, had engaged to take the house during the hot weather.

Two Malay passengers, father and son, ran amok on board the steamer Sri Pontianak, near Singapore, on the 27th May. Armed with daggers they rushed amongst the passengers and crew, and three Chinamen, one Chinese woman, and one child were killed, and six Chinamen, two Chinese women, and four children were badly stabbed. Captain Koenig killed one of the murderers, and the other was wounded before being captured.

M. Doumer, Governor-General of Indo-China, left Hanoi for Yunnan on the 26th May. He is accompanied by Commandant Lysalle and Administrator Lagardie. Relays of ponies had already been prepared so that the journey from Laokay into the Chinese Province should be made with the least possible delay. M. Doumer has been very energetic during his brief term of office, and has proved himself a diligent Governor-General, as it was predicted he would be.

The Norwegian ship Viking has brought news to Leith of a letter written by Prof. Andree, which was found in a bottle early in April near Rifeang, on the northeast coast of Iceland, by a farmer named Johann Magnussen. The letter was then in a bottle addressed to the polar expedition at Cooiborg, and bore Andree's own stamp, with the request that it be placed in the nearest post office. Magnussen, it is added, gave the letter to a merchant, Sveinn Einarsen, at Thindford, who mailed it. The letter brought by the Viking was addressed to an Icelander now in London, describing the finding and forwarding of Andree's letter.

Visitors to Leadenhall Market, London, the other morning, saw the novel spectacle of four frozen Siberian bears exposed for sale in a shop. Although they had been dead some three months their skins were in splendid condition. There was a male 9 ft. long and 5 ft. in girth, a female 7½ ft. long and 4 ft. in girth, and two cubs. The male weighed 4 cwt., and the female a hundred-weight less. The consignment was in the nature of an experiment, and if the results prove encouraging the enterprising salesman intends embarking on a regular trade in bears. Many Parisians relish bear's meat, and it is therefore concluded that it should not be disagreeable to the English palate.

Mr. Maurice de Bunsen, who will be remembered by many in Japan as acting as British Chargé d'Affaires in Tokyo a few years ago, was married during the first week in May to Miss Berta Corry. The engagement had been broken off owing to Miss Corry's ill-health, and the marriage was therefore quite unexpected. The wedding took place in Scotland, the service being celebrated at the Church of St. James, Taymouth. Sir Everard Doyle was Mr. de Bunsen's best man, and there were only two bridesmaids—Miss Violet Corry and a niece of the bridegroom. Afterwards the happy pair drove to Mrs. Aymar Corry's shooting lodge; and later on they left for Constantinople, where Mr. de Bunsen is First Secretary at the British Embassy.

Admiral Dewey resumed his homeward voyage in the Olympia on the afternoon of June 6th, the flagship leaving her buoy in Hongkong harbour punctually at four o'clock. It was raining heavily at the time. When passing the Powerful the Olympia's band played the British National Anthem, the Powerful's band returning the compliment with "The Star-spangled banner." An Admiral's bugle salute then rang out from the Powerful, which was duly returned. As the Olympia passed the Italian cruisers Eina and Amerigo Vespucci a similar exchange of courtesies took place. The band of the Powerful then struck up "Home, Sweet Home," to which the Olympia replied with "Should Auld Acquaintance be Forgot," as she steamed rapidly off in the direction of the Lyceum Pass.

The opening ceremony of the Himmin Gakko (Charity School for poor children) founded at Yoshiokacho, Yokohama, by Mr. Hiranuma Senzo, took place on Monday. There was a large attendance, those present including Count Kabayama, Minister for Education; Baron Sengo, Governor of Tokyo; Mr. Asada, Governor of Kanagawa; Mr. Umeda, Mayor of Yokohama, and other distinguished personages in Yokohama and Tokyo. Mr. Hiranuma first spoke, and was followed by the Minister and others. Mr. Hoshi Toru made an interesting speech. He said he had been in Yokohama while young, and once studied here. He was the son of a poor man, and received his education in a similar school to the present one. He expected great results from the school, and he had strong sympathy with the work of Mr. Hiranuma. The master of the school also spoke. Afterwards foreign luncheon was served. We understand the students number 350 and that Mr. Hiranuma presented a suit of clothes to each.

Statistics on the relative amount of sunshine and rain in the States of Central Europe have been compiled by an energetic Frenchman. It appears that of all the countries of Europe Spain is that most blessed with sunshine, as in the course of a year she enjoys no fewer than three thousand hours of bright sun. Italy comes next with two thousand three hundred, and then France follows with two thousand two hundred. When we come to Germany the fall is still greater, for the central Empire only has the advantage of one thousand seven hundred hours of bright sunshine. Poor England is, of course, the worst off, as it can only boast of one thousand four hundred hours per annum, or rather less than half of that enjoyed by Spain. On the other hand, Great Britain has the largest amount of rainfall in the year. On the Continent the St. Bernard Alps are wet as any spot, but Germany is only about one-fifth as damp as Great Britain, Alsace being a trifle wetter than the country which has annexed it. Italy is not troubled with much rainfall, and Paris has surprisingly little, her total for the year not being quite one-sixth of that which falls in London.

SUGAR INDUSTRY IN HAWAII.

(FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.)

Honolulu, May, 1899.

Hawaii has become a part of the United States, but it is a monarchy still. King Kalakawa is dead, and Queen Liliuokalani is in self-imposed exile, but Hawaii has another king—king sugar. His rule daily grows more and more universal and despotic. Rich and poor of both sexes and of almost all ages feel the sway of his power. Other industries have been fostered by Government and people. This is especially true of the fruit and the coffee industries. Unquestionably both have great possibilities here. And they have not been fostered for their own sake alone. The more ultimate object has been to encourage a peasant proprietorship to "develop the small farmer" by introducing "brains and energy from the temperate zone" to make Hawaii "a land of homes." That diversified industries would promote the welfare of the Islands is recognized by press and people. But all in vain. King sugar is inexorable. With "Greater Profit" inscribed on his banner he compels the submission of all. The trees of coffee plantations abase themselves in the dust in his presence and the small farmer packs his trunks and seeks other fields.

In truth, the adaptation of this country to sugar growing is wonderful and the profits are simply intoxicating. Twenty-four per cent, and even thirty per cent, is spoken of as actually realized. One plantation has even paid five per cent, monthly for ten months past. Coffee-growing may or may not be a success; on that question there is a difference of opinion. But even granting that it is a success, a great success, not the most sanguine expects its profits to reach the half of the figures just given for sugar. And so it is not at all strange that right in the Olua district, the region of the most promising coffee farms, a gigantic sugar plantation has just been "promoted"—and it is the fear of many discerning lovers of the Islands, and the conviction of all, that this is to be repeated until every available foot of land adapted to sugar is planted with cane.

Sugar has been grown here for many years and so the adaptation of the soil to sugar-growing is not a matter of recent knowledge. It is irrigation which is of comparatively recent origin and which has proved the Islands to be one vast sugar plantation. A few plantations are watered from mountain streams brought down in ditches, as we so often see it done in Japan. But it is irrigation from artesian wells that is working wonders. From these wells the water is thrown into reservoirs 350 feet high, and with the very gradual slopes of the land this supplies a very large acreage. About 55,000 acres in sixty plantations are now growing cane.

The amount of cane produced is simply immense. The amount of sugar per acre runs from 3½ tons up to 15 tons. Now, as it requires eight tons of cane to produce one ton of sugar, it will be seen that the best land must produce 120 tons of cane to the acre.

On some plantations the cane when cut and stripped is floated down to the mills in "flumes," and it is an impressive sight to see the cane hurrying noiselessly along to its destination. Where this method is not available the cane is loaded on cars, tracks for which are laid all through the cane fields.

The sharp competition from beet sugar a few years ago led to the abandonment of the machinery in use up to that time and the substitution of the most modern and perfect machinery. The old machinery extracted but little more than one-half of the saccharine matter from the cane; the new machinery takes out from 93 to 97 per cent. of it. Some of the machinery comes from the United States, but the very best machinery is made in Honolulu itself.

The mills are wonderful illustrations of the success of science in saving time and labour. The cane is brought under the roof by flume or railway; seven hours later it is sugar in bags loaded on cars still under the same roof which (on Ewa for example) carry it to Honolulu for exportation.

The cane is crushed by three sets of rollers respectively of 360, 400, 410 tons pressure, and the juice is evaporated into sugar by machinery moved by steam from seven boilers, to heat which the crushed and pressed cane, or bagasse, is the only fuel used. The mill in question (Ewa), on the day preceding our visit, had thus turned out 2,200 bags of sugar of 125 pounds each. This plantation expects to send out 24,000 tons during 1899, and it is confidently believed that the 270,000 tons produced by these Islands in 1898 will in a few years reach the enormous aggregate of 350,000 tons. The value of sugar exported in 1898 was $14,933,000. With the profits mentioned above, or even the half of them, it can easily be seen that the Hawaiians have enough to turn their heads—and just now that needs a very real danger. Speculation bids fair to take precedence of production and a genuine American "boom," with all its attendant evils, is threatening the hitherto prosperous archipelago. In a subsequent letter I hope to write of the Japanese in Hawaii, to which letter this may be regarded merely as an introduction. M. L. G.

DEATH OF MR. LE POER TRENCH.

The Hon. P. H. Le Poer Trench, formerly H.B.M.'s representative in Tokyo, died on 30th April, at his London residence 26, Albion-street, Hyde Park. He was in his fifty-eighth year. The deceased was the fourth son of the third Earl of Clancarty, and entering the diplomatic service as an attaché in June, 1859, after passing his examination, was appointed to Paris in August, afterwards serving in Constantinople and Munich. Passing another examination, he was promoted to be Third Secretary in 1863, and transferred to Rio de Janeiro in 1865, and to Washington in 1868, where he was also Private Secretary to Sir Edward Thornton. He was promoted to be Second Secretary in 1870, after which he was temporarily employed in the Foreign Office. He was promoted to be Secretary of Legation at Tokyo in 1882. He was in charge of the Legation for nearly two years from August, 1887, to March, 1889, on the return home of Sir Francis Plunkett, and the ability he displayed in the negotiations for Treaty Revision with Japan brought to light his powers as a diplomatist. After serving in Berlin as Secretary of Embassy, he was promoted in 1893 to be Minister at Mexico, and when the Legation at Tokyo became vacant a year later, Lord Rosebery selected him, in view of his previous services to Japan, for the post. Mr. Trench arrived at Tokyo just after hostilities had broken out between China and Japan, but his health unfortunately gave way under the severe strain of his duties during that critical period. In the spring of 1895 he was struck down by an attack of paralysis and aphasia from which he never entirely recovered. He was invalided home, and retired on a pension in 1896. The funeral took place at Highgate Cemetery on 3rd ult.

TELEGRAMS.

FRENCH AFFAIRS.

Saigon, June 9.

The Socialists are organizing a demonstration for Sunday next, on the course at Longchamps, in favour of President Loubet.

Saigon, June 10.

Lieut.-Colonel Picquart has been set at liberty provisionally.

Saigon, June 11.

The Sfax, having Dreyfus on board, sailed from Cayenne this morning.

Saigon, June 12.

An enormous concourse of people assembled on the race-course at Longchamps in connexion with the demonstration organized by the Socialists. President Loubet was cheered continuously by an immense crowd from the time that he left the Palace of the Elysée until he reached the course at Longchamps. His appearance in the tribune was the signal for enthusiastic cries of Vive Loubet! Vive l'Armée!

Nothing untoward occurred. One or two collisions with the police took place, and there were a few arrests.

Saigon, June 13.

The ovation given to the President of the Republic was continued during his return to the Palais de l'Elysée.

Some disturbances took place, but they were isolated and of no gravity.

Later.

In yesterday's session of the Chamber of Deputies the Socialists attacked the Cabinet on the ground that the police had been guilty of brutality.

The Chamber, by 321 votes to 173, adopted a motion affirming the necessity of defending the Republic, but not expressing confidence in the Government. The Cabinet has resigned.

Saigon, June 14.

The Tribunal of Correctional Police has sentenced the Baron de Christiani to four years' imprisonment.

THE TRANSVAAL SITUATION. FURTHER DETAILS OF THE CONFERENCE.

London, June 9.

Mr. Chamberlain, Colonial Secretary, speaking in the House of Commons, has confirmed the report that the Bloemfontein Conference has so far proved resultless; that the British Government consider President Krüger's proposals, according to which no change in the franchise is to be effected for two years and then only in the case of those Uitlanders who have resided in the Transvaal for eleven years, as entirely inadequate; that Sir Alfred Milner has also informed President Krüger that England would not consent to the arbitration of a foreign power; and that the question of the dynamite monopoly has been reserved for further discussion.

London, June 10.

The Daily Graphic learns that the conclusion has forced itself upon the Ministers of State, that if the Transvaal persists in its present attitude, England has no alternative but a forcible solution.

The Chronicle believes that Mr. Chamberlain's reply to the Uitlanders' petition which will now be presented to the Boer Government, will convey an unmistakable intimation that, unless concessions are made, an ultimatum will follow.

London, June 12.

Latest despatches from Johannesburg report much excitement there. Owing, however, to anxiety to preserve peace, it is understood in Bloemfontein that President Krüger is willing to abolish the dynamite monopoly; while the Congo Free-State is pressing the Pretoria Government to grant reforms. Nevertheless trains have been dispatched to Johannesburg to provide for a possible exodus.

London, June 13.

The Times strongly urges an understanding between the Imperial and the Cape Governments, regarding the form the Imperial interference on the Transvaal affair should take.

London, June 15.

Mr. Chamberlain, speaking in the House of Commons, said that the Government was awaiting fuller despatches from Sir Alfred Milner before sending further instructions with regard to the Transvaal question.

The Times says that there is reason to believe that Germany and Holland are urging President Kruger to give way. The Times earnestly hopes that he will take their advice, but declares that, at any rate, Great Britain can not abate her insistence.

THE ANGLO-RUSSIAN AGREEMENT.

London, June 9.

Mr. St. John Brodrick, Under Secretary to the Foreign Office, speaking in the House of Commons, stated that, in the opinion of the Government, the Anglo-Russian agreement does not cover the question of railway communication with Peking.

THE JAPANESE LOAN.

Only twelve per cent. of the Japanese loan has been subscribed and the remainder has been underwritten and is quoted at 1½ discount.

ANTI-CHINESE ACT ALSO DISALLOWED.

London, June 10.

The Dominion Government of Canada has also annulled the anti-Chinese act of British Columbia.

COL. PICQUART RELEASED.

Later.

Col. Picquart (who had been confined in prison in connection with the Dreyfus affair) has been released.

ENGLAND AND CHINA.

TO PROTECT ENGLISH INTERESTS ON THE YANGTZE.

In a debate on China, in the House of Commons, Mr. St. John Brodrick, Under Secretary to the Foreign Office, stated that the British Government had proposed that in order to hold China to her undertaking not to alienate the provinces bordering on the Yangtze, England will see that a force be stationed upon the Yangtze valley, sufficiently strong to protect the merchants.

BRITISH ATTITUDE ON RUSSIAN DEMAND.

The Foreign Under Secretary further stated that the Government doubted whether a demand for Russian railway connection with Peking had ever been made, but that he must declare that if such a demand be pressed, England will be forced to advise the Yamen against taking any step calculated to subordinate the Chinese Government to another Power.

ENGINEERS' CORPS FOR NATAL.

London, June 12.

The twenty-third company of Engineers has sailed for Natal.

THE CRICKET MATCH.

The Australians have beaten Cambridge by ten wickets.

FRENCH CABINET RESIGNS.

London, June 13.

The Socialists in the French Chamber of Deputies moved for a censure for alleged brutality of the Police while suppressing the cases of scuffling at the races at Longchamps on Sunday last. The Chamber refused this, but rejected the vote of confidence in the Dupuy Cabinet, which in consequence has resigned.

FEARFUL CALAMITIES BEFALLING RUSSIA.

London, June 14.

Famine and disease are causing fearful ravages in the Eastern provinces of Russia, while the recent cold weather is ruining crops in the north and centre, and drought is doing the same thing in the south.

GERMANY AND ARBITRATION.

London, June 13.

At the Peace Conference Germany has refused to consent to the establishment of a permanent tribunal of arbitration without guarantee of the tribunal's impartiality.

THE ASSAULT ON PRESIDENT LOUBET.

Baron de Christiani, who struck President Loubet, has been sentenced to four years' imprisonment.

AUSTRALIANS v. YORKSHIRE.

The cricket match between the Australians and Yorkshire ended in a draw.

MORE DYNAMITE OUTRAGES IN KOREA. JAPANESE CONSULATE IN DANGER.

Soul, June 13.

Last night some dynamite bombs were thrown near the Japanese Consulate. Three natives were wounded. Dynamite was also thrown at the private residence of Mr. Ho-kow Tuk, Governor of Yeichon, and other bombs were found in the compound of the Metropolitan Police Bureau.

The riots in Tel-la Tai have been suppressed.

Soul, June 14.

Last night a dynamite bomb was exploded at the house of the absent Mr. Pak Yong Ho, and two natives were killed. It is said that the bomb exploded while it was being prepared. Some thirty persons were arrested. They are suspected of being connected with conspirators in Japan.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. BLACKBURN.

Sir George Newnes proposes that Great Britain shall honour her champion by a testimonial, as will be seen by the following letter from The Westminster Gazette :—

To the Editor of The Westminster Gazette :

Dear Sir,—I have been asked by a number of Chess-players to inaugurate a National Testimonial to Mr. J. H. Blackburn.

Since 1868 he played in all important tournaments at home and abroad, and in one instance was he not placed. Even then he was awarded a special prize. In all these he did battle in the name of Britain.

As a blindfold player he is admitted to be the most brilliant who has ever lived. This interesting and even sensational form of play, carried on in London and the provinces for more than thirty years, has done a great deal to popularize the game in this country. On one occasion, playing a number of opponents, without sight of boards or men, he successfully announced, in a most intricate position, "mate in seventeen moves."

The consistent way in which he has played for Britain v. America in the Cable-matches, culminating in his brilliant victory quite recently, has earned the gratitude of very many British Chess players. I believe there is a general feeling amongst devotees of the game throughout the country that the time has come when a substantial sum should be given to or invested for him, so if the strain of blindfold exhibitions proves too much in his declining years, when that period arrives (and long may it be delayed), he will have the solace and comfort of knowing that, through the willingness of his friends, there will be something to fall back upon. Subscriptions will be thankfully received by myself, the Hon. Secretary of the British Chess Club, the Hon. Secretary of the City of London Chess Club, or through the Hon. Secretary or Treasurer of any accredited Club who will kindly forward them to your obedient servant,

GEORGE NEWNES.

21 Kt B3	P Kt3	42 Resigns.

NOTES.

(a) The usual and proper play is P to Q 4, and Black brings about an even position. The play selected gives White an advantage.

(b) This enables White to advance the K P, which opens the diagonal for the White K B, and he obtains a pretty strong attack. Black, however, had hardly any better play.

(c) Preferable, perhaps, was P to K 5 at once. The exchange of bishops somewhat relieves the Black game, for the Queen can be brought into play.

(d) Quite forcible, yet it unnecessarily weakens the king's side. Kt to B3 at once was, perhaps, stronger.

(e) Preferable to Kt (K3) to B-q. Black keeps the Q B square open for the other knight.

(f) Better, perhaps, was R to K B 2.

(g) Kt to B-q would have guarded against the threatening check, and, apparently, Black's game was not in danger. It must be admitted, however, that the attack was with White, and continuations like Kt to K 2 and Kt to B 4, or Kt to B 5, followed by Kt takes B and R takes Kt were threatening. The text move sacrifices the exchange. Black gets the valuable Q P, and completely neutralizes the attack. The play was, perhaps, the best Black had on hand.

(h) Kt (K 2) to Q 4, was, perhaps, better. If Black answers B takes Kt, then Kt takes Kt would follow. White should have endeavoured to get rid of one of the knights.

(i) White might have played Kt takes P, followed by R (B 7) takes Kt and R takes Kt, heading to an even game. Black's Q P is somewhat dangerous, and White should have been satisfied with a draw.

(k) To guard against the threatening Kt to Kt 5 ch, followed by Kt to K 6.

(l) He could not play R takes Q P on account of Kt to B 4 ch and R takes R.

(m) A disastrous mistake, which loses the game, as Black's Kt (B 4) to K 6 reply shows. He should have played K to K 2, in which case Black would have answered Kt to Kt 6 ch, followed by Kt to K 5, or Kt to Q 5 ch, followed by Kt to Kt 6 ch, but in either variation, by proper play, White can hold his own.

(n) After this move the game was adjourned, but, White coming out a piece behind, surrendered before resuming play.

GAME No. 518.

CHESS IN OLD PHILADELPHIA.

The following interesting game and notes are taken as specimen of play in the Quaker City of bygone years, from the new book, "Chess in Philadelphia," recently published by Messrs. G. Reichen and W. P. Shipley, of that city.

Played in the Athenæum in the early forties.

SICILIAN DEFENCE.

White—Mr. C. Vezin. Black—Mr. J. Thompson

WHITE.

1—P to K 4

BLACK.

1—P to Q B 4

Mr. James Thompson in those days was the Murat of chess and more feared than stronger but duller players. In this partie, the genial master of the Athenæum gives Mr. T. a dose of his own medicine.

2—P to K B 4

2—P to K 3

3—K Kt to B 3

3—P to Q 4

NOTES.

Showalter and Pillsbury sailed for Southampton at the beginning of May in order to participate in the great international chess tournament which opened in London on May 31st. Pillsbury, says an American exchange, is confident that he will be successful in carrying off one of the valuable prizes offered by the tourney committee and he expressed a hope that his visit to Europe may result in an arrangement being made by which Lasker and himself will do battle for the world's championship. Showalter, who was accompanied by his wife and child, was in capital spirits, but would make no predictions as to his eventual success in the coming contest. His wife, who shares with Mrs. Harriett Wood the distinction of being the strongest woman player in the United States, will return in season to be entered as a competitor in the International Woman's Chess Congress, which is expected to be held in the fall.

The first contest by cable between the English and American colleges resulted in a win for England by 3½ to 2½ games. There was not much about the match to create excitement or enthusiasm, as numbers of chances were missed on both sides, but the match had its interesting features and will doubtless be repeated next year.

The Major Tournament of the Scottish Chess Association was won by D. G. Mills, who thus remains Champion of Scotland.

The Ladies' Chess Club intend doing a graceful act in connection with the forthcoming London tournament. The idea is to present a special souvenir, in the shape of a substantial gold medal, to the first prize-winner in each tournament, and also to the winner of the most brilliant game.

THE PAWN.

I.
In hottest fight he's never shirky,
He never jumps wif' motion quicky,
O'er the board;
But often wif' a sudden jerk he Loups at an opposing binkie
Wif' his sword.

II.
Tae every coward he's a model,
Tae holt ne'er comes into his noddle;
E'en the Queen,
When he gets a proper hand, he'll Mak' wif' bitter shame tae toddle
Off the scene.

III.
On he gauges in gallant fashion,
Knights and Rooks he lays the lash on Wif' a swing;
Then tae crown he makes a dash on,
And in regicidal passion
Slays the King.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, JUNE 10TH, 1899.

BIRTH.

On 8th inst., at 104, Settlement, Yokohama, the wife of HUBERT J. OWAN, of a daughter (stillborn).—[Shanghai papers please copy.]

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

THE Transvaal situation is regarded as being very grave.

THE plague is extending in Egypt, Europeans being now attacked.

THE death is reported of Colonel Mima Seiko, ex-Governor of Ishikawa Prefecture.

THE opening of the Iyogo canal took place at 2 p.m. on Monday, and was attended by about 500 persons.

COL. DU PATT DE CLAM has been arrested charged with forgeries in connection with the Dreyfus affair.

MARQUIS YAMAGATA, the Premier, has been the recipient of the Grand Cordon of the Red Eagle from the Kaiser.

THE other day a woman aged 35, wife of a pedler living at Sanyacho, Asakusa, Tokyo, murdered her child while her husband was away from home, and then committed suicide. She had been afflicted with hypochondria.

COUNT ITAGAKI and some political adherents left Shimbashi on Wednesday morning on a canvassing tour to Kyushu.

ESTERHAZY has confessed to being the author of the bordereau that led to Dreyfus' conviction. He is in hiding in London.

EIGHT lives were lost in Kobe harbour on Saturday last, during a gale that suddenly sprang up from the south-west.

HONGKONG is suffering from a recrudescence of the plague, and along with Swatow has been officially declared an infected area.

A KOREAN who was suspected of having come to Japan to compass an assassination, has been deported by order of the authorities.

MR. ARTHUR DIOSY continues to receive unbounded hospitalities by the leading Japanese residents of Tokyo and Yokohama.

THE Court of Cassation has quashed the verdict in the Dreyfus case and ordered his return to Rennes, to be again tried by Court-martial.

AT the instance of Mr. Chamberlain, Colonial Secretary, the Dominion Government of Canada has disallowed the British Columbian anti-Japanese Act.

THE construction of the Ikarigasaki-Hirasawa section on the Aomori railway having been completed, the line will be opened for traffic from the 16th inst.

THE President of the French Republic, while attending the Autenil races, was struck on the hip by a young nobleman. The affair created a great sensation in France.

OWING to the small number of passengers by express-trains between Kobe and Osaka, the authorities are said to have decided to suspend the service for the present.

THE Emperor of Japan has presented a decoration to the Emperor of China, and during the week Mr. Yano, the Japanese representative, had the honour of an imperial audience at Peking.

THE Venerable Archdeacon Warren, while making an inspection of some mission houses at Fukuyama, Bingo Province, fell down a flight of steps into a cellar and received such injuries that he died on the 7th inst.

CASES of contagious eye disease were discovered a few days ago among students in the Elementary Schools at Hongo district, Tokyo, and the number of patients is reported to have reached a total of 430.

A SMALL Japanese schooner was driven ashore at Negishi last Saturday during the height of the gale. The P. & O. steamer Rosita, on her voyage from Kobe to Yokohama, picked up the crew of a large junk that was dismantled by the same storm.

A GAS explosion took place at Janno Colliery, Fukuoka Prefecture, on the 25th ult. About 2 a.m. a miner entered the pit carrying a hand lamp, when an explosion occurred, hurling the man a distance of about 250 feet and killing him.

THREE European teachers (to be placed on the same footing as officials of chokunin rank) are to be engaged at a yearly emolument of from 3,000 yen to 8,000 yen by the Police and Gao School, to be opened in September. A Judge in the Berlin Local Court is said to have been secured through the Japanese Minister there.

THE total number of applicants in the examination for Court interpreters is 35, of whom three-fourths profess proficiency in the English language. In regard to interpreters of the French, German, Russian and Chinese languages, the requisite number is far from being obtained.

MESSERS. KELLY AND WALSH have been served at Singapore with an injunction against selling Mr. Foreman's book on "The Philippines," by Mr. E. S. Pratt, the U.S. Consul-General at Singapore, who is suing for libel on account of an interview with Aguinaldo therein described being false.

AN official instruction has been issued to cities and provinces to the effect that statesmen like Marquis Ito, Count Okuma, Count Itagaki, Viscount Miura, and others who rendered meritorious services to the state in the Restoration shall be guarded without distinction of political views.

THE Spanish Cortes has been opened at Madrid. The speech from the Throne announced the cession to Germany of the Caroline, Palao, and the Mariana Islands, in consideration of a payment of 25 millions of pesetas. Spain keeps a coaling station in each group which Germany is required to defend in case of war.

THE Committee of the Peace Conference has resolved to prohibit the use of Dumdum bullets. The dissentients to the resolution are England, Italy, and Austria; nor is the Conference likely to endorse the Committee. The question of the reduction of armaments is not making progress, owing to pronounced differences of opinion among the delegates.

THE imports and exports during May at Yokohama, Nagasaki, and Kobe were as follows:—

	Imports.	Exports.	Excess of Imports.
Yokohama.	4,407,354	6,346,835	1,987,541
Kobe	692,599	10,594,216	3,691,617
Nagasaki ..	529,845	689,484	159,639
Total ...	11,839,798	17,680,535	5,840,707

A BAG of registered letters was stolen last month at the Osaka Post Office. It contained three cheques for 3,000 yen drawn on the branch of the 3rd National Bank and the Hemmi Bank by a merchant of Kanazawa, and other cheques, money orders, etc., amounting to from 22,000 to 23,000 yen, forwarded from Kanazawa Post Office. The theft was discovered when a payee at Osaka demanded by wire payment from the Kanazawa merchant, stating that no cheque had arrived. Meanwhile the Hemmi Bank had cashed one cheque for 2,000 yen.

MR. HIROMI JINZABURO, owner of the steamer Nara Maru, which sunk near the Pescadores in 1897, instituted a claim for 60,000 yen, against the Japan Marine Insurance Company, as the Company declined payment of insurance on the plea that the scene of the accident was outside the limits of the insurance policy. Judgment being given for the defendants, the unsuccessful litigant brought the matter before the Appeal Court, but again failed, and he then appealed to the Supreme Court. Now both parties are reported to have nearly arrived at an amicable understanding.

THE NEW LOAN.

Saturday, June 3rd.

It is announced that the six instalments in which the new loan is to be paid will be £5 per £100 on application; £15 on the day of allotment; £15 on the 17th of July; £15 on the 17th of August; £20 on the 17th of September, and £20 on the 17th of October. But as £4 out of every £90 go to the intermediaries and underwriters, the sum actually received by Japan will be only 86 million yen, which brings the rate of interest to 4.65 per cent. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun affirms that the delay in concluding the agreement about this loan was due to opposition organized by Messrs. Samuel Samuel & Company, who had been the first to apply for it, but such a theory is difficult to credit. We find it much easier to suppose that the Minister of Finance hesitated, as was very natural, to close with terms which can not be called particularly favourable. Concerning the commission of £4 paid to the underwriters and intermediaries, our contemporary points out that it is not in excess of the usual figure under such circumstances—an almost superfluous explanation. We presume, however, that if the loan is subscribed at a higher price than £90, the Japanese Government will enjoy the benefit.

Monday, June 5th.

There is a marked difference of journalistic opinion about the new loan. The journals of the Opposition, vehemently led by the Hochi Shimbun, denounce the transaction as a flagrant blunder, call the rate of interest usurious, and insist that no just comparison can be set up between the Consols and War Bonds which are now on the eve of redemption, and these newly issued bonds which have ten years to run without redemption. The five-per-cent. War Bonds and Consols are now selling for 96 or 97 in Japan, though they may be redeemed at any moment, whereas the new four-per-cent. have been issued at 86 with ten years of interest certainly accruing. These journals apparently fail to perceive that although a capitalist prefers, for purposes of investment, a security which has a long period to run, he will not sell at a heavy discount a security which may be redeemed to-morrow at par.

The pro-Government journals, on the contrary, applaud the transaction. They admit that if the bonds are subscribed for at a much higher figure than 90, the Finance Department will be convicted of having given too favourable terms to the syndicate, but they do not anticipate such a result. We may mention, in this context, that, so far as we can see, the Syndicate is to reap the full benefit of any price above 90 which the public is willing to subscribe. Our own belief is that the bonds will sell for at least 92 or 93 in the London market, and that the Syndicate will make fully two million yen over and above the four per cent. already secured to it, but other folks think differently. Be that as it may, the Ministerial organs and the independent journals lay stress on the fact that the Government has succeeded in obtaining the loan without giving any security, and that it has reserved to itself the right of redeeming the bonds in whatever quantities it pleases after 1908, provided only that the process of redemption must be completed by 1953. Having that discretion, Japanese financiers may take advantage of any favourable occasion to convert the loan, or to pay it off altogether.

In answer to the erroneous contention that since China was able to obtain 90 for her 4½ per cent. bonds, the sale of Japan's 4 per cents. at 86 places the two countries in virtually the same financial category, the Kokumin Shimbun publishes a table the details of which are very interesting:—

	Rate of Issue per £100.	Nominal Rate of Interest, per cent.	Real Rate of Interest, per cent.
Japan's first foreign loan, in 1870	98	9	7.6
Japan's second loan, in 1873.....	90	7	7.6
Japan's third (the present) loan, in 1899	90	4	4.4
Japanese Loan	90	4	4.4
Chinese Loan.....	84	4.5	5.4
German Loan.....	91	3	3.206
Russian Loan.....	101	4	3.960

In this table no account is taken of the payments made to underwriters—4 per cent. in the case of Japan's last loan—because such expenses are inevitable in every case. Attention is further called to the fact that, in order to obtain money at 5.4 per cent. interest, China had to pledge her customs duties and other securities, whereas Japan does not give any security whatever. The Syndicate is said to have pressed very hard for security of some kind, but the Japanese Government obstinately refused to entertain the demand. That was one of the reasons of the delay in concluding the agreement. Another, and even a more serious one, was the Japanese negotiators' insistence that the right of redeeming the loan at any time and in any quantity between 1908 and 1953 should be reserved to Japan. The trouble in connexion with that point, says the Kokumin, was more than outsiders can conceive.

A very remarkable fact is the fluctuations that Japanese Consols and War Bonds have recently undergone. Throughout April they were quoted at 95 or less, but in May they gradually rose to 96, 97 and 98, until, on the 20th of that month, they reached par, a quotation not recorded for several years. Their elevation, however, was of brief duration, for after a week they began to fall again, dropping from 99.50 on May 30th to 96.70 on June 1st, and to 95.60 on June 2nd. The Mainichi Shimbun has an irate article on this subject. It charges the Government with having "bulled" the market by buying up Consols and War Bonds in order to create abroad a falsely favourable impression about the state of Japan's finances, and it alleges that the rapid depreciation of the past few days is solely due to the withdrawal of the Treasury's sustaining hand. There does not, indeed, appear to be much room for doubt that the rapid movement of these securities was due mainly to purchases by the Treasury and the Bank of Japan, but the motive of the purchases is another question. As for the Bank of Japan, it has lately had large repayments made to it by its clients, and since the necessity of paying a tax on its note issues became imperative from April 1st, it probably found that the only way to avoid loss was to invest its surplus funds in War Bonds and Consols. The Treasury, on the other hand, has to redeem a considerable quantity of these securities during the current fiscal year, a fact which immediately accounts for its operations, though it is not impossible that the time was chosen so as to suit the negotiations for the new foreign loan.

Wednesday, June 7th.

The journals of the Opposition continue to assault the Government vehemently about the terms of the loan. They speak of the transaction as a financial failure. Even the Nichi Nichi Shimbun, though it refrains from any extreme view, and prefers to describe the agreement as fairly satisfactory, nevertheless seems inclined to adopt an apologetic tone, for it repeats the statement originally advanced in other quarters, namely, that the situation was sensibly complicated by the hostility of certain great capitalists whose offers of co-operation Japan had rejected. There is no difficulty in identifying the capitalists in question, but there is much difficulty in imagining that they would have resorted to such devices. What surprises us is the extremely unpractical nature of these criticisms. On what grounds do the Japanese base their right of easy access to the money markets of the West? It is true that they are well able to pay their way, but it is equally true, and far more patent, that their methods of paying their way are not consistent with any principles of sound finance. If the Diet had accepted Count Matsukata's programme in its entirety last session, the European estimate of Japan's condition would be very different to-day. But by confounding politics and economics there resulted a scheme which we ventured to describe at the time as "finnikin finance," and which, in the eyes of foreign observers, was suggestive of great embarrassment. The raising of the railway fares and of the rates of posts and telegraphs may bring Japan a few thousands of pounds at the moment, but will be found to have cost her millions of yen in loss of credit. If her party politicians choose to represent her to the world in the guise of a country leading a hand-to-mouth existence, they can hardly expect the world to see gilt on the edges of her securities.

Friday, June 9th.

The Chiuo Shimbun says that the subscriptions for the new Japanese loan, the period for which came to an end on the 6th instant, were at first very brisk, but that they afterwards fell off, the final quotation being £89 6s. 3d. for the £90 bonds. Our contemporary observes that the Syndicate are to be commiserated, and that it can not but regret the low condition of Japan's credit in Europe. We certainly expected a more favourable result, but the Minister of Finance may at least congratulate himself on having obtained the best terms consistent with the state of the market.

The same journal (Chiuo) publishes the following remarks of Count Matsukata's with reference to the loan:—"The arrangements for this loan entailed great trouble. Numbers of cipher telegrams had to be sent. Sometimes their composition involved a whole night's labour. We received 50 telegrams from London and sent 30 from our side. The negotiations began at the end of April, and Nakai, of the Specie Bank's London branch, chiefly conducted them. In the beginning they said we must give security. We declined to do anything of the kind. Then they said we should have to take instalments. To that also we would not consent. The discussion went on for a long time. But the full account of the real state of Japanese finance published by the London Times was very fortunate. Up to that time people had supposed that Japan's finances were in disorder, and the constant outcry raised on this side for foreign capital had the effect of preventing things from moving. Just then The Times came out with full and emphatic utterances, and people's ideas underwent a change. They were enabled to understand Japan's financial condition, and our credit was restored. . . . As to the statements made in the newspapers about Messrs. Samuel Samuel & Co. having done this or that, they are irresponsible talk. The papers say that Mr. Mitchell offered to take the loan at 95. It is true that he did so, but his rate of interest was 4½! I imagine that 90 at 4 per cent. is a better business than 95 at 4½! The bonds will be issued during the present month; a quick operation, and as the Argentine, Chinese, and Russian loans had to be raised previously, the syndicate are said to have been very uneasy. I think we may feel satisfied that we have done very well."

COUNT OKUMA AND THE CHINESE.

Count Okuma was invited on the 31st ultimo to address the members of the Chuka Kaikwan in Kobe. The Chuka Kaikwan is an association of Chinese merchants, and "Middle-flower Society" is the meaning of the appellation they give themselves. Count Okuma spoke to them in very plain language. The gist of his speech was that China is being surely but quietly cut to pieces. A few officials, who exercise arbitrary sway, are signing away the country's independence, and the 400 millions of people vitally interested in the result know nothing of what is going on. If there is a dangerous lack of national spirit and of patriotism in China, the fault lies, in Count Okuma's opinion, at the door of these incompetent and corrupt officials, who make no attempt to educate the people, and who sit with folded hands while foreign States are scoring upon their country's map lines which are euphemistically called limits of spheres of influence, but which may at any moment assume a very sinister significance. It does not do now-a-days to rely on time as a remedial agent. Things no longer move in the leisurely grooves of olden days. Nations not prepared for a crisis are sure to be overwhelmed by it when it comes, for no interval for preparation will be allowed to them. The great want of China, then, in Count Okuma's opinion is the political education of the masses, and he urged his Kobe hearers to do what they could towards supplying the need. He thinks that upon Chinese subjects, who by travel and residence in foreign countries have learned something of the world, devolves the duty of rousing their fellow-nationals from the lethargy in which they are now plunged. It was a very stirring speech. We imagine that its chief effect upon a Chinese audience must have been to suggest the desirability of getting rid of their present officials, which is another way of describing the overthrow of the Manchu dynasty. It is not our business to advocate incidents of that kind, but we may note that many students of the time share Count Okuma's view. His Excellency deprecated the notion of blood-shed, but qualified even that note of moderation by saying that the safety of the State must outweigh all other considerations.

THE SŌUL-WIJU RAILWAY.

Monday, June 5th.

It is not often that we find the Yomiuri Shimbun and the Jimmin writing in accord, for the former represents the Progressists, the latter the Liberals. But the recently circulated rumour that the concession of the Sōul-Wiju Railway had been offered for sale by the French concessionaire to a Japanese capitalist, brings the two journals into the same camp at once. They contend that the Railway ought to be acquired by Japan without a moment's hesitation; first, because it would add some fifty per cent. to the value of the Sōul-Fusan line; secondly, because, when connected with the Chinese system, the road would form part of the overland route from the Far-East to Europe and Central Asia, thus making Japan the central station on that route; and thirdly, because a most beneficial effect would be produced on the trade between Japan and China, which result would conduce to the peace of the East. Concerning the money for carrying out the undertaking, Count Okuma, speaking recently to the business-men of Osaka, suggested that by combining with Chinese capitalists the Japanese might obtain large funds for useful enterprises. That idea is welcomed as brilliant, and the newspapers from which we quote, urge that it should be put into practice for the purposes of the Sōul-Wiju line.

This incident emphasizes the terrible disadvantage under which the Japanese labour for lack of capital. The spirit is willing enough, in their case, but the purse is shallow. Yet, there is a comical element in the matter: a nation pecuniarily impotent to construct much needed railways within its own gates, is burning to build lines in foreign countries! Besides, there is the very important query, would a line from Sōul to Wiju pay a dividend. We think it very doubtful. If the road from Sōul to Fusan, which traverses the most populous districts of Korea, presents such questionable prospects that no one can be found to put up money for its construction, what chances are there for the Sōul-Wiju road? As for connecting a Korean grand trunk line with the Chinese system of railways, one does not immediately see how the feat is to be accomplished. Manchuria lies in the way. Russia will have a railway running through central Manchuria from north to south. It will bifurcate above the Liaotung Peninsula, one part passing down the Peninsula to Talien and Port Arthur, the other trending westward to Newchwang, whence the British line to Shan-hai-kan will connect it with the Chinese system—if, indeed, an independent Russian line be not built. Russia will also have her great trans-Asian road, running west and east across a part of northern Manchuria. With which of these Russian railways could the Sōul-Wiju line be connected? To establish connexion with either of them would be a heavy engineering enterprise, and would also depend on Russia's coöperation. But Russia may be supposed to entertain two intentions. The first is to make Talien and Newchwang the great sea-ports for the southward trade of Central Asia; the second is to make Vladivostok the transcontinental station for Japan. Neither intention is consistent with the project of a Sōul-Wiju road. It appears to us, therefore, that the Yomiuri and the Jimmin are more emotional than practical when they urge the purchase of the Sōul-Wiju concession. It should occur to them that if the expectations they found on the line were at all likely to be realized, the French concessionaire would not be found trying to dispose of it to Japanese capitalists.

Tuesday, June 6th.

It is stated journalistically in Tokyo that although the idea of purchasing the Concession for the Sōul-Wiju Railway has been taken up with some zest in Japan, the terms demanded by the French concessionaire are almost prohibitively high. This gentleman is evidently trying to play off Japan against Russia, a very wise proceeding from his point of view. It is said that he offered the concession in the first place to the Government in St. Petersburg, as was very natural, but that he failed to get what he wanted, or anything like what he wanted, and thereafter he turned his face to Japan. The Nippon alleges that, in consideration of the great importance of the railway to this country, the Foreign Office in Tokyo is actively seeking to effect some arrangement, but finds no margin for reasonable operations. Is the Nippon well informed? In the first place, the period of the concession has nearly expired, we believe. Unless the work of construction is commenced before the end of this month, the concession lapses. Possibly the Korean Government might be disposed to renew it, but if there is money to be made out of the thing, Korean statesmen will be false to their record unless they proceed so as to secure the profits for themselves. They can manage that very easily by simply declining to renew the concession for its present holder. Plainly there are many possibilities connected with the enterprise, and we can hardly think that the Foreign Office in Tokyo finds itself resourceless, or even embarrassed, because a high price has been asked by the French holder of the concession.

THE NEW POLITICAL PARTY.

The partitioning of the new political party appears to be progressing slowly but surely. Concerning its prospects the latest statement is that several members of the Liberal Party are likely to join it and that the latter, resenting such a conjuncture, is disposed to show its teeth. Two are needed, however, to make a fight, and the new Party evidently does not want to try conclusions with the Liberals. In reply to a message savouring of defiance from the latter, it is represented as having replied that its campaign will be against the positions now occupied by the Progressists; that it is not making any effort to obtain recruits from the Liberal ranks, though it can not reasonably refuse to receive them if they come, and that paltry points of friction should not be suffered to dislocate a coöperation which has hitherto worked usefully. A Tokyo journal shrewdly suggests that the relations between the new Party and the Liberals will depend on the former's dimensions. If the Kokken-to, after organization, is found to be no larger than the defunct National Unionists, there will be no occasion for the Liberals to gird at it, but if it be of formidable size, it will be regarded as a second Richmond in the field.

MR. HOSHI TORU.

Monday, June 5th.

Fortune seems to have fairly taken Mr. Hoshi Toru under her charge. She is determined to keep him before the public, a result which politicians find very useful. Just as his name had ceased to be on everybody's lips, an incident occurred which brings him again into notoriety. Mr. Hoshi's Tokyo residence being in the Kojimachi district of Tokyo, he resolved to offer himself as a candidate for the district in the present election for the City Assembly. The law provides, however, that to be eligible for election a man must have resided two years in the district he desires to represent. Mr. Hoshi has not been residing for two years in Kojimachi. He was absent in Washington as Japanese Minister until last autumn. The Headman of the Kojimachi district, in consideration of that fact, removed Mr. Hoshi's name from the list. Quite a sensation resulted. The columns of the Tokyo press teem with the question, not simply because of the principle involved, but because the Headman is suspected of having been influenced by political motives. Mr. Hoshi and his friends claim that the residential qualification prescribed by law does not mean the presence of a man in person. If it bore any such signification, then a candidate for election must remain constantly in the same district for two years before offering himself as a candidate. He could not even travel to another town on business without rendering himself ineligible. It is true that Mr. Hoshi was in Washington, but he kept up his house in the Kojimachi district all the time and his family resided there. The other side confine themselves to the simple contention that absence can not be regarded as residence. Legal proceedings have been instituted against the Headman, and once more Mr. Hoshi Toru is the talk of the town.

Wednesday, June 7th.

The Department of Home Affairs has issued an instruction to the district officials of Tokyo City, in the sense that absence abroad on official duty does not constitute any disqualification for the full enjoyment of public rights. Mr. Hoshi Toru thus comes out victorious. The officials of Kojimachi District declared him lacking in the necessary qualifications because he had spent in Washington the greater part of the two years which constitute the residential condition of eligibility. He naturally disputed a ruling so extravagant, and pointed out that if temporary absence be a disqualification, all the franchise-holders in the empire must remain fixed, each in his own district, during the two years prior to election. Zest will be added to this victory by the fact that the Kojimachi officials are supposed to have acted in the interests of the Progressists. Mr. Hoshi's political opponents.

The Fiji Shimpō turns the occasion to account in its cartoon columns. Its caricaturist depicts Mr. Hoshi as a deity carried by the citizens in festival procession, which is suddenly arrested by two Progressist officials holding a rope stretched across the road. Mr. Hoshi is a square effigy—the Japanese word "square" (shikaku) being homonymous with "qualification,"—and is identified by his star-shaped (hoshi-gata) face. This is a caricature in thorough accord with Japanese taste.

THE JAPANESE NOBILITY.

A series of unfortunate events have brought the Japanese nobility into evil repute of late. The Tokugawa family, the Sakai family, the Okubo family, and the Daigo family are all under a cloud. Tokyo journals find in these facts a theme for homilies. It does not appear that there is any desire to denounce the institution of nobility, but there is an evident conviction that the idle life led by the nobles in the capital, and their freedom from any necessity to work for a living, produce a demoralizing effect. The Fiji urges that they should be compelled to reside in the provinces, and that regular employment should be found for them, but how either of those recommendations is to be carried into practice, our contemporary does not attempt to explain. A nobleman is as fully entitled as a commoner to the rights guaranteed by the constitution, and one of those rights is sanctity of domicile. A Japanese subject, whatever his rank or social status, is free to live where he pleases and how he pleases within the limits of law and order. The chief interest attaching to these discussions is that they sometimes shed light on Japan's history as read by the Japanese. The Fiji Shimpō, for example, refers in this context, to the administrative system of the Tokugawa with much admiration. Iyeyasu, in his great scheme of feudal organization, not only distributed the nobles in such a manner that they acted as a check upon each other politically, but he also contrived that if they had the power of the sword, they should not have the power of the purse too. In pecuniary affairs they were dependent upon commoners—the merchant class. Each territorial noble had a kura-yashiki (store-house) in Osaka, whither he sent rice as security for loans obtained from the merchants of that city. Without the coöperation of the merchant he could never have carried on. The Fiji is disposed to admire that system. But are we to understand that the Fiji admires the nobility of Tokugawa times? If so, it will have few rivals in its admiration. It always seems to us a little extravagant to discuss the circumstances of a particular class of society because a few of its members happen to disgrace themselves. Such discussions have been of periodical occurrence in England in connexion now with the nobility, now with the clergy, now with some other section of society. But it is not the class that makes the man. Idle folks with assured incomes must always be specially liable to succumb to the temptations of the world, the flesh and the devil, and since idle folks with assured incomes will always be features of every civilized community until some radical change is effected in the distribution of wealth, there is nothing to be gained by controversies of the kind that now occupy journalistic comments in Tokyo.

THE TOKYO ELECTION.

Tuesday, June 6th.

Everybody is looking forward with hope to the new City Assembly of Tokyo. It has a fine field if it really applies itself to removing from the capital of Japan the reproach of being the most unprogressive city in the civilized world. The Fiji Shimpō keeps importuning the Assembly to do something, and laughs at its extraordinary timidity in granting supplies or imposing taxes. Recently, after a painful struggle with its proclivities, it voted a million yen for road-making, the expenditure of that total to be spread over a term of five years at the rate of 200,000 yen a year. Even Osaka, which has a population equal to only one-fifth of that of Tokyo, spends a great deal more for the same purpose. Tokyo's municipal revenue is only 1,260,000 yen, whereas Osaka's is over a million, and New York's is 80 millions.

Thursday, June 8th.

It is understood, we presume, that the elections now on the eve of being concluded in Tokyo are for one-half of the members of the City Assembly, it being the rule that a moiety of the Assembly is changed every second year. The Assembly has hitherto been controlled by the Progressist Party, which may be said to have its stronghold in Tokyo. But there seems to be a very general belief that the Liberals will be found in the majority, or at least that they will command a force equal to that of the Progressists, after the present elections. Mr. Hoshi Toru has been returned for the Kojimachi District, wresting the seat from a Progressist candidate. It is a singular fact, however, that no two of the estimates published by vernacular newspapers agree as to the relative strength of the parties' representatives. Even with regard to the affinities of the 30 members that continue to sit in the Assembly, there are flagrant differences of opinion. We shall not tax our readers' patience by quoting the various numerical statements, especially as the voting in the assembly for the offices of President and Vice-President on the 12th instant will decide the question. The Liberal candidates will be Messrs. Hoshi Toru and Nakajima Matagoro, and the Progressists will put up Messrs. Sudo Tokiichiro and Maruyama Meisei. It really matters very little to the public at large what may be the complexion of the Tokyo City Assembly, except from the point of view that nothing could possibly be worse than the way it has managed the affairs of the metropolis in the past, and that any change in its composition is to be welcomed as affording at least a chance of some improvement.

SHINAGAWA ELECTRIC LIGHT COMPANY.

There have been so many defalcations in Japanese commercial, industrial, and banking companies during the past few years that another instance will not surprise anybody. Yet the Company now in trouble enjoys the reputation of being a thoroughly sound concern, and is under the presidency of Mr. Yano Jiro, formerly Director of the Commercial School, a man of great business talent. The Shinagawa Electric Light Company was organized in 1889 with a capital of a million yen and a charter for 35 years. A few months ago rumours began to be circulated that a deficiency had been discovered in the accounts. The matter did not, however, attract much attention until recently, when a meeting of the shareholders was summoned, and the President informed them that defalcations aggregating 40,118 yen had been found in the accounts. We do not know whether the defaulter has been detected, but it is said that the shareholders are considerably perturbed and that they insist upon the directors making themselves responsible.

JAPANESE LADIES AND THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

The ladies of Japan, or, at least, the most prominent ladies in Tokyo, have openly joined their European and American sisters in forming a league to promote the purposes of the Peace Conference. In publishing their names they have also published a species of manifesto, wherein they combat the objections that have been urged against the course they are pursuing. The first objection amounts to this, that with so much to effect for the improvement of their own status at home, the time has not yet come for them to make excursions abroad. To that they answer, very naturally, that they have responded to an invitation addressed to them by the ladies of Germany; that every time is the right time for doing a right thing, and that, whatever work remains for them to do at home, they think that they have a title to be distinguished, and to distinguish themselves, from the ladies of China and Korea. The second objection is that the Peace Conference is merely a pleasant kind of fiction, and that practical people should have nothing to say to it. To that they reply that whatever be the practical outcome of the Conference they can not choose but sympathize with its avowed motives, and that sympathy is what they intend to show by joining the ladies' league. We do not, for our own part, see the necessity of these excuses and explanations. The second objection seems especially frivolous. If all the civilized Powers of the world combine to send delegates to the Conference, how can any one gravely allege that ladies should refrain from associating themselves with such an unpractical enterprise? As to not stretching out their hands abroad because they have not yet obtained due recognition at home, that is precisely an argument against which the ladies are bound to protest most vehemently. A public act of the kind they have now performed is distinctly a step towards the goal which their critics blame them for not having reached.

JOHN BULL IN JAPAN.

John Bull now figures on the canvas of the Japanese caricaturist. The Fiji Shimpō trots him out, not in his conventionally sleek and portly form, but in the shape of a somewhat diminutive and exceedingly vulgar looking person, identifiable only by his top-boots, his mutton-chop whiskers, and his Quaker hat. He is depicted in one cartoon feeling the pulse of Count Matsukata who suffers from a headache that has swelled his cranium to enormous dimensions, and draws drops of agony from his brow. On the next page, the sick man's cure is effected. The vast development of his head has been transferred to his paunch, he spreads his arms abroad—the "flourish of big hands" indicative of achievement in Japan—and he raises aloft a cup overflowing with ice—kōri, which has the second meaning of "high interest." John Bull stands off from his some-time patient, and exults inanely over the cure. The editor of the Fiji Shimpō ought to have a better entente with his caricaturist, for though the journal itself does not condemn the recent loan as an unsuccessful transaction, these pictures certainly convey that impression.

GERMANY'S NEW ACQUISITIONS IN THE PACIFIC.

The deal that Germany has just made with Spain is a remarkable, though not an altogether unexpected coup. For a sum of 25 millions of pesetas, to million yen approximately, Germany acquires the Caroline, the Palao, and the Mariana Islands. For the sake of those who are not strong in geography, we may explain that though three separate groups of islands appear to be indicated, the three in reality constitute the components of the widely scattered archipelago generally known as the Carolines. The Spaniards habitually divided the archipelago into the Western, the Central and the Eastern Carolines, and of these divisions the Western is otherwise known as the Pelew, or Palao, Islands; the Central, as the Carolines; and the Eastern, as the Mulgrave archipelago, the Mariana Islands, or Ladrões lying farther north. The Carolines, in fact, extend from 3° to 11° north latitude, and from 135° to 177° east longitude, while the Ladrões extend from 13° to 21° north latitude, and from 144° to 146° east longitude. The Pelew Islands have a total area of 346 square miles and are nearly encircled by a coral reef. The soil is fertile; the surface is often well wooded; there is a great variety of birds; the lagoons abound with turtle and fish, and bread-fruit, cocoa-nuts, sugar cane, oranges, and bananas are grown in abundance. The inhabitants, who do not exceed 10,000 in number, are of Malay or Papuan origin, and their civilization is of a very low type. The Carolines proper consist of 48 groups, aggregating from 400 to 500 islands, but their total area is only 360 square miles and the inhabitants number only 40,000. The Eastern Carolines, or Mulgrave Archipelago, consist of two groups with an estimated population of 100,000. Finally the Ladrões, or Mariana Islands, are divided by a broad channel into two groups, the northern consisting of ten uninhabited islands, the southern of five, four of which are inhabited, and the total area of the fifteen is 417 square miles. The majority of these Mariana Islands are thickly wooded and the vegetation is luxuriant. They produce areca and cocoa-nut palms, rice, maize, sugar, tobacco, cotton, indigo, bread fruit, bananas and castor-oil. The inhabitants are said to have numbered about 50,000 at the time of the seizure of the islands by the Spaniards, but the results of the conquest were such that in 1741 the population had fallen to 1,816. It is now about 8,000. It will be seen that these islands can not add much to the possibilities of German commercial expansion, but their possession gives her an important piéd à terre in the northern Pacific. None of the islands forming the Western, Central and Eastern Carolines is likely to become a home for Occidental people on any considerable scale. Pny-nipet (called Ascension Island by the French) in the Central Carolines, has a small colony of whites, and there has been an American mission there since 1851, but no other of these islands has attracted foreigners. The case of the Ladrões may be different, for their climate, though humid, is healthy, and the heat, being tempered by the trade winds, is milder than that of the Philippines. Speaking roughly, 900 miles of sea separate the Carolines from the Philippines, so that Germany and America now become very close neighbours.

THE SEDITIOUS PHILIPPINE DOCUMENTS.

Information was brought here by telegraph, not long ago, to the effect that the United States Government had prohibited the carriage by mail of certain alleged treasonable publications, on the ground that they were calculated to provoke discontent and mutiny among the American troops serving in the Philippine Islands. No details were then given, but we now learn that the condemned matter consisted of three pamphlets written by Edward Atkinson, a prominent citizen of Boston, Massachusetts, and Vice-President of the "Anti-Imperialist League." These pamphlets were entitled, "The Cost of a National Crime," "The Hell of War and its Penalties," and "Criminal Aggression." The facts upon which they were based were partially supplied by a report from Mr. Clay MacCauley, of Tokyo, who recently made a tour of observation in Luzon. It is admitted that they strongly denounced the action of President McKinley and his advisers with regard to the Philippine annexation. At a meeting of the Cabinet on May 2nd, it was decided to order the postmaster at San Francisco to seize and confiscate all copies intended for transmission across the Pacific. The Postmaster-General professed to have knowledge that an edition of five thousand had been mailed for distribution in the Manila army. He asserted that their circulation would not only tend "to incite the soldiers to mutiny, but also to foment and encourage insurrection on the part of the Filipinos themselves." The Attorney-General advocated the arrest and prosecution of the author, on the charge of having violated the U.S. law against treason, but after a prolonged discussion this extreme measure was abandoned.

Investigation soon showed that the Washington authorities had rather lost their heads over the business. The five thousand copies of the Postmaster-General reduced themselves to exactly eight, and no more. These had been addressed to Admiral Dewey, Generals Otis, Lawton and Miller, Messrs. Schurman and Worcester, Government commissioners, and a New York newspaper correspondent, to whom two sets were transmitted. It could hardly be contended that the patriotism or loyalty of these officers and gentlemen would be seriously endangered by the reception or perusal of a pamphlet or two, however inflammatory the contents might be. Furthermore, it was ascertained that the Senate of the United States had caused Mr. Atkinson's productions to be reprinted and issued as Congressional documents, so that the President and Cabinet had placed themselves in the curious position of ordering the suppression of Government publications. The whole transaction is very freely criticized by American newspapers, and with almost unanimous condemnation. The general opinion,—too clearly indicated to be misunderstood,—is evidently that the administration has not only committed an error of policy in interfering with the freedom of the mails on so slender a pretext, but has invited the ridicule of the people to an extent which may make itself unpleasantly felt in future elections.

WHY TOKYO IS SO UNPROGRESSIVE.

Since the citizens of Tokyo were first arraigned—in these columns, unless we are much mistaken—on a charge of quite extraordinary want of progressive enterprise, they have been made the target for shafts of irony and ridicule from all directions. It is now accepted as a fully demonstrated proposition that they are conspicuously deficient in public spirit, and a leading journal (the Kokumin) makes an interesting attempt to explain the fact. It says that Tokyo has never been a civic entity. It was a kind of camping ground for the provincials nobles in Tokugawa days. Fully one-half of the city belonged to these outsiders, and the citizens recognised no public duty towards its immigrant population. In short, a sentiment of pride in the city was never educated.

We find that analysis very bizarre. Surely the presence of the Daimyo in Tokyo can never have weighed in the citizen's sight as compared with the fact that the city was the administrative capital of the empire? The Daimyo did not come to Tokyo of their own accord. They were compelled to come, and the sites of their splendid yashiki were not acquired by them of right, but were allotted to them by the Bakufu authorities. To say, therefore, that a moiety of the city was the dominant of outsiders seems a most misleading assertion. Besides, in what other city of Japan did the citizens ever develop so much local pride? The Yedokko's estimate of his own civic status had no parallel elsewhere. A more credible though partial explanation of the city's slowness in the matter of improvements is that the familiar old obstacle of too many cooks spoils everything. Certainly the city would long ago have had electric railways, or some other modern means of communication, had it been found possible to reconcile the claims of those competing for the concession.

THE UNITED STATES MINISTER IN SENDAI.

Colonel and Mrs. Buck, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. R. S. Miller arrived in Sendai between 11 and 12 on the evening of the 29th ultimo. A deputation from the American citizens went down the line as far as Shiraishi to meet and welcome the Minister and his party. On reaching Sendai station Colonel Buck found most of the remaining American residents waiting to receive him. The Minister and Mrs. Buck were entertained by the ladies of the Miyagi Jogakko. On Tuesday, the 30th, the visitors, accompanied by all the American citizens, went to Matsushima, where the party had a picnic, after which they proceeded by boat to Shiogama, returning to Sendai at 4.30 p.m. On Wednesday, Colonel Buck performed quite a number of functions. The local authorities having been notified by Sendai residents some days before of the intended visit of the Minister, made preparations for his entertainment. The mayor of Sendai, Mr. Satomi, and eighteen other leading citizens organised a Japanese dinner for the latter part of the afternoon. In the morning the Minister visited the Tohoku Gakuin and the Girls' School, known as the Miyagi Jo Gakko. Early in the afternoon he held a reception for Japanese callers, which was very largely attended. Between 3 and 4 he proceeded to the Yusuikwan, where about 70 of the leading residents of the town were waiting to receive him. The Japanese and American flags hung side by side at the entrance, a band was in attendance, and there were many other tokens of warm welcome. Among those present were Mr. Chikami, the Prefect; Mr. Satomi, the Mayor of Sendai; Mr. Takagi, the President of the Court of Appeal; Mr. Yamada, the Ken Secretary; Mr. Takeuchi, the Chief of Police; Mr. Kikuchi, the Director of the Second Higher School; Mr. Shimonojo, the Director of the Middle School; Mr. Satomura, the Director of the Normal School; Mr. Yamada, adviser to the Prefectural Government; and the leading barristers of the town. After the party had witnessed Fuji-tsu and other performances, Mr. Satomi, the Mayor, made a speech in which he expressed the sentiments of the native community of Sendai in regard to Col. Buck's visit and alluded to the close relationship of Japan to the United States ever since the days of Commodore Perry. Japan, he said, had always felt that America was one of her warmest friends and that she had received no small benefits from the United States. Colonel Buck, in replying, said that he regarded the entertainment they had given him in his capacity of Representative of the United States as a genuine indication of the warm friendship that existed between the two countries. He was an ardent admirer of Japan and was quite astonished at the rapid strides she had made during the past few decades. He had heard much about her progress while in the United States, but since he had had the honour to represent his country in this land he had been in a position to verify for himself the reports which had reached him. The entertainment they had provided had been an agreeable surprise to him, as he was in Sendai only for the purpose of taking a prep at the beautiful scenery for which the neighbourhood was noted. In the name of the citizens of the United States he thanked the residents of Sendai for their liberal hospitality.

On the evening of the same day, all the foreign residents of Sendai were invited to meet the Minister and Mrs. Buck at dinner at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Hoy, when various speeches were made and a musical entertainment of a most enjoyable character was given.

The Minister and his party left for the capital on Thursday morning, being accompanied as far as Fukushima by a deputation of American citizens. Two policemen guarded the house in which Col. Buck stayed, night and day, and accompanied him on his excursions.

In the course of an interview with a Japanese gentleman, whose name is not given, Col. Buck is reported by a Sendai paper to have said that the United States aims at placing the Japanese on the same footing as Europeans as regards labour, but that the Government is determined to keep the Chinese out of the country as much as possible. He also said that in Hawaii the United States wished as far as possible to preserve the status quo as regards the Japanese. The United States fully recognised that the Japanese had a claim to be treated in a different manner from other Oriental races. He thought that a final settlement of the question of the future of the Philippine Islands was not far off.

REVOLUTION IN LIFE INSURANCE.

In the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of New York a judgment was delivered on May 2nd which will, if sustained by the highest tribunal of appeal, cause serious and radical changes in the business methods now pursued by Insurance companies in that State, and may result in the sudden division of something like two hundred million dollars among the policy holders of the large mutual concerns. As the most important of these institutions have agencies in the Far East, and as many foreign residents of Japan are directly interested therein, we take pains to gather the facts thus far developed, according to the records supplied by leading American newspapers.

It is generally known that the principal insurance corporations are conducted upon a "mutual" system, the basis of which is that the net profits of the business shall be equitably distributed among the holders of policies, each one of whom is thus made a partner in the establishment in which he is insured. In the suit recently decided, which was brought by a policy holder of the Equitable Society, it was alleged that this principle had been violated, and a claim of more than $7,000 was preferred, the whole of which was promptly allowed by the Court,—three judges supporting the demand, while one dissented and another declined to vote. To make the position of affairs entirely clear, we shall give an outline of the plaintiff's case, and state the grounds upon which his action was resisted by the Company.

The Equitable Life Assurance Association is understood to be the most prosperous organization of its kind in the United States. It was founded forty years ago, by the late Henry B. Hyde, then an obscure clerk, with what now seems the insignificant capital of one hundred thousand dollars. For several years before his death,—which by a peculiar coincidence, occurred on the very day when the judgment we are reviewing was pronounced,—Mr. Hyde, as President of the concern, had drawn an annual salary identical in amount with this original capital; and the assets accumulated under his management are now reported to exceed two hundred and fifty millions. Like all insurance companies, it has been the custom of the Equitable to maintain a reserve fund, as a provision against extraordinary claims, should such be legitimately preferred. But of late years the practice of setting aside a huge "surplus" has been pursued—not only by this association but by most of its class. The surplus thus aggregated by the Equitable is said to be from 56 to 57 millions. That of the New York Life is nearly 38 millions, while the Mutual Life declares 34 millions. These are the heaviest figures, though the smaller companies follow in proportion to their opportunity and ability.

It was contended by the plaintiff in the Equitable suit that the enormous surplus, or a large proportion of it, was improperly and illegally withheld from the policy holders,—of whom there are about 400,000 altogether. He represented that under no circumstances could any necessity exist for so vast a fund; that the immense volume of business yielded an annual profit more than sufficient to cover all possible demands; that the company had contracted, by the terms of his policy, to pay him a just proportion of its earnings, which it had failed to do; and that in the event of an insurer's withdrawal or death, he or his family would receive, under the present system, the bare amount of his risk, after which the account would be closed, without any consideration of the sum due him as a rightful claimant to a share of the surplus.

The defence of the company appears to have rested upon the single argument that the directors were entitled to exercise their own discretion in fixing the surplus and allotting dividends, and that all policy-holders were bound to accept such apportionment as they saw fit to prescribe.

In the decision pronounced by the majority of the Court, it was declared that the directors were privileged to determine what each annual surplus should be, but that, having done this, they must proceed to parcel out the whole sum, in accordance with a strict provision of the Company's charter, requiring them first, to "cause a balance to be struck which shall exhibit assets and liabilities and also the net surplus after deducting a sufficient amount to cover all outstanding risks and obligations; and next, "to credit each policy-holder with an equitable share of the said surplus."

The Court held that "the Company had bound itself, as a condition of its being, to place in the hands of its policy-holders a contract embracing these provisions, and it cannot now be heard to say that it has by a mere jugglery of words kept this promise in form only to defeat it in substance." Furthermore, it was asserted that "if this surplus is not divided among those who have paid the premiums, the institution is builded upon a false pretense, for it has held out to its policy-holders the promise that this fund should be distributed among them, and it has avoided its taxes to the State upon the proposition that the fund was held 'for the exclusive benefit of the assured.'" The judgment concluded by stating that "there was a contract between plaintiff and defendant, and the pleadings clearly indicate that the defendant owes the plaintiff an amount equal to that which is claimed."

The view of the single dissenting justice was expressed in these words:—"In general, only the directors of any corporation have the power to decide what amount or share of its earnings are to be applied in dividends and I can see no different principle which limits the authority of the directors of this society to decide what part of the net surplus is to be distributed to the policy-holders at any particular period."

From the comments in the New York press it would seem that the judgment was a great surprise to the Equitable directors, who will probably press their side of the case in the court of appeal with much more vigour than they have yet shown. They have issued a circular stating that the controversy has been unduly magnified; that the real points in dispute are unfairly represented; that the right of policy-holders to the entire surplus has never been denied, the only question being, how it shall be divided, and when; and that they look forward with confidence to a reversal of the decision by a higher tribunal. Should they be disappointed, the matter will affect a very wide range of interests, for none of the mutual companies can then refuse to apportion their total surplus at once. Public opinion, selfishly inspired, no doubt, evidently anticipates this result, though there are not a few financial authorities who predict that the Equitable officials will be able to justify their course, and prove that no interference with the just rights of the insured has been attempted. On all sides, however, it is recognized that the matter should be brought to a conclusive settlement at the earliest possible moment, for the satisfaction of all concerned.

DISTURBANCES IN KOREA.

Saturday, June 3rd.

Information is published that a band of lawless persons, numbering several thousands, and calling themselves the "Southern School-men" (Nangaku-to), assembled in Chhung-chhong-do, Korea, and began to commit various depredations in the early part of last month. A company of gendarmes and policemen were sent against them from Soul. Several of their leaders were arrested and are undergoing examination, but order has not been restored and it seems probable that some difficulty will be experienced in pacifying the district. This intelligence comes by mail, but a telegram from Soul, dated the 29th ultimo, speaks of rioters in Cholla-do which adjoins Chhung-chhong-do. It would seem, therefore, that the disturbance has spread from the latter place to the former.

Monday, June 5th.

The latest news about the Korean insurgents is that they call themselves the "illustrious learning party;" that their operations involve five districts, and that there is talk of sending a company of Japanese soldiers to restore order. It seems to be quite impossible for outsiders to discover what these various elements in Korea signify.

Wednesday, June 7th.

There appears to be a great deal of uneasiness in Japan with reference to the disturbances in Korea. The Government's efforts to restore order are reported to be meeting with little success, and the state of affairs is compared to that which existed just before the war between China and Japan, when the Tong-haks threw the kingdom into a ferment. Some people hint that foreign influence has been exerted to foment the trouble, and others say that the Emperor talks of removing the Imperial residence from Soul, but these mysterious comments do not appear to deserve any credence. It is noticeable that no explanation is offered as to the cause of the tumult. But, of course, that is no novelty. We never do have any satisfactory explanation of emeutes in Korea. Their case appears to be like that of Topsy—they just grow. A writer in the Asahi is terribly in earnest about this latest occurrence. He declares that Korea falls within Japan's sphere of influence—her most important sphere of influence—and that her naval force ought to be employed freely to restore order in the peninsula. It seems that the Maya Kan has been ordered to proceed from Chemulpo to Mokpo, the latter place being near the centre of disturbance, and that Chemulpo is now without a Japanese war-ship, a state of affairs which causes some uneasiness to the Tokyo journal. Korea seems to us to be in the condition of a sick man before an operation, she will be a great deal worse before she is better.

GERMANY & HABUTAYE.

Wednesday, June 7th.

Germany is being patted on the head just now by Japanese writers because she has adopted a fiscal policy diametrically opposed to that of France. The latter has raised the import duties on Japanese silk fabrics, whereas the Berlin Government proposes to lower them from $\frac{1}{10}$ of a mark per kilo. to $\frac{3}{10}$ of a mark. According to the view of Japanese economists Germany's course is the true route to commercial success. We welcome such fine expressions of economical faith.

Friday, June 9th.

In the Official Gazette is published an extract from a despatch signed by the Japanese Consul at Hamburg and dated April 18th. It runs thus:—"According to the new German Tariff, the import duty on woven silk fabrics without design or colour is reduced to 300 marks per 100 kilos. But it must be noted that the reduction does not apply to goods with any appearance of twilling. The object of differentiating against fabrics according to their texture is to prevent the import of heavy silks under the name of Habutaye, for these, being dyed after importation, would come into serious competition with goods of domestic manufacture."

Another despatch from the Japanese Consul in Berlin, dated April 19th, says:—"The reduced tariff rate has gone into operation. The origin of this reduction is that the silk-weavers of Germany are keenly desirous of entering into competition in foreign markets with the manufacturers of other countries—especially with the French manufacturers, who have hitherto received habutaye at the same low rate of duty as that imposed in Germany. Germany will thus become the great market for Japanese habutaye, especially as France is about to increase the duty on the Japanese fabric on the ground that it competes injuriously with the French product."

LORD SALISBURY AND THE RUSSIAN LOAN.

An amplification is published of the telegram recently sent by Reuter, stating that the British Government had privately advised the capitalists of London not to subscribe to Russia's railway loan. The Shogyo Shimpo is responsible for the amplification. It says that Lord Salisbury invited the leading capitalists to meet him, and spoke to them privately as follows:—"Russia's attitude towards China is very difficult to understand. If she shapes her procedure on lines wholly indifferent to British interests and conservative of her own advantage alone, it will be impossible for Her Majesty's Government to refrain from protest. Under such circumstances, it becomes advisable to reflect carefully before locking up capital in Russian enterprises. Possibly the wisest course may be not to respond to Russia's application for money." The Shogyo Shimpo, though it circulates this intelligence, does not vouch for its correctness, but, at the same time, evidently credits it. We are of a different opinion. It would be a most unusual thing for a British Premier to take such a step, and the inevitable consequence would be a very strained state of relations between the cabinets of St. Petersburg and London. Besides, British capitalists do not stand in any need of advice from officialdom. They would resent rather than approve, such gratuitous counsels. Their habit is to be guided by their own judgment, and when that ceases to be trustworthy the time will have come for them to put up the shutters. The main point, however, is that if Lord Salisbury went out of his way to offer such a recommendation, he would be wantonly imperilling the relations between England and Russia, and gratuitously slighting a great nation which has always held its financial obligations scrupulously sacred. We can not easily conceive any step better calculated to imperil the peace which Lord Salisbury has always shown himself so solicitous of preserving.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

It is announced in the Official Gazette that Mr. Kato Masuo has been relieved of his appointment as Minister Resident in Korea, and that Mr. Uchida Kōsai has been nominated Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary en disponibilité, in conjunction with his present office of Chief of the Political Bureau in the Office.

Our Tokyo contemporaries publish intelligence of the result of the trial of the Japanese labourers who recently engaged in a fracas with a number of Chinese labourers, and became responsible for fatal results. One of the accused, Ito, has been sentenced to death, and will be hung on the 28th of August; the second, Ozaki, has been sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment with hard labour; and the third, Yamane, to 5 years.

The Japanese Authorities have wisely resolved to make Mr. Yi Il-sik "move on." The man is known to have been implicated in two assassinations, attempted or achieved, and if the Korean Authorities allow such characters to roam abroad unrestrained, they can scarcely expect their civilized neighbours to be equally complaisant. Yi has been escorted by the police from Osaka to Kobe, whence he will be shipped speedily for the country that has the honour of owning him.

It is stated by the Yimmin that the Foreign Office estimates of expenditure for the fiscal year 1900-1 have already been sent to the Department of Finance, and that, on the whole, they show a slight reduction as compared with the outlays for the current years, but that increases are demanded on account of the establishment of certain new Consulates and the appointment of Ambassadors instead of Ministers to the Great Powers. From this it would appear that Japan has definitely resolved to take the long talked-of step of raising the status of her Representatives in Western countries, but we do not think that the Yimmin's news is quite trustworthy.

A telegram published by the Chiuo Shinbun and said to have been received by the authorities in Tokyo states that the French President received no injury at the hands of his Auteuil assailant, and that the latter was at once arrested. It is not improbable that factitious importance has been given to this incident. The pugnacious baron may have been lurching too generously, or is perhaps a gentleman of irresponsible impulses. We do not see why a sudden ebullition of phrensy on the part of a solitary individual should necessitate the closing of even one social club, much less of several. The removal of the baron's name from the roll of the club to which he belongs should have amply sufficed to exonerate the latter.

In reviewing the first volume of "Selected relics of Japanese Art," the beautiful work on Japanese art which is now in process of publication, we referred to the English of the text, and expressed regret that a compilation of such high qualities and so costly should be disfigured by solecisms of phraseology. In connexion with this subject, the editor writes to say that some copies of the first part were hurried through the press without receiving revision from the foreign collaborator, Mr. E. Fenollosa, but that the remaining copies will have that advantage, and that the English text of the whole of the remaining 19 volumes is to be carefully supervised by Mr. Fenollosa. If that blemish is removed, the work will be incomparably the finest thing of the kind that has ever appeared.

It is stated by Tokyo newspapers that the combination of Japanese druggists—formed for the purpose of saving Japanese iodine from being beaten out of the field by a foreign firm working in concert with certain Japanese—are carrying on the campaign with more vigour than ever. The plan of the combination, as explained recently in these columns, was to boycott the foreign firm, and remove from the Druggists Guild the names of the Japanese acting in collusion with it. Some of the members of the Guild were averse to these extreme measures, and the result was that a dispute arising, the members of the Dye-stuff and Colour-sellers Guild tried to act as peace-makers. Their efforts, however, have proved ineffectual. The Druggists Guild have declined to be turned from their course. They are bent upon organizing the strongest competition with the foreign firm, and on boycotting Japanese that does business with it.

The United States Government is reported to have addressed to Japan a friendly inquiry about a rumour that supplies of arms and ammunition are being secretly sent from this country to the Filipino insurgents, and the Foreign Office in Tokyo is said to have been able to reply that the story had not the smallest basis of truth. We transcribe the statement because it has currency, but we attach no credence to it. The United States having already received assurances of Japan's official resolve to strictly guard against any and every breach of neutrality, is most unlikely to formulate any fresh query on the subject. If concrete evidence of the smuggling of munitions of war were forthcoming, the United States Authorities would doubtless call Japan's attention to the fact, but a mere breath of rumour would not warrant recourse to international communications, in whatever language they might be couched.

DEATH OF ARCHDEACON WARREN.

The Japan Gazette states that Archdeacon Warren, of Osaka, while inspecting the Mission House at Fukuyama, Bingo Province, fell down ten steps leading to the cellar. He was able to walk back to the house where he was staying, but afterwards became unconscious and died on June 7th.

BARLEY CROP FOR THIS YEAR.

The Department of Agriculture and Commerce has published an estimate of the barley crop this year. The following table shows the estimate together with the figures for the past 9 years:—

	Koku.
1890	10 712 965
1891	18 088 373
1892	15 941 276
1893	16 625 229
1894	19 809 965
1895	19 526 123
1896	17 329 317
1897	18 105 491
1898	20 462 053
1899 (estimate)	19 113 274
Average	18 259 225

The "average" here given is that for the seven-year period ended in 1896, excluding the best and worst years. It will be seen that this year's crop is estimated to be less than last year's by 1,340,000 koku, or 6.6 per cent., but to be 850,000 koku, or 4.7 per cent. above the average. On the whole the prospect is very encouraging, but last year's record was quite exceptional.

ANOTHER ACCIDENT TO THE TOKYO WATER WORKS.

Yet another accident to the Tokyo Water Works is reported. The main which runs through Sanjikkē-bori street, in the Kyobashi district, burst with a loud report at 1 a.m. on the 7th instant, and soon the whole district was flooded. Of course the people of the neighbourhood were much disturbed at finding their houses flooded, and a scene of great confusion is said to have been witnessed. By 8 o'clock the same morning the engineers succeeded in getting things under control, but not before considerable damage had been done. It is stated that a defective joint was the cause of the catastrophe. Very likely. Observing the methods pursued by the workmen in making the joints, we have always anticipated accidents. This is the fourth time a pipe has burst. Not a bad record for works still uncompleted!

AN INDEMNITY FROM KOREA.

The Tokyo Asahi says that the Foreign Office has preferred a demand for compensation to the extent of 32,000 yen from the Korean Government. The demand is made on behalf of Mr. Nakagami, a resident of Fusan, who, in April of last year, concluded an agreement for the purchase of 17,600 bags of beans, but when he came to take delivery in August, was prevented from doing so by the governor of the district, who alleged that the export of all cereals had been forbidden. Complaints of that nature have been common for years past in Korea.

EXTENSIVE THEFTS.

Two tin-plate workers, one named Takahashi Kintaro and the other Uchida Takizo, living at Furocho and Nigiwaicho, Yokohama, respectively, have been arrested on a charge of stealing a quantity of lead-plate, valued at upwards of 100 yen, belonging to the tea works at No. 143 Settlement, at which they were employed.

THE PLAGUE AT HONGKONG.

An official despatch from the Japanese Consulate at Singapore states that in view of the prevalence of plague in Hongkong ships coming thence with more than 20 Chinese emigrants are not allowed to land passengers until after quarantine inspection.

AFFAIRS IN FRANCE.

IT was not to be expected that the judgment of the Court of Cassation and its momentous results would find the French nation entirely calm and self-possessed. During the course of the long discussion provoked by the DREYFUS affair passions have been roused which can not easily be allayed. A large majority of the French people have learned to think that the issue lies between the Jews and the Army, and, until the Army itself declares its mistake, these champions of its honour will continue to fret and fume. To persons living beyond the range of the excitement the impression conveyed is that a small coterie of officers set themselves originally to prove DREYFUS' guilt with almost vindictive assiduity. Two or three of them appear to have been unscrupulous men; one was probably a criminal. But there is nothing to show that the rest did not honestly believe in DREYFUS' villainy. The worst that can be said of them is that they approached the question with prejudiced minds. DREYFUS had always been an exceedingly unpopular person. He was unpopular in the army; he was unpopular in society; he was generally disliked. There were probably very few of his comrades in arms who did not welcome the rumour of his treachery as a happy means of driving him from the service. We know what distorted shapes thoughts take at their birth when they are fathered by wishes. The story of the notorious PANIZZARDI telegram is a striking illustration. This telegram was sent by the military attaché of a foreign Power to his general staff on November 2nd, 1894. It appears that the French Foreign Office has an organization for copying and reading the cipher telegrams despatched from Paris to foreign governments by the latter's representatives or agents in the French capital. Very likely a similar organization exists in other European Administrations, but with that point we have nothing to do here. The PANIZZARDI telegram, being in a novel cipher, could not be immediately interpreted at the French Foreign Office. But after a few days the official experts translated it thus:—

"Si le capitaine Dreyfus n'a pas eu de relations avec vous, il conviendrait de charger l'ambassadeur de publier un démenti officiel, afin d'éviter les commentaires de la presse."

There was at first some doubt about the rendering of the last eight words, and a tentative version had to be sent by the Foreign Office to the General Staff. This tentative version contained the phrase "notre émissaire est prévenu," instead of the correct phrase "afin d'éviter les commentaires de la presse." The substitution of the proper phrase was very soon made, but the telegram had thus been invested with an element of doubt, and perhaps for that reason was not preserved at the War Office. Three and a half years later it was needed for insertion in the DREYFUS dossier, and somebody—HENRY, or DU PATY DE CLAM, or both, or another "confidential agent"—"re-constituted" the telegram from memory, and it then took this form:—

"Le capitaine Dreyfus est arrêté. Le Ministre de la guerre a la preuve de ses relations avec l'Allemagne. Toutes mes précautions sont prises."

Now it would have been easy to obtain a copy of the original telegram from the archives of the Foreign Office, but even men whose integrity we have no right to question were content to accept the version "reconstituted" from memory because it went to prove DREYFUS' guilt. In the face of such facts we can not avoid the inference that the moral equilibrium of many Frenchmen has been disturbed, and that this affair passed long ago from the domain of reason and justice into the realm of sentiment and prejudice. Delirious crises of that nature are to be found in the history of every nation. We have had them in England, and we have seen them elsewhere. But unfortunately for France she has at present in her midst men who see a selfish opportunity in her troubles, and who would be content to ride towards the consummation of their own aims on any wave of popular passion. There would be much ground for uneasiness if the machinations of these enemies of order were strongly reflected in parliament. But the results of the various votes announced by telegraph this morning show that the Chamber of Deputies is keeping its head, and has resolved to sacrifice all its "patriotic" convictions and prepossessions on the altar of strict allegiance to the tribunals of justice. The publication of the judgment of the Court of Cassation throughout the length and breadth of the land by order of the Chamber can not fail to exercise a most wholesome effect as demonstrating that the Legislature and the Judiciary are working hand in hand. It is, indeed, greatly to be regretted that recourse to a measure so extreme as the closing of the clubs should have been considered necessary. A large element of society will thus be impelled to opposition. Had that step been omitted from the programme there would not be much cause for alarm, but until we learn that a "class" element has not thus been imported into the controversy, it will be impossible to feel entirely reassured. After all, it is doubtful whether history contains any example of a similar shock to the morale of a highly civilized people. The French are passionately fond of logic. They justly believe themselves to be a nation of clear insight and well-balanced judgment. Yet now their highest legal tribunal tells them, in effect, that for the past eighteen months they have been passionnately pledging themselves to a profound blunder of perception and lending all their strength of discernment to the perpetration of a hideous wrong. Is it conceivable that they should bow to such a sentence without protest? If they do, they will more than expiate the error into which they have been betrayed by an unhappy combination of depravity and hysteria in quarters where high integrity and calm discrimination are usually found.

FOREIGN IGNORANCE OF JAPAN.

WE foreigners certainly must confess to a great deal of ignorance of Japanese manners and customs, but the ignorance that some Japanese writers display of foreign knowledge is far profounder. Consider this paragraph from the Fiji Shimpō, headed, "Do not convert ukiyo-ye into photographs":—

"Japanese gen-re pictures (ukiyo-ye) have become very fashionable of late in foreign countries. Many people buy them. But foreigners, not being acquainted with Japan, do not know what such pictures mean, and consequently seek an explanation from any Japanese students or travellers they meet. Naturally the drawings can be easily explained since they merely depict every day customs. But when one is asked to tell what kind of people are the low characters so often represented in the pictures of Moronobu, Itcho, Toyokuni, Kunisada and so forth, one is not a little embarrassed, and tries to get out of it by replying that they are maidens of old times, or women of the Bakufu Court. When the question is pressed home, however, there is nothing for it but to confess that they are filles de joie, and to add, perhaps, that the pictures are reproductions of now obsolete customs, or that they were formerly in vogue among the lower classes and never affected by the middle or upper. That is one way of covering up the disgrace, but now that we are about to have mixed residence, so that foreigners will be able to study Japanese ways at first hand, it is to be hoped that the country's reputation will not be destroyed and its disgrace proclaimed by conduct calculated to prove that the old-time genre pictures are photographs of existing realities."

Now that is a clever paragraph, and with the spirit of the writer we must all be in entire accord. But how wonderful is the ignorance it displays. In the first place, we can assure the Fiji Shimpō that the average foreigner knows all about the genre pictures of Japan. In fact, it is by foreigners that their history has been written and their motives have been explained. Has the Fiji no acquaintance with the writings of ANDERSON, of GONSE, of GONCOURT, of BING, and of the numerous other foreign connoisseurs who have made a study of this subject? We can assure our contemporary that none of the shallow subterfuges it puts into the mouths of blushing Japanese students and tourists would have the slightest weight with foreigners of ordinary intelligence. But there is another and a very much more important point which appears to lie beyond the range of the Fiji's vision. It is that, for the past forty years, the Japanese, instead of seeking to cover up unsavoury things when foreigners are present, have adopted precisely the opposite course. That is the outcome of a mutual non-understanding. The average foreigner puts an altogether false construction on much that comes under his observation in Japan. He sees acts which in his own country would be called immodest, and heart language which in the West would indicate immorality, and without pausing to reflect deeply, he naturally associates such conduct and such expressions with the condition of ethical degradation that they would necessarily accompany in Europe or America. The consequence is that he regards the Japanese as essentially "loose" people, and in associating with them abandons all, or nearly all, the reserve that he considers necessary in Western society. Confronted by this conspicuously "free" demeanour, the Japanese, in turn, put a false interpretation on it. They have no suspicion that it merely reflects the foreigner's erroneous estimate of their own morals. They imagine, on the contrary, that the colour he displays is the real hue of his morality, and they adapt themselves to his plane. It is for that reason that Japanese tea-house girls take liberties with foreigners which they would never dream of taking with gentlemen of their own nationality; Japanese tradesmen, unsolicited, expose to foreigners wares which they would carefully conceal from their own people unless specially asked to show them, and even in polite society the foreigner is entertained with topics which would be tabooed if Japanese alone were present. If it is desired that the Japanese should display themselves in a purer light to the foreigner, they must first learn to regard him with different eyes. Hence we think that the Fiji Shimpō—whose earnest efforts to improve the tone of its countrymen's morality we profoundly admire—we think that the Fiji Shimpō is attacking from the wrong direction. It should begin by teaching its nationals that the foreigner, in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred, is a being quite different from their conception of him, and that when they assume towards him an attitude of moral abandon, they are not consulting his tastes but caricaturing themselves.

The P. and O. steamer Ancona, 3,083 gross tonnage—once so well known on the Japan run—will shortly pass out of the possession of her present owners. Negotiations are in progress for her purchase by Hajee Cassum Jusuf, a well-known ship-owner in Bombay. The Ancona was built for the P. and O. Company in Greenock in 1879. Hajee Cassum, says the Advocate of India, owns several old P. and O. steamers, among them being the Deccan, Pekin, and Thibet (now the Cashmere).

AN EXCEPTIONAL MILLIONAIRE.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie, Scotch-American manufacturer, is now receiving congratulations on having taken his degree as the second richest man in the world. The first position is understood to be held by Mr. Rockefeller, the "Standard Oil" dictator, whose property is so enormous that he has more than once declared himself unable to state its exact value. His income, however, is from twelve to fifteen million gold dollars a year, and from this we may form some estimate of his total possessions. Undoubtedly he is facile princeps among plutocrats. Candidates for the second place have hitherto been chosen from the grade to which men like Vanderbilt and Astor belong; but there is reason to believe that the fortunes of these individuals have been unduly magnified by popular imagination. The wealth with which they have been credited would probably be reduced one half, at the least, by a strict reckoning. But with regard to Mr. Carnegie there can be no mistake. Apart from his estates and investments in various parts of the United States and Great Britain, he has just received one hundred million dollars in a solid lump from his former partners, in exchange for his shares in the great steel company of which he was the head. That is to say, he has received first mortgage bonds to that amount on the industries which he created and controlled, preferring this method of payment to solid cash, on account of the difficulty of investing so vast a sum to advantage. As the securities thus acquired bear interest at five per cent., his annual returns from this source alone will be five million dollars,—a revenue believed to exceed that of any other living person, except, as aforesaid, the autocrat of "Standard Oil."

Mr. Carnegie's reasons for separating himself from the active interests he had so long directed have been made public through a London newspaper. He has realized his immense capital for the simple purpose of giving the greater part of it away. This, he avers, has been his intention for years, his conviction being that "a man who dies rich, dies disgraced." Since he became the possessor of more money than he cared to use for himself, he has founded some thirty charitable institutions, at a cost of seventeen millions. He now proposes to devote much larger sums to the same ends. He has only one child, a daughter, of whom he says, "I shall not leave her weighted down with great riches. I shall provide for her handsomely, but she will not be what the world now calls a great heiress." When asked in what especial directions he could exercise his beneficent influence, he answered, "Watch and see. I hope I shall not justify the definition sometimes deserved of a philanthropist, as a man with a great deal of money, but a very little sense."

Immediately after the transfer of his manufacturing interests in America, Mr. Carnegie started on a visit to England, where his first public action was to offer, through Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, an endowment of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars to the Birmingham University, on condition that the scientific school be made the principal department in that institution. His explanation of this proviso was that he had observed the tendency of English universities in general to overlook all training but that which is needful for the learned professions; and it was his desire to increase the opportunities for education of a more practical nature. It need hardly be said that this lavish distributor of bounty has become the lion of the hour. If he proceeds to execute his benevolent projects on anything like the promised scale, he may rise to a renown exceeding that of George Peabody, though he cannot look forward to a long tenure of his position as "the second richest man in the world."

The rapid rise of Mr. Carnegie to almost unexampled prosperity would be more than a nine days' wonder if similar phenomena were not of constant occurrence in America. To spectators at a distance the sudden acquisition of colossal fortunes in that country is absolutely bewildering. Fifty years ago, the number of genuine millionaires was infinitesimal. The first Astor, who led the list, had only seventeen millions when he died. Any man whose bank account touched one hundred thousand dollars was entitled to call himself rich. Before the civil war, huge aggregations of wealth were virtually unknown. Such careers as those of Gould, Sage, Mackay, Huntington, and their kind have been possible only under the extraordinary conditions of the past forty years. The hardest thing to understand is, where this incalculable flood of wealth has come from. Some of it, to be sure, has been dug from the bowels of the earth, but only a small proportion. Yet the millionaires of to-day march in legions. To be the owner of a single million, or even two, is not, indeed, a very lofty distinction. Millionaires ten times over abound in every State. Where do they get it all?—that is the marvel. With scarcely an exception, the great fortunes have been gained by the men who now enjoy them, or by their fathers. Not only were Rockefeller, Gould, Carnegie, and those whose names are most familiar, among the poorest of the poor in their youth, but the entire host of plutocrats, as a rule, began their lives with nothing. And now the possessions of many of them throw the legendary treasures of ancient Rome into comparative insignificance, and make the fable of Monte Cristo a feeble mockery. When we remember that by dexterous manipulations of oil shares, a little while ago, five millions were added in as many hours to the nominal wealth of Mr. Rockefeller, the story of Aladdin's lamp seems rather a commonplace and matter-of-fact record. Where, it may well be asked, does the money all come from? And where, if we give ourselves time to think about it, will it all go to?

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

The Rikugō Zasshi discusses the constitution of the new Dōshisha and attempts to forecast the ultimate outcome of the reorganisation of the institution. We give the gist of its comments:—It would be a mistake to suppose that there is no connection whatever between the new Dōshisha and the old, or that the new Trustees are all bent on turning the Dōshisha into a mission school. There is a good deal of difference of opinion between the missionaries and certain of the trustees as to the course to be pursued in future. If the situation is forced by the missionaries, things will by no means go smoothly later on. Some of the trustees are of opinion that the efficiency of the institution cannot be maintained if it be carried on in the manner proposed by the missionaries. . . . The aims of most of the trustees are no doubt good, but how far they can be carried into practice is questionable. The Taiyō, says the Rikugō Zasshi, writes of the handing back of the institution to the missionaries as a retrograde movement, as the triumph of conservatism, and hence as a proof of the failure of liberal Christianity to hold its ground against its opponents. This is in a measure true. But it would be premature to predict what will be the next step taken. At present all is calm; not a ripple appears. But we do not regard this stillness with complacency. The ship fared better in turbulent waters. To use another figure, it would be true to say that the Dōshisha is at present asleep, there are reasons for thinking that the sleep may be that very bad kind from which there is no waking. The meeting of native and foreign Christians organised by the Fukuin-Dōmei-kai, to which reference has already been made in these columns, took place at the Imperial Hotel on April 18th. This was followed by other meetings. The whole proceedings are reported at some length by the Fukuin Shimyō and the Kirisuto-kyō Shimbun. The following condensed account is taken from these sources. The meeting at the Imperial Hotel was called Naigai-jin-kōwa-kai (A Friendly Conference between Foreigners and Japanese). Dr. Miyake Yūjirō was asked to speak at this meeting. Referring to some remarks of Dr. Imbrie's, this speaker said that among scholars no fears were entertained that patriotism and Christianity would come into conflict with each other, and that therefore to lay stress on this subject as Dr. Imbrie had done showed lack of acquaintance with the existing state of opinion in Japan. Rather than spend time over such a topic, Christian teachers would do well to make the character of Christ or humanity their theme. Then there were persons who said that the disintegration of China and the partition to which she was being subjected was the result of her non-acceptance of Christianity. No such simple theory sufficed to explain what is taking place in China. Did the Christianity of Poland prove adequate to save her from partition? The enunciation of such mistaken opinions did more harm than good, as they were calculated to stir up hostility against Christianity.†

On the 20th a large meeting was held in the Kinkikan, Kanda, the audience numbering over one thousand persons. Mr. Matsumura Kaiseki caused a big tumult by the tenor of his remarks. After stating that the Japanese were very deficient in the religious instinct, he gave it as his opinion that unless they accepted

* The reference here is to the predictions of the Taiyō as to the fate of certain forms of Christianity in Japan.

† The Fiji Shimyō rather condemned this attack on Dr. Imbrie as out of keeping with the character of the meeting, whose chief object was to promote friendly feeling between foreigners and Japanese. But Dr. Miyake would no doubt contend that Dr. Imbrie's remarks were provocative of the retort made.—(WRITER OF THE SUMMARY.)

Christianity they were as a nation in danger of destruction, whereupon the uproar was so great that the speaker was obliged to leave the rostrum without finishing his discourse.

On the 21st a Shimbokukai was held at the Nakamura-rō, which was attended by about 250 persons. On the 22nd the Young Men's Society held a meeting at the Seinen Kaikan, at which about 600 people were present. On the 23rd preaching services were held, and on the 24th a second huge lecture meeting was convened, at which Mr. Matsumura Kaiseki repeated his address, causing a second disturbance. Mr. Matsumura, however, stuck to the platform and succeeded in finishing his discourse. His pluck and persistence were considerably admired, but his contention that Japan can only be saved from becoming a prey to foreign foes by accepting Christianity naturally appeared to the thoughtful portion of the audience to be an exaggeration of the real situation.

Commenting on these meetings, the Fukuin Shimyō says that, with the exception of the Imperial Hotel friendly conference, they were all successful. On that occasion the exact object of the meeting was not clear, and from want of proper previous arrangement things took an unfortunate turn.

The following statistics bearing on Protestant missions are furnished by representatives of the various bodies. The total number of Christians belonging to different Protestant denominations is 47,845, divided as below:—Universalists, 99. Bifu,‡ 406. The Episcopalians, 8,237. Southern Methodists, 600. Fukuin (Evangelical Association of N. America?), 819. Methodists (American?), 5,177. Baptists, 2,801. Nihon Methodist (Canadian?), 2,363. Chōrō (?), 158. Friends, 131. Kumiai (Congregational), 13,627. Christian Church, 807. Nihon Kirisuto-Kyōkai (Presbyterian), 12,441. Fukuin (General Evangelical German and Swiss), 107. We observe that the total is higher than that given in Mr. Loomis' report for the year 1898, his total being 40,981. It may interest some readers to know that there are no less than 37 different Protestant Mission bodies in Japan, according to the latest report published by the Rev. H. Loomis, of Yokohama. It may be well to state here that the total number of R. Catholic adherents is 53,427, and that of the Greek Church, 24,531. Assuming that the figures for Protestant missions given above are correct, we reach a grand total of 125,803 Christians.

In No. 821 of the Kirisutokyō Shimbun, under the title of Kyōdai (聖大) naru Kyōkai it is argued that Protestant Christians lose much from not joining hands more than they do. The efforts of small bodies of professing Christians are sadly crippled from want of money and other means of making their influence felt. Though there are over 40,000 Protestant Christians in the country, as a force they lack power because scattered and divided. The ability of the majority of Christian believers to contribute to the funds of the church is evidently extremely limited, says the organ we are quoting. The Yokohama United Presbyterian Church may be said to be the most prosperous of the Churches connected with the Nihon-Kirisuto-Kyōkai, with a membership of over 600, yet the annual contributions of the members do not amount to more than about 1,000 yen. Among the Kumiai Churches there are only a few where, with 500 members, the amount of money subscribed amounts to 1,000 yen. These figures represent the maximum of effort; so that it is easy to see how poor the minimum must be. Thus we see that there is an urgent need for a union of forces and more thorough organisation.

It is considered that the Sugamo prison affair has been satisfactorily settled by the appointment of Mr. Tomeoka Kōsuke to be one of the instructors in the new School established by the Government for the training of prison officials and the superintendents of reformatories. In his new sphere Mr. Tomeoka will have special charge of those branches of instruction in which he is so well versed, and hence will be able to utilise his knowledge in a way that would not have been possible while a mere chaplain in a gaol.

In No 16 of the Seikai-no-Nihon, Marquis Saionji gives an account of an interview he had with Pope Leo XIII some 12 years ago, when on his way to Berlin. He was much struck by the strictness of the rules enforced in the case of all persons presented to His Holiness, whatever their rank may be; one of these being that all ornaments of every kind shall be removed in the ante-room of the Audience Chamber. The Marquis was favourably impressed by the strong personality of the Pope and the geniality of his manner. In appearance he seemed to the Count to be a fac-simile of Voltaire. . . . Afterwards I went to call on the Pope's chief Cardinal, says the Viscount. He entertained me with a repast such as I had never tasted in any mansion before. He seemed very anxious to know whether the cooking pleased me, and, when I praised it, expressed great surprise that I should know so much about foreign cooking. After a while he handed me a cigar of a quality that I had never met with in all my travels. "Does the Pope," I asked, allow such "luxury as this in his palace?" Smiling he replied, "His Holiness winks at it. This is a Palace secret. It is a case of stolen kisses being sweet." §

The Shinseiki expresses the opinion that Dr. Imbrie's choosing patriotism and Christianity as the subject for his speech at the Imperial Hotel was justified by the attitude of the Imperial Household Department, the Higher Educational Council, a certain section of the Mombushō, and the whole of the Nippon Shugi party towards Christianity, and by a large amount of popular misrepresentation on the subject. At the same time Dr. Miyake's complaint that Christian lectures too often are negative rather than positive in character is true, the Shinseiki says. All kinds of opinion have been expressed as to the results of the series of meetings held by the Fukuin-Dōmeikai, some asserting that they were quite fruitless of any effects likely to prove lasting, others attaching great importance to them. The Shinseiki is on the whole optimistic on this as on so many other Christian subjects, but thinks the Imperial Hotel affair a failure when the expectations of its promoters are considered.

The following statistics are of interest, showing as they do the progress made by the missions referred to in the reports from which they are culled.

The Kumiai Churches held their Fourteenth General Meeting at Osaka in April. The report given at that meeting did not go further than November of last year. The number of baptisms for the year was 431, being an increase of 51 on the figures of the previous year. The total number of churches was 70, 33 of these being self-supporting. There were 31 preaching places, 72 teachers of various kinds, 35 of these being ordained pastors and 28 evangelists. The total number of members was 10,046; 5,220 of which were males. The money collected for various purposes during the year amounted to 21,937 yen, and the expenditure to 15,106 yen. Two new churches were formed and two previously existing ones disbanded.

From the Report of the Methodist Churches presented at their Annual Meeting in March we quote the following figures, having reference to 8 months only (August/98—March/99). In the seven mission stations situated at Tōkyō, Yokohama, Nagoya, Shinano, Sendai, Hakodate, and Sapporo 424 persons received baptism, and there were 3,023 inquirers. The total expenditure for native pastors was 2,874 yen. The number of churches was 60. The largest number of adult baptisms was at Hakodate, where no less than 38 persons were baptised. Next to this stood Yokohama and Tōkyō, with 27 each. The total amount subscribed by the churches was 10,939 yen, exclusive of a sum of 40,000 yen spent on the building of a church in Yokohama. The rate of subscription per head stands at 3 yen 61 sen.

The Keiseisha, Uneme-chō, Kyōbashi, Tōkyō, announce the following four Christian books as on sale. (1) "Christianity and Buddhism," 15 sen. (2) "Christianity and Philosophy," 25 sen. (3) "Christianity and Society," 15 sen. (4) "Christianity and Education," 12 sen. These all consist of a collection of articles previously published in various magazines. No. 1 contains 13 articles; No. 2, 15, Nos. 3 and 4, six each. With the exception of an essay by Dr. Gordon on "Amida," the articles are all from the pens of well-known Japanese Christians.

No. 148 of the Bukkyō has an article entitled Bukkyō-seito-dōshikai (清徒同志會) no Soshoku, which gives an account of the establishment of a new society, which, according to its chief promoters is to be purged of all the disfigurements that have characterised Buddhism as known in Japan in late years. The reformers aim at doing for Buddhism what the Protestants are said to have done for Christianity in Luther's time. They purpose removing the rubbish that has accumulated in the course of ages and of thus revealing to the world the beauty of the original structure. Whether they will succeed in their task nobody can tell, but their efforts deserve notice and encouragement. As an ethical reforming agency Buddhism as it exists to-day in Japan is powerless, contends the Bukkyō, simply because it is compounded of good and bad elements in such a way that the powers of the former are neutralised by that of the latter. There is a great deal that passes as Buddhist doctrine that is no part of the original creed and should be unreservedly rejected. The mass of tradition that has grown up in the course of ages is quite separate from the original creed, and deference to the authority of this tradition should be made quite optional. The Bukkyō gives the following as the articles of faith of the new sect and the objects it aims at. (1) We believe in the fundamental truths taught by Buddhism. (2) We aim at reforming society radically by a revival of belief in these fundamental truths. We are advocates of free inquiry and investigation in the study of Buddhism. (4) We are entirely opposed to superstition of every kind. (5) We see no reason for insisting on the retention of the religious system hitherto maintained and followed by Buddhists. The above are the chief articles of faith. As supplementary to them it is affirmed that the sect disapproves of State aid or control. The headquarters of the new body are at No. 73, Susakimachi, Mukōjima, Tōkyō. No fees are to be collected from members.

Commenting on this movement, the Taiyō says that, considering the urgent need there is for reforming influences and agencies at the present time, action of this kind should be welcomed. Hitherto the most discouraging feature connected with Buddhism has been the fact that adherents of the old school and the new school have alike been devoid of real faith. If, by a removal of the many obstacles to intelligent belief, the Seito Dōshikai can awaken in the hearts of their fellow-men a new interest in a religion which has shown itself so powerful in the past, the benefit to society at large will be considerable. What the Taiyō desires to see is the adoption of clear historical methods in dealing with the records of the Buddhist religion and the rejection of all material that cannot stand the test of thorough criticism. By adopting two distinct methods of interpreting, called the 大乗, Daishō (Mahayana), and the 小乗, Shōjō (Hinayana),* says the Taiyō, they have mystified history and doctrine to such an extent that no ordinary people can understand them, and have cut themselves off from the sympathy and support of persons who would otherwise be ready to back them.

A writer signing himself "Hakugan Itsujin," in a long article published in No. 12 of the Seikai-no-Nihon, expresses profound disappointment at the slow progress being made by Christianity at the present time. Though the tone of the article is revealed by its title, Shitsubō seru Kirisutokkyō, the writer is evidently a man whose sympathies are wholly Christian, and who would be glad to have a different tale to tell as to the general attitude of the Japanese mind towards Christianity and the actual attainments and leading characteristics of professing Christians. We give the gist of the essay in as condensed a form as possible. There was a time when the light of Christianity shone brightly in this land, and it seemed as though Japan was destined to become a Christian country. But now all is changed. Both inside and outside the church there is alike failure. I am one of those who wish it otherwise. I would fain see the Kingdom of God established in this land. But I am not one of those who is content to live in a fool's paradise, to imagine that things are bright when they are dark. . . . Our Japanese Christianity is good enough for old men nearing the grave or for widows left to go through the world alone. Our Christianity figures only in condemning certain practices, that is, on the negative side. It condemns smoking, drinking, improper intercourse with women, and such things, but it is utterly powerless on the positive side in pointing out to men by precept and example what they must do. The burden of its message is "do not." Pharisee-like, our Christians thank God they are not as other men, because they abstain from certain things that others practice. But as for Christians supplying the nation with a fixed standard of life and morals, this they have not done; therefore it is that I say Christianity has failed. . . . In many respects Shintoists and Christians are half-brothers. Alike they rely on tradition. Alike they regard modern science and intellectual development with distrust and suspicion. Alike they quote their ancient records, the Kojiki and the Nihongi on the one hand, and the Bible on the other, against the opinions and theories prevailing at the present time. Alike they appeal to emotion and mere sentiment instead of to reason. . . . Can it be said that our Christian philosophy has been any more successful than our preaching of morality? I trow not. After attempting to call in German materialism to the aid of Christianity with poor results, our philosophers fell back on the ultra-idealism of Brahmanism and Buddhism, with the outcome that they have gradually explained away the personality of the Christian God, reducing him to a mere controlling force or to a fixed law called 天命, Temmei. What possibility is there of building a system of morality on belief in the existence of such an entity as this? . . . If we ask what amount of real faith in Christianity there exists in this country, the answer must be discouraging. Christians dispute about opinions and discuss this doctrine and that, but beneath it all, it seems to me, there is little real belief. Christianity in coming to us has had the advantage of being associated with a system of civilisation whose merits are acknowledged. It has been represented as part and parcel of that civilisation, and hence has in the past received a certain amount of prestige that it is no longer likely to retain. The feeling of the nation in reference to the various elements composing what is called Western civilisation has changed, and hence Christianity is no longer likely to be regarded as an inseparable part of that civilisation. If things proceed thus, in 30 years Christianity in Japan will be effaced.

* These terms were originally applied by the Lamaistic Buddhists to systems of doctrines about the beginning of the Christian era. The northern disciples of Buddhism called their doctrine "The Great Vehicle" and those of the Southern Church "The Little Vehicle." They represented at that time different developments of the original Buddhist creed. But in Japan the terms are used in a wider sense and often seem to almost express the meaning of esoteric (daishō), and exoteric (shōjō), Buddhism. They are also used in the sense of stages of knowledge and attainment, as well as for methods of interpretation of Buddhist sayings. For a full account of the origin of the terms vide the article on "Lamaism" in the Encyclopædia Britannica.—(WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

In commenting on the above Mr. Takenokoshi Yosaburō, the editor of the Seikai-no-Nihon, who is himself a Christian, says that, though not agreeing with all the statements of the writer of the article, he entirely endorses the conclusion to which he arrives, namely, that there is no future for Japanese Christianity. The words he uses are as follows:—Sono in tokoro mattaku dōi subekarazu ga, Nihon no Kirisutokyō ni sento nashi to iu ketsuron wa, warera ga uragaki wo suru ni chūcho senaru tokoro to su. The reason given by Mr. Takenokoshi for this opinion is that the evidences of Christianity are far too complicated to be comprehended by the lower orders, and, as for the educated classes, they are so wedded to the Confucian system of morals that Christianity has no attractions for them.

In the Rikugō Zasshi, under the pseudonym of "Kenkōsei," a writer discusses at great length the present state of the Buddhist priesthood. He divides priests into no less than 20 classes, coming to the conclusion that there is little to choose between the different classes. Though the statements made must be received with caution, proceeding as they do from one who can see no good left in the ranks of the Buddhist clergy, they no doubt represent a great deal of truth. The article opens with the statement that among the 100,000 Buddhist priests scattered over the empire, only a few are living moral lives. Then comes the classification, which is worth producing here for the sake of its exhaustiveness. As many of the terms used do not lend themselves to concise and expressive translation, we give the original terms with explanations: (1) Kokusoku Bōzu. Lit. Corn-stealing Priests, men who do nothing to earn the bread which by some means or other they manage to procure. They are to be regarded as a burden on the community. (2) Taikomochi Bōzu. Lit. Drum-carrying Priests, that is jesters or buffoons, whose chief object it is to please those who visit the temples and thus induce them to give money. (3) Kōgyō Bōzu. Performing Priests, or Showmen, who spend their time in exhibiting objects of interest connected with temples and who receive money for the entertainments they give. (4) Haiyū Bōzu. Priests who resemble actors in the way they get themselves up for effect. They dress in brocade and make a display of themselves in an unbecoming manner. (5) Kyōin Bōzu. Demon-Priests. Like the spirits in the nether world, they await with interest the death of parishioners, making nice calculations as to how much money they will realise by the funeral ceremonies. Being more interested in the deaths of men than in their lives, they are called "Evil Spirits." (6) Baikyō Bōzu. Scripture-selling Priests. These go around from house to house reading words that they themselves don't understand and never attempt to explain, which, parrot-like, they have learnt to repeat. They charge so much per passage for what they read. (7) Baidan Bōzu. Speech-selling Priests. These put on the air of learned Buddhists, imitate the voices of actors, sway their bodies to and fro and make flourishes with their hands, and expound in a baughty manner any subject that happens to occur to them at the time regardless of truth. (8) Chikushō Bōzu. Concubine-keeping Priests, who, for the sake of appearances, often have wives as well. (9) Haka-ban Bōzu. Grave-keeping Priests. They look after the sweeping of graveyards and the placing of flowers on tombs, &c. (10) Yotogi Bōzu. Priests who sit with the dead. It is customary in Tōkyō especially to send for a priest when a person dies, who remains all night by the side of the corpse reading prayers for the comfort of the soul of the departed. (11) O-toki Bōzu. Priests who spend their time in reading scriptures before the household divinity, and who receive money for their services from the heads of the houses they visit. With us foreigners the reading of the scriptures also forms part of worship, but the scriptures are read for the benefit of the audience and not to please or appease the Deity. But in our prayers the scriptures are largely quoted, which perhaps amounts to the same thing. (12) Kojiki Bōzu. Mendicant Priests. These are of two kinds, real and false. A good many ordinary beggars assume the garb and manner of mendicant priests and pretend to read or sing scriptures made up for the occasion. (13) Oyakata Bōzu. Head-Priests. These are superintendents of mendicant friars. It is not open to any priest to become a mendicant at will. He needs to receive permission from his sect. These oyakata, however, are said to sanction fraud in consideration of regular payment from the beggars they set up in life. (14) Hensai Bōzu. Priests who collect money on false pretences. They pretend to be collecting money for the repair or erection of temples and often obtain considerable sums from the unwary. (15) Shōbai Bōzu. Trading Priests. These buy and sell temple shares, according to the expected rise or fall in the revenue of temples. (16) Kwasai Bōzu. Priests who are ordered to collect money. The order referred to comes from the head-temple. This opportunity is utilised for practising all manner of deceit whereby they enrich themselves. (17) Kaichō Bōzu. Priests who make money by opening shrines for people to worship the image inside or by showing heirlooms and treasures. (18) Kyūten Bōzu. Moxa-marking Priests. These make a trade of choosing and marking suitable spots for the application of the moxa. (19) Uranai Bōzu. Divining Priests. (20) Kitō Bōzu. Praying Priests, who also sell charms. The writer of the article says that there are doubtless other methods of obtaining a living not specified here, but that these suffice to show to what shifts priests are driven to keep body and soul together and to what a low status the Buddhist priesthood has sunk. He concludes by observing that there can be no hope of Buddhism becoming a power in the country so long as its teachers are as degraded as the facts given above plainly indicate.

SOUL ELECTRIC RAILWAY.

(FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT)

Sōul now has an electric railway running from a few yards outside the New West Gate, the whole width of the city, a distance of three miles, to the East Gate and thence to the Imperial Tomb. A Korean Company, under the Presidency of the ex-Governor of Sōul, the Hon. Ye Chū Yūn, was formed, and the firm which undertook the building of the Sōul-Chumulpō Railroad, which was turned over to the Japanese at the beginning of this year, built this road. The money for the construction, I understand, was all paid into the hands of the firm at the time the contract was signed. The track was laid last Fall, the power-house built, and the cars and machinery arrived this spring.

A grand opening was planned but had to be postponed on account of the breaking of something about the engine. An immense crowd assembled in the street to see the cars move and probably did their best to get in the way of the wheels. But on account of the accident their curiosity could not be gratified. A few days later, without formal opening ceremonies, cars were run over the line. This has continued for the past week or so. The speculation and curiosity of the crowd were simply wonderful.

The average Korean, like most of us, is so made that he can look at and examine a thing best when he is right on top of it. So with the electric car. Whenever the car stopped a crowd at once closed around it, looked at the wheels beneath, and at the fishing-rod affair above. I have for years noticed the Korean has a decided aversion to getting out of the way, and prefers to risk being run over to giving an inch more than is absolutely necessary. He, therefore, stands as near the electric track as possible; he does not get off the track until the very last half second, and then is not sure which way to step.

Friday, May 26th, was the day set to make a trip over the line out to the Imperial Tomb. Up to this time cars ran inside the city only. On this day the whole line was to be opened. The President of the company and a few invited guests were to make the trial trip.

But another element, over which the construction company had no control, came into the count. We have not had the usual spring rains—in fact, no rain worth mentioning since last November. The spring crops are a failure and the outlook for the rice crop is that of complete failure. The government is strongly conservative. The Progressists have not piped the least sound since their dispersion in Chong-nō last December. But this drought has to be accounted for. It cannot be the fault of the patriotic, loyal, and honest men who administer the affairs of state; they are causing a general resurrection of what some prematurely thought was dead and buried; the lung pipe, that necessary appendage to true Korean greatness, which was thrust aside by the zealous reformers, is seen in its full length; copper cash is being brought into the city by the cart load—I am not drawing on my imagination, for only to day I counted ten carts with the filthy stuff making their way to the Imperial exchequer; and the zealous Premier is putting forth his best efforts to revive the cult of Confucianism—the State Religion; the temple of the God of War, which was burned down, is being rebuilt, so that no one but the most cynical could attribute the lack of rain to the absence of zeal for the things of the remote past.

But there must be a reason for the drought. It occurs to some one that the electric wires shut off the influence of heaven. Remove the wires and the lung looked for rain will descend and refresh the parched earth. The telegraph wires are soon included. Then some one finds out that when wires were first introduced into Japan there was a famine for three years. The conclusion is natural, inevitable—the baneful wires must go.

First the rumour was that an extension of time until the end of the Korean moon would be granted; then the rumour was about that the order for the removal had been given already.

Such was the feverish state of excitement on the morning of the 26th, the day when the trial trip was to be made over the whole road. The cars had run more or less regularly for over a week. On this day a child—between eight and ten years—ran across the track in front of the car and so close to the car that the motor-man could not stop it in time. The wheels ran over the child, and it was killed almost instantly. This accident, for which, as far as I could hear, the management was not responsible, roused the crowd to a great pitch of excitement. When the car arrived at the Big Bell, and stopped there, stones were thrown at the motor-man and the conductor. Unable to defend themselves they ran off and the car was left for the multitude to wreak its vengeance upon. The car was thrown off the track and burned. When I saw it at eleven o'clock there was nothing left but the iron. Another car was stopped and turned over into the street. The mob, by this time, got into working mood and proposed to go to the power-house, at the East Gate and wreck it. But the men there were not to be driven out without resistance. What transpired at the power-house I have not been able to learn, though one man with a knife cut (in the back, where Koreans are nearly always wounded on such occasions) was reported at the Government hospital as a case "at the point of death," but the physician did not deem the case sufficiently serious to receive him.

Japanese policemen were called to guard the property of the company, which, not having as yet been turned over to the Koreans, is still foreign property, and for hours had the pleasure of riding on the cars free. The Korean policeman and soldier took to his heels at first sight of danger. We are so accustomed to look for this that it does not surprise us any more. But he returned when the danger had passed away and was found pushing back the ever-advancing line of spectators; his principal efforts were devoted to the usual boy.

The day began so inauspiciously ended hopefully. The Company was determined not to stop running the cars, because, as one man said to me, "we should never be able to start again." It is hoped this day's experience will be of value to both the company and the people: as to the former, to exercise even more precautions, and to the latter, to be less persistently curious.

AMERICAN MATTERS.

(FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.)

Ithaca, N.Y., May 12.

Looking out upon the world from the University hill at Ithaca, the two thousand young men here find much to talk about. In the world of sport and athletic exercise, they have awakened with the birds. In Percy Field, which is the name of the large athletic grounds attached to the University, there has already been held a Spring Meet, in which "the star athletes" of the state of New York have tested each other's prowess. Football and baseball are still the favorite games. Although Cornell has not yet wrested the laurels from the brow of Princeton, and although the New Jersey "tigers" are still able to defeat, by a large score, the Cornellians, yet the latter hope to beat other college teams and this year to lower the score even with the Princetonians. In aquatic there will be a race on Lake Cayuga here on Memorial Day, May 30th, and as the race is in full view of the lake shore, which is lined on either side by a railway, tickets for the observation car are already in demand. Cornell beat Yale and Harvard so very badly last year, that this fact may have something to do with the other facts, namely, that Yale and Harvard will have a race by themselves this year. The only large contest in which Cornell will play a part with other American college crews will be in the races of the Intercollegiate Rowing Association, on the Hudson river at Poughkeepsie. Meanwhile two Presidents of Cornell University are busy in diplomacy. Mr. Andrew D. White, the first president, who, with Ezra Cornell, founded this, one of the youngest and the most typical of American Universities—which propagates no religious creed and opposes none, while yet nursing a genuine Christian life—is now ambassador to Germany, and will be one of the men prominent at the Congress of Disarmament to be held at The Hague. Mr. Seth Low, the president of Columbia University, is also a commissioner along with Captain Mahan, probably the foremost naval writer in the world, and with Captain Crozier, the inventor of the disappearing gun-carriage, and one of the first military experts of the regular army. The sessions of the Congress will be held in the Huis ten Bosch, or House in the Woods, in which, Americans remember, Motley was a guest and where his portrait hangs to-day. One cannot help but wonder whether the personal discomfort and pain which the present Czar, when Czarevitch, suffered in Japan, from the sword-cut of the fanatical native policeman, had not a strong influence upon the "autocrat of all the Russias" in prompting him to send forth an invitation to the world to inflict less pain and do less killing. I have just re-read the incident in the fascinating pages of Mrs. Hugh Fraser's delightful book, which the Macmillans have just issued, under the title of "Letters from Japan."

Although it is the general opinion in this country that the Congress itself will not accomplish anything immediate or definite, yet it is believed, and certainly very earnestly hoped, that it will initiate measures which may lead to a tribunal of nations for the settlement of international difficulties. A good deal of effort is being made in print and through the religious press and pulpit to have the peace sentiment brought especially before public attention during the sessions of the congress.

It is interesting for a Philadelphian to recall that, two centuries ago, William Penn met the Czar, Peter the Great,—their medium of communication being the language of Penn's mother, Dutch,—and had a long talk about disarmament and the means of supplanting war as a settler of difficulties, especially through a federation,—the United States of Europe. William Penn's elaborate paper, on the possibility of the forming of a European confederacy of nations, is well worthy of study to day, and has been re-printed as a leaflet in the series of the Old South Historical Studies in Boston.

Meanwhile, at the other end of the earth, the president of Cornell University is acting as head of the peace commission. It is the general impression throughout the country that the end of the military operations in the Philippines is near at hand. Dr. Schurman is a Canadian by birth, having been born in Prince Edward's Island, and although many of his friends would be glad to see him president of the United States, he is not likely to hold an elective office, though it is more than probable that when peace is over in the Philippines he will be wanted for work that is more strictly political than the presidency of Cornell University. Those who know his varied gifts, however, regret that one so eminent in philosophical studies should not have pursued his work further in the line of pure thought, for our American metaphysicians and philosophers of highest rank are none too many.

This reminds me that fresh honours were recently paid to the memory of Jonathan Edwards in Massachusetts, a few days ago. Indeed, in this decade, the number of bronze statues, memorials, and other works of art, recalling the virtues, abilities, and work of the makers of America, have been unusually numerous. I was in Boston a few days ago, and besides seeing again the superb bronze statue of Colonel Shaw and the century old bas-relief of his negro soldiers, I noticed that the old tablets on Beacon Hill had been re-set into a new base, and over their massive granite receptacle had been reared a soaring column crowned by the American eagle, to remind one of the old days when a beacon burned brightly on the hill (where now the State House stands) to guide vessels up the harbour. A little to the south, fronting the magnificent new extension of the State House, rises in bronze the stately effigy of General Devens, the brilliant and dashing commander, during the whole war, in the battles from Ball's Bluff to Appomattox Court House, and after ward the dignified judge and scholar. Inside the new building I saw that the golden cod-fish, symbol of Massachusetts' early wealth, even as the wool-sack was of England's, hung in a place of honour, while in the new library the Bradford manuscript, absurdly called "The Log of the Mayflower," but by itself rightly named "The History of Plymouth Plantation," rests under glass, in a bronze case by day, and at night in a fire proof safe especially made for it. Like the Holy Bible itself, this book of Genesis in American history shows by its own texture that it owes its preservation primarily to the genealogical information which it contains.

Who can speak of Genesis or the Bible in these days of searching scholarship without thinking of Dr. Briggs and of the severe attack of indigestion which the Presbyterian body suffered and which the Episcopalian corporation are suffering now? It is curious to note how long the theological mind, rather I should say the clerical monopolies and ecclesiastical corporations are, in facing facts before yielding to realities.

In other sciences than those associated under the general head of theology, it is a credit to a professor, or a public teacher, to be abreast with the latest fruits of research and scholarship. But, somehow or another, within those social bodies of men called churches, there is that most mysterious and ever-changing thing called "orthodoxy." We all know its meaning, when taken in a literal sense; but, what it means when human ambitions, selfishness, ignorance, and a thousand other peculiarities of human nature disguise themselves under it, who can tell? What can it mean or be? Our friend, the ambassador to Germany, has written two octavo volumes on what he calls "The Warfare of Science with Dogmatic Theology." Dr. Draper, before him, wrote learnedly on what he called "The Warfare of Science and Religion." Both of these titles seem absurd. Millions, not only of intelligent Christians, but Hebrews, Mohammedans and Buddhists, know that there is no conflict whatever, and never has been, between religion and science, or between science and dogmatic theology,—any more than there has been between science and geology, or science and bacteriology. There always have been conflicts, however, between the men of one school or line of thought, even in the same science, and we see the men of medicine, for example, divided into different schools of theory and practice. When in that domain called religion we see men holding power not only over the conscience but also over the purse and the sword, and find them claiming to have the "keys" to other worlds called Heaven and Hell, and making those keys powers of literal force for personal weal or woe, then we have "conflicts" innumerable. We always have had them and always will while human nature remains the same and the lower motives inherent in human nature cloak themselves under high sounding words and names.

Down at the bottom, as honest men believe, and especially that large number of good men outside the churches, the Briggs incident means that men are not saved by Bibles, or churches, or clubs, societies, or corporations of clerical gentlemen, but are saved by faith and through character, which comes from following the noblest of all examples. The great and honoured Presbyterian church was put to the test when the question arose whether this church was able to live up to its traditions of scholarship, and keep within its fold one who was not only a scholar but who was the great exponent and popularizer of Biblical scholarship in the United States. The average uninformed church member and lazy or uninterested person is very apt to style the solid results of biblical scholarship as "Briggism," but every scholar knows that Dr. Briggs has done nothing but popularize what the leading biblical scholars of the world are already familiar with. In deposing him from its ministry, the Presbyterian policy tied itself to a corpse and shook the faith of all those who believed that this great and honoured church loved learning and feared no result of research. The writer, educated in a Presbyterian Seminary, imbibed there that idea, as a commonplace of fact and history.

Now, in like manner, the denomination which especially calls itself, like so many other denominations, "the church," and is even desirous to be called "the American Church," is under trial. If this body of Christians cannot include within its household a scholar who teaches nothing more than what Dr. Cheyne, Canon Farrer, and many other British scholars have already taught, then, as many honest men here believe, it is only a sect and has no more claim of being a Church, in the primitive Christian sense, than have those obscure bodies which base the acceptance of Christianity upon the non use of tobacco, or wine, or some other purely personal matter of practice.

When I began this letter it was still uncertain how Bishop Potter would act. The telegrams of this evening, however, show that official notice has been given that the Bishop of New York will ordain on May 14th, at the Pro-Cathedral, Staunton St., New York, at 10 45 a.m., Rev. Dr. C. A. Briggs and Rev. Charles H. Schnedeker.

The Rev. Dr. Henry P. Smith, who was decapitated, so to speak, by the same guillotine which removed Dr. Briggs' head from nominal service in the Presbyterian body, has entered the fellowship of the Congregational Churches. The whole series of incidents serves to show that religion is becoming, for the thoughtful man, more a matter of reality than of tradition, and it belies the various religious organisations, which call themselves Churches, to take account of the signs of the times. It is a sign of cheer, in itself, that so honoured a body of clergy as the Episcopalians have bishops who can discern the signs of the times.

The Rev. John Ochiai, a Japanese Episcopal deacon, was to have been advanced to the priesthood on the same day and place with Dr. Briggs and Mr. Schnedeker, though I do not see his name announced.

In a recent visit to Boston and Worcester, Mass., I had an hour's delightful chat with Dr. Berry and his wife, who were at Kobe from 1872 to 1892. The Doctor looks well and is very active in his profession at Worcester, Mass.

Probably before your readers read this letter, our old friend Commodore John C. Watson, who was on the Asiatic station from 1870 to 1874, and long in charge of the store ship Idaho, in Yokohama Harbour, will be in charge of the American naval forces in Manila, to succeed Admiral Dewey, who, we are all hoping, will survive the fearsome welcome that awaits him in his native land.

I must close by telling the readers of The Japan Mail an incident which occurred last summer in England. I was spending a week, rambling among scenes delightful through ancestral associations, in Nottingham. Wishing, in view of the coming Cromwell Tercentenary (which has just been celebrated in England and not unnoticed in the United States), to see Huntingdon, I rode over into Huntingdonshire. In the town itself I was shown by the courteous rector, Rev. Heddy Vicars, the record of Cromwell's birth and other interesting events and persons connected with him. Going down to the Cromwell house which stands on the site of the altar, in which the future Protector was born, I rang the bell. Who should come to the door but a Japanese about thirty-eight or forty years of age? Addressing him in his own tongue, he seemed dazed. I tried it again. His face gave no sign of understanding. I then asked him in English, "Are you not a Japanese gentleman?" He answered "Yes." "Can you not speak Japanese?" I asked. "Not one word," he answered, "I have forgotten everything." He then told me his story. He had come to England twenty years ago, with the proprietor of the house, a captain on the Peninsular and Oriental line of steamers, and had hardly seen one of his own countrymen since. He was very courteous and showed me all over the grounds, and, on the lower floor of the house, the Cromwell relics and things of Oriental interest. On parting, he used for a farewell the very inappropriate word "Ohayo." It seems incredible, and yet considerable questioning and testing in this case, showed that one's native tongue can be so far forgotten as to be an near death that recognition would be a matter of difficulty.

By the collapse of a verandah in Queen's Road, Hongkong, on May 30, two Chinamen were killed and four injured. Jerry-building was the cause of the accident.

AMERICAN TOPICS.

Recent events in South Carolina and Georgia have again brought vividly before the public mind the subject of lynching and the questions growing out of it. On Saturday, April 22, a jury in the United States circuit court at Charleston, S.C., trying the men charged with killing Postmaster Baker (coloured) at Lake City, S.C., February 22, 1898, reported their failure to agree upon a verdict; on Sunday, April 23, Sam Hose (or Holt) a negro accused of murder and rape, was mutilated and burned to death at Newman, Ga.; and later in the same day "Lige" Strickland, a coloured preacher whom Hose had accused of complicity in his crime, was hanged near Palmetto, Ga., despite his protests of innocence and the protests of Major Thomas, his employer. These occurrences, with several lynchings of a less sensational nature before and after, such as the shooting of eight negroes at Palmetto, Ga., for alleged incendiarism a few weeks ago, have brought out no little comment in the States. The disagreement in the Lake City trial is notable from the fact that it is said to be the first time that a South Carolina jury has failed to acquit the prisoners in a lynching case. The South Carolina State supreme court has also just handed down a decision supporting the anti-lynching law, which awards damages of not less than $2,000 to the legal representatives of the victim, to be paid by the county in which the lynching occurs.

Most of the Southern papers deplore lynchings as ineffective to prevent crime. The Atlanta Constitution, which offered and paid $500 for the capture of Hose (or Holt), does not defend lynching, but presents on the editorial page a vivid picture of Hose's crime and asks its readers to keep that scene in mind when passing judgment on the lynching party. A day later, in a three-column editorial, The Constitution takes as a text the declaration of Mr. S. M. Inman that 95 per cent. of the negroes and white men in the South are as respectful toward women as any people on earth, "but the other 5 per cent. of white and negro scoundrels, rumps, and brutes are responsible for all the trouble." The Constitution declares that the problem would be solved if the better 95 per cent. of the negroes would deliver negro criminals to justice instead of harbouring them as now, and if the better 95 per cent. of the white men would require good references from the negroes they employ.

Dr. W. R. Tuttle, of Yale University, is inclined to admit that the American higher education is producing a race of pessimists. He notes the tendency among college bred men to stand coldly and critically aloof from all movements toward social betterment, and to consider themselves as mere onlookers in the drama of human suffering. The antidote needed for this form of pessimism, Dr. Tuttle tells us, is enthusiasm. Yet at present, he is forced to admit, enthusiasm too often accompanies ignorance or fanaticism. It is the trained man who has unrivaled power for good, if he would but use it.

The Carnegie Steel Works, including mines, railways, collieries, and furnaces, have been sold to a New York Syndicate for 300,000,000 dollars, two-thirds going to Mr. Andrew Carnegie.

The New York Pacific Cable Company proposes to lay a telegraph cable between the United States and the Philippines. It is to be 11,000 miles long, is to touch at Hawaii and the Carolines, and connect the Southern Ladrones, being thence extended to Manila. The weight of the cable amounts to twenty-eight tons per mile. The cost is reckoned at $1,000 per mile, and as soon as Congress has given its consent to the concessions still demanded, the company is ready to commence work. The starting point, according to the company's plans, will be Monterey, in California, and the last point the town of Manila. Two years will probably be spent on the completion and laying of the cable, but the survey of the route across the Pacific in Manila will probably be begun immediately. A telegram of forty words from Washington to Manila now costs $2.52 per word, and takes about two to three hours in transit. At least half a day, therefore, is necessary for an exchange of telegrams. With the new connection, a telegram of the same length to Manila will cost at first only $30, and according to the calculations of the Cable Company, would reach its destination in not more than half an hour. One difficulty has hitherto been the want of intermediate stations in the Pacific, as the islands which would have served the purpose did not possess a Government of their own. If Hawaii, Wake Island, Guam, and the Philippines can be utilized as landing-places for the cable, there will be no extent of cable between these points so long as to constitute a difficulty. None of these sections would be as long as the French cable, which is laid from Brest to Cape Cod, on the coast of Massachusetts, and which is 3,250 miles in length. The longest section of the proposed Pacific cable would be that from San Francisco to Hawaii, amounting to only 2,098 English miles; from Hawaii to Wake Island is 2,040 miles; from Wake Island to Guam, 1,290 miles; from Guam to Manila, 1,520 miles. In the opinion of experts, there are no depths on the route of the projected cable which would greatly exceed those at which cables have already been laid in other seas.

A terrible ordeal awaits Admiral Dewey on his return home. The whole nation wishes to do him honour and preparations on an enormous scale are now afoot. Mr. Secretary Long, of the Navy, has been informed that Admiral Dewey a month ago, learning of the welcome awaiting him, said he was afraid to come home, and the department officials add that from the invitations being extended to him he has good reason for his fears.

There is every probability of an autumn session of Congress being called by the President as he is said to want the policy of the Government in respect to the Philippines and other colonial possessions thoroughly defined and the currency question disposed of before the next campaign. These are the governing considerations, but there are minor reasons for beginning work on October 20, instead of December 4.

The American authorities are sending a small military commission to Java to study the Dutch Colonial methods, with a view to their application, where suitable, in the Philippine Islands.

The New York Journal announces that the Pope has issued a Bull instituting a year of Jubilee to commence in the sacred city of Rome with the first vespers of Christmas, 1899, and to cease on the same day in 1900.

In the pro-Cathedral on Stanton-street, New York, on May 14, the Rev. Dr. Briggs, who was suspended for heresy by the Presbyterian General Assembly, was ordained a priest of the Episcopal church, together with the Rev. Charles N. Snedeker. The ordination ceremonies were conducted by Bishop Potter. The little church was crowded with people, and the ceremonies were notable for the quietness that prevailed. Those who expected, from the great outcry of the preceding three or four weeks, some sensational features, were disappointed. There was no scene, no excitement, and no protest was filed in the beginning, during, or at the close of the ordination.

It appears from returns of the Secretary of State of New Jersey that certificates of incorporation were issued to almost as many concerns in April as in any preceding month since the present marked tendency toward combination set in. Receipts for the granting of such certificates amounted to $113,466, something like $5,045 less than the receipts of March. Approximately the capitalization of all the concerns incorporated under the laws of New Jersey since January 1 this year to the end of April may be placed at $1,500,000,000. The following is a list of the companies incorporated in the month of April, with an authorized capital of $2,000,000 or more:—

Amalgamated Copper Company	$75,000,000
United States Woisted Company	70,000,000
American Smelting and Refining Company	65,000,000
American Plumbing Supply and Lead Company	35,000,000
American Steel Hoop Company	33,000,000
American Railways Company	25,000,000
United States Flour Milling Company	25,000,000
American Power and Transportation Company	12,500,000
Union Match Company	10,000,000
Woods Motor Vehicle Company	10,000,000
Consolidated Rubber Tire Company	10,000,000
International Smokeless Powder and Dynamite Co.	10,000,000
Continental Cotton Oil Company	6,000,000
Reynolds Tobacco Company	5,000,000
Lewis Motor Vehicle Company	5,000,000
North Star Mines Company	5,000,000
Montana Coal and Coke Company	5,000,000
Compania De la Hacienda d'Coalhuayula	5,000,000
International Automobile Vehicle Tire Company	3,000,000
Acker Process Company	3,000,000
Acker Process Patent Company	2,000,000
Mutual Mercantile Agency	2,000,000
American Incandescent Light Company	2,000,000
Continental Tobacco Company (increase of capital)	25,000,000

Total$448,500,000

The Chicago Tribune gives some details of the huge steel and iron combination which is now being formed. The following corporations are interested in it:—The Carnegie Company, $250,000,000; Federal Steel Company, $100,000,000; American Steel and Wire Company, $90,000,000; National Steel Company, $52,000,000; Republic Steel Company, $50,000,000; American Steel Hoop Company, $33,000,000. The new trust will undertake to capture the business of European concerns, and furnish rails and steelplates for European railways and warships. No foreign company, they assert, is big enough to be a formidable competitor.

Ex-Governor Flower, of New York, died at Eastport, Long Island, on May 12. Mr. Flower was one of the founders of the Federal Steel Trust, whose stock already issued is $99,737,000. Good authorities estimate that Mr. Flower's profits in the last eighteen months in Wall-street have exceeded $10,000,000. He has become in that time the acknowledged speculative leader in the financial markets of the United States.

Rear-Admiral Watson, the new U. S. Naval Commander at Manila, comes down from a line of American fighters. He was born in Frankfort, Ky., and was graduated from the Naval Academy in time to get aboard Farragut's flagship and fight all through the Civil War. He served on the flagship until peace was declared. It was Watson, then a young Lieutenant, who lashed Farragut to the rigging during the battle of Mobile bay. He is a grandson of John J. Crittenden, who was once Attorney-General of the United States and who wrote the famous Crittenden compromise bill. He is a nephew of General George H. Crittenden and Thomas L. Crittenden, who were among the heroes of the Civil War. The Rear-Admiral is a high type of American citizen—cool, fearless, quick in judgment. He is tall and slender, with hair prematurely white, and the hands and face of a woman, but he is a prudent and resourceful commander, with the persistence of a bulldog and the courage of a lion. Moreover, he is an earnest Christian, but of the Stonewall Jackson sort. Hard fighting follows his praying. To his sailors he is known as "Able Seaman Johnny," which is considered as great a compliment as could be given. Rear-Admiral Watson was married in 1872 to Miss Elizabeth Thornton, a distant connection, and daughter of Judge James Thornton, of San Francisco. The result of this union was eight children, seven of whom are living. The eldest son, John Edward Watson, is an ensign in the Navy.

President McKinley proposes to make a tour of the West during his coming summer vacation. Arrangements for the trip have not yet been perfected, but it is understood that he will go to San Francisco by the Southern Pacific route and return to Washington on board a special train of the Northern Pacific, stopping en route at Yellowstone Park and other points of interest. He will leave about the middle of July and be gone probably six weeks.

THE WOMEN'S BURDEN.

They are slipping down the Channel, they are working down the Bay,
The keels that bear the mothers' sons, for whom the mothers pray.
From Solent and from Humber, from Mersey, Thames, and Clyde
The mothers' sons of England go out on every tide

By all the ocean gateways, where the light-capped headlands tower,
The ships that take the mothers' sons are sighted every hour.
They are ploughing through the Forties, they are heaving round the Horn.

They are gliding over glassy seas to greet the golden morn.
And some are for the fighting line, some go to wield the pen.

Within the pickets others trade, but all are fighting men.
Wearing every badge of service—wearing none, it's much the same—

Even though they never know it, they are playing England's game.
And while the sons go trooping forth, to find, to take, to share

The White Man's Burden that we know,—have they no load to bear
Who choke their sobs, and say "farewell," and bide at home and long—

Who bore the sons of England—the mothers of the strong?
They bore with pain and travail, they nursed upon their knees.

The men who rule in many lands, the lords of all the seas,
They have learnt to bear their partings—when the time has come they know—

For last born follows first-born on the way they have to go.
What of the mothers' burden, what of their sacrifice,

Can ye huy their love for a bauble, can ye pay their tears with a price?
Forasmuch as the White Man's Burden is borne by the sons they bare Unto them let it be counted, they carry their own full share.

And what of the plighted maidens, what of the new wed wives,

Who go on every out-bound ship to share the driven lives,
Some wooed and wedded on English soil, some wed on the alien ground?

And the wan-faced women who journey Home, what of the Homeward bound?
Brief are their joys and little their mirth in the glaring endless days.

They spend their strength in the unbought toil that earns small meed of praise.
They have given their youth to the grasping years, they have given the light of their eyes,

And motherhood's joys are bitter, for parting is sacrifice,
Well-loved and strong-souled singer, whose voice sounds from afar,

To the last, least, loneliest island where the burden-bearers are:
Who sang the song of the swaddled lives beyond the purdah's hem,

Master, these are thy kindred—hast thou no word for them?

THE KUMI-AI (CONGREGATIONAL) CHURCHES IN JAPAN.

The fact that the first two churches of this order organised in Japan have just celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of their organisation, in Kobe and Osaka, respectively, suggests a brief statement of their present condition. There are now connected with this associated body seventy-two churches, thirty-three of which are self-supporting. There are thirty-five ordained pastors, and over ten thousand members. Yen 21,937 was contributed by these churches for all purposes last year. The two oldest churches in Kobe and Osaka which have just celebrated their twenty-fifth anniversary, have about five hundred members each. The Osaka church has just made its pastor, Rev. T. Miyagawa, a present of about 1,000 yen and given him a vacation of a year, and he is to visit the United States. Two of the original members of this church were present at the anniversary exercises, and took part, one of them being eighty-three years of age. The pastor expressed for the church the determination to be twice as earnest and active in the future as they had been in the past. At the anniversary exercises in Kobe, nearly two hundred members of the church arose in token of their pledge to each try to lead at least one person to accept Christianity during the present year. When a body of self-supporting churches numbering over thirty have been gathered in twenty-five years, and as many more which are largely self-supporting, it cannot be said that mission work is a failure in Japan.—Communicated.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FOREIGN RESTAURANT AT OISO.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

Sir,—Foreign residents, as well as tourists, visiting Oiso during the summer months may be glad to know that a long felt want has been supplied, and that they can now get there an excellent foreign meal—plain, but well cooked and very cleanly served—at the "Miyoshike Restaurant." It is a newly built little house, situated not far from the Torijō kwan, with a fine sea view. The proprietor has been some years in the United States and speaks English. A party would do well to write or telegraph in advance.

Yours faithfully,

CYCLIST.

CAN FOREIGNERS PREACH IN JAPANESE?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

Sir,—Not with a desire to provoke controversy but rather to invite a general expression of opinion on a timely subject, I wish to express my dissent from an article in a recent issue of the Japan Weekly Mail entitled "Evangelization and Education." The gist of this article is that the acquisition and right use of the Japanese language is a matter so difficult as practically to debar foreigners from successfully engaging in direct evangelistic work.

Now, I would not dare deny that the Japanese language is difficult, or that the Occidental who must work through it labours at a disadvantage. But I think you unduly magnify that disadvantage. I cannot at all agree with you in the statement that "not one of them (foreigners) could stand up and lecture about ethics and morals in such a manner as to dignify the subject," and I think a good many men in Japan who are competent to express an opinion on the subject would differ with you.

While fully conscious of the difficulty under which we labour in this regard and painfully aware of our own shortcomings in the language, some of us think it possible to do effective preaching in spite of these, and that too "without perpetrating solecisms which deprive our words of all semblance of eloquence." Men speak in acquired languages in the West with good effect; why should they not do it in Japan?

As a matter of fact, some missionaries do preach acceptably and effectively in Japanese. I have occasionally overheard Japanese speaking among themselves concerning a foreigner whose address they had just listened to, to the effect that it was as ornate, eloquent, and convincing as if it had been delivered by a Japanese. And I have often heard native Christians say they were much more benefited by the sermons of certain missionaries than by those of the Japanese pastors.

To your question, "Are foreign missionaries competent to carry on evangelization in Japanese with any prospect of success proportionate to that which men of equal endowments might expect to achieve in an Occidental country?" I would answer, No. We do not meet with the same success in evangelistic work here that we could reasonably expect in the west; but neither does the man engaged in educational work. The same men and money used in education in Christian lands could make a better showing in immediate visible results. There are sufficient reasons why this should be so, and we do not expect the same success on the mission field that we would meet at home. But this matter of proportionate success here and in the west has nothing to do with the question under discussion.

Sincerely yours,
Sage.

THE WORK BEFORE US.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

Sir,—Some of the statements in the enclosed article, written by a well-known American author, may be questioned. However, believing the principles involved well worthy the consideration not only of the missionaries, but of all thoughtful people, I submit it for reprint, if you can kindly give it space.

Sincerely yours,

MARY BROKAW JONES.

June 1st, 1899.

BY REBECCA HARDING DAVIS.

A suggestive item of news comes to us this week from England. The Sirdar, it will be remembered, asked a month or two ago for £100,000 to found a Gordon memorial college in Khartoum. Having successfully avenged Gordon's death by the slaughter (planned for fourteen years) of tens of thousands of Dervishes and negroes, he now proposes at once to elevate the miserable conquered residue. A huge university is to be built in Africa. British teachers are to be sent out, and the sons of the headmen of the villages are to be the first pupils. It is distinctly stated that there is to be no religious instruction in this college, and no meddling with the opinions of the pupils upon questions of morality. Hence there can be no attempt to change their daily thoughts and actions on to a base of more decent and pure principle. The one thing which is promised is that the English language shall be taught. The undergraduate may worship his gods or serve Mohammed as he chooses, to the end of his days. But he must recite his creed in grammatical English. Et voilà tout! He is saved.

The last reports assure us that popular feeling in England is strongly in favour of this project. Half of the sum required has been subscribed, and the Queen and Prince of Wales have offered to become Patron and Vice-Patron of the college.

The reason why this incident is of peculiar interest to us Americans lies in the fact that it is a deliberate, well considered effort by a civilized race to elevate a mass of human beings inferior and alien to themselves. How are they going to do it? Is the way they take the best way?

Now, the American believes that this work of elevating alien and inferior races is the one to which he, in the Providence of God, has been called. He has been busy with it ever since the first ship disgorged its load of emigrants on our coasts. He is experimenting on it now at Hampton and Tuskegee in every reservation in the West, and in every public school in the East. He will soon probably extend his experiments among millions of Malays.

He of all men, therefore, is interested in the question:—How shall an ignorant race, differing from ourselves in creed, habits and speech, be lifted to a higher place in the ranks of men?

The presumptuous answer which most of us would give is that of Lord Kitchener:—First, teach him to speak English, to wear our clothes, to copy our social customs, to force his life into our mould of life.

That is the only remedy urged by some of our reformers for all the Indian difficulty. Compel the Sioux or Cheyenne boy to believe that he is not red, but white. Put a hat and trousers and a football sweater on him, dub him "Sam Jones" instead of "The Eagle," blot out in him all memory of the woods and the ancient proud traditions of his tribe and the old blanket-quaw, his mother. If that does not make a man of him—what will?

But birth-marks are not easily rubbed out of body or mind. It is a singular fact that the individual man reaches his highest development on his own racial lines. Be he red, or yellow, or black, as soon as he forswears the blood which God gave to him he becomes a cheap, factitious copy of a man God may forgive, but Nature never does.

The boy who, had he been true to the tendencies of his race might have been a leader among negroes or Hindoos or Indians, being false to them, goes skulking through life a mongrel unstable white.

History is full of records of the defeat of such masquerading folk: of Russians who tried to be German, of Germans who tried to be French; of the hopeless struggle of England for four hundred years to persuade the Celt that he was English; of the triumph of the Jew who, in spite of the persecution of nineteen centuries, now holds alarming power among the nations that hate him, by simply persisting in being a Jew.

But in spite of these hints from history, the Sirdar apparently has no doubt of the success of his experiment. He evidently thinks that the Soudanese can be as easily turned into an Englishman as into a corpse. Backed by the Queen and applauding England and a hundred thousand pounds he grapples with the mass of Dervishes and negroes, orders their clothes and their language to be changed, gives them a smattering of modern science and policy, and presto! the work is done! They are Anglicized and civilized. Now and then amid the applause which is given to his plan we hear a note of anxious doubt.

The Spectator says:—

"We do not doubt the readiness of all the tribes, Shillooks included, if they can be persuaded to dress, to fill the classes to repletion, and become surveyors, engineers, doctors, traffic managers, and even men of learning. But we are afraid of one thing. Lord Kitchener is striking the note at which all future education in Ethiopia will be pitched, and we fear the note is wrong. He and his future colleagues evidently intend that the education they give shall be given in English—that is, shall lose almost all its vivifying power. They propose, it seems clear, to repeat the blunder which India owes to Macaulay, and which has spoiled the results of a splendid effort continued for half a century. That narrow man of genius insisted on English training instead of training in the vernacular or in Persian—and we have as a product the 'educated native,' who, though a much abler man than he is commonly taken to be, is the despair alike of the politician and the moralist. No race will ever be civilized through teaching in a tongue in which it does not think, and when the teacher is a Northern and the learner an Asiatic—that is, when the two men's thoughts turn on different pivots—the jar between their ideals produces nothing but mental bewilderment, and a breakdown of all the supports among which character is built up.

"The scholars of the Soudan will not be like the Baboos whom England has created and now regards with such scorn; but they will be people who are not wanted, saturated with surface-ideas which are not built up on their own ideas, but are only thinly veneered over them. We cannot, we well know, produce conviction for the whole utilitarian world is bitterly against us. The English is convenient because you can get English teachers cheap, because it will smooth the path of all young officers, and because it will make the work of engineers, railroad managers, electricians and all their kind—a most valuable kind in a way—somewhat easier to them; and for this convenience all else that is included in education will be sacrificed."

The calmness with which all moral and religious influence is ignored in this plan is amusing. The ordinary observer would probably regard the negro per se as of more importance than his dress or table-manners, or even his knowledge of chemistry or mathematics, and think that what he says is of more concern than the language in which he says it.

Sum up the requirements in the Sirdar's abstract of civilization—the English language, clothes, learning, and habits—and the trickiest political boss among us can boast of them all, while it is certain that St. John himself could not pass muster on a single point!

The plain fact of the matter is that this extraordinary scheme of education has its root in the complacent self-conceit of the English race. We share it with our cousins across the sea. We are always right; hence all other races must be more or less wrong. Our language, our religion, our manners, even our whims are the best of their kind; so we use them as inch rules by which to measure the condition of inferior races. We hold that they are inferior, as a matter of course. When, therefore, we set out to raise and better them we naturally try to turn them into a poor copy of ourselves as quickly as possible. Hence the Sirdar's plan.

This monstrous content with ourselves is at the bottom of quiet English insouciance and rudeness and of American pretension and brag. Other races probably have it. But it is not their arrogance which lowers us. It is our own. It blinds us to the possibilities in other races, and unfits us to deal with them intelligently. We have talked of "poor Loo," and of the negro as one of the servile races for two centuries, and never have seen that by nature one was a gentleman and the other a better soldier than ourselves.

This defect in Anglo-Saxon character becomes important just now, when two successful wars have thrown the control of millions to aliens into the hands of the English speaking peoples.

The Sirdar has shown us what England will do for her pupils. How will we deal with ours?

Recliothe them, change their speech, give them an inkling of arithmetic, geography and modern civilization? Nothing more? Is civilization after all a matter of railways or even the ballot box?

Beneath these outer casings of life, beneath even the differences of race is the Man whom we must make or mar in our handling.

The White Fathers are said to have been the most successful teachers of the heathen, because they wasted no time in changing his clothes, language or harmless customs, but struck straight at the soul of their pagan brother, and tried to make it faithful—God, true, clean and honest. It was a different plan from that of the Sirdar.

If we make ourselves the keepers of these teeming millions of aliens, there is something more to consider than rates of custom or military occupancy.

What condition is the American in just now to become the controller and guide of any alien brother?

Is his own domestic life clean and unselfish and noble with content and simplicity, or is it tawdry with vulgar display and mean ambitions? Are his public men working for their country, or for the next election? Is the press just and dignified and free from scurrility and filth?

Does he really at heart worship God—our money?

MISSIONARIES AND THE JAPANESE LANGUAGE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—The Report of the Seventh Conference of Foreign Mission Boards (1899) contains a paper on the Science of Missions by a layman, Mr. Robert E. Speer, that is both interesting and instructive. No doubt most missionaries have these reports; those who want them can get them from the "Foreign Missions Library 156 Fifth Avenue, New York." In his paper, Mr. Speer lays down certain principles that were not controverted by any person of the more than forty missionary boards represented. He defines the evangelistic methods of missionary work as that which "relies on no indirect method, but is concerned with the direct and simple oral presentation of the Gospel. This is the supreme method. The best missions are those which use it most."

With regard to mission schools he says, "They must be unqualifiedly Christian, bringing and keeping all their pupils under powerful and personal religious influence." "A predominant heathen influence is fatal to the best results."

"The number of pupils should not be so large as to preclude the maximum of personal contact with the pupils."

"There are fields where this secondary education is used as an evangelistic agency—but there are cases also where its use involves a disregard of the limitations because there is not a sufficient Christian community on which to rest a school with a predominant element of Christian students."

So much for the voice from the North American Continent. What is the voice from the British Empire? By their fruits, some 6,000 souls, ye shall know that the subjects of Her Gracious Majesty love their Japanese brethren, and have taken the most direct methods of winning them. What is the voice from Europe? Our brethren of the Roman obedience have in the college of the Propaganda the digested results of centuries of missionary effort and experience; their methods are so fixed that they are not affected by the fluctuations of feeling, or the fickleness of the populace to whom they minister, or by newspaper articles. They have already a "Science of Missions" towards which Mr. Speer and others are only slowly and feebly groping.

Their schools are conducted by men and women with a distinct vocation to teach, and they are so good that people who declare with great heat that "The Romanists are no better than the Buddhists," send their children to these schools because there are none better. But the French Fathers do not waste their time and energy in secular education but devote themselves to their work of winning souls, hence their success of over 50,000 converts. Bishop Nicolai has been, by the voice of one high in authority, declared to be the greatest missionary to Japan. He has shown his wisdom by neglecting secular education—the exception of a school for girls (absolutely necessary at present) proves the rule. The result is nearly 25,000 Christians.

A glance at the statistics shows that the direct result of evangelistic methods in the conversion of souls far exceeds that of the secular educational method.

What is the voice of the Government of Japan? Clearly this: "We want our schools to be secular and not religious; and especially to be free from all foreign domination or influence."

Witness the conscription laws and the spirit of the action of the Educational Council. The type of school indicated in Mr. Speer's paper quoted is especially obnoxious.

And now some one on the staff of the Japan Mail says, in effect, that missionaries are so stupid that they can never master the Japanese language, and they therefore should teach English and let the benign influence of their morality be shed abroad in silence about those supernatural matters that they have been sent to preach. This seems to be also the voice of the Japanese public so far as it has sufficient interest to express.

To be sure the silent influence of a true Christian is felt everywhere. There is a case on record of the calm smile of a lady on a journey saving a man from suicide on the same steamer, an influence unknown to the missionary at the time. But the mission boards do not pay high salaries for smiles only. There is a demand everywhere for specialists, experts, masters of their professions. Society progresses by the differentiation of functions. Missionaries must excel not only in golden silent smiles but in silver-tongued eloquence. If it be true, as you say, that the missionaries have failed to acquire the language of Japan; it will be impossible to hide the fact very long from the folks at home who provide the funds. In fact, in the very report referred to (on p. 14) is the pertinent question, "How far do missionaries fail to acquire a working use of language?" The next question that may be asked is, "Why do they fail to acquire a working use of the language?" And the answer will probably be, "Because their strength is wasted in teaching English."

The next question may be, "How can missionaries master the Japanese language?"

If it can be shown to be necessary, teachers may be employed in theological and other seminaries, and Japanese studies may be carried on by students in missionary colleges, and candidates chosen for appointment after examination in the home lands.

If necessary, missionaries can take up the same studies in Japanese and Chinese that are taught in the Japanese schools; or better still, study as special students side by side with Japanese boys if the Government does not forbid.

I will venture to make the practical suggestion that a board of examiners arrange a course of study for five years, and hold annual public written and oral examinations with graded reports of the results, giving a diploma to those who pass. I would nominate to be on that board the our foreign born man who is able to earn his living from the Japanese people by speaking the Japanese language to Japanese, namely, Mr. Ishii Black, for the colloquial; Prof. Chamberlain for the written language; and Captain Brinkley as President of the College. Let these publicly examine first and elect afterwards into the Board of Examiners those men who have edited books for students of Japanese and Chinese, and afterwards others from among those who hold the diploma of the body.

Such an Institute would be welcomed by all those missionaries, merchants or teachers, who hope to spend their lives in this land, and the yearly pass-examination certificates and the diploma would be worth working for, if for no other reason than that it would be a test and standard of what is mastery of the Japanese language, and thus be a protection to the reputation of both the living and departed. The Mission Boards might possibly make the examination by such an institute compulsory for future missionaries if not for those in the field.

Of course, all missionary teachers should be exempted from such an examination for the reason that the less Japanese they know the better. Let them smile. "But if any man be ignorant, let him be ignorant" 1. Cor. XIV.

But after all there is a miraculous mystery about the spread of the gospel that is not dependent on human eloquence. The stammering lips are often blessed. Even on the day of Pentecost the cry was, "Are not all these which speak Galileans?" the rough country dialect was not removed, but 3,000 souls were born again from above with water and the Holy Ghost, as the result of their preaching. Scholars say that S. Paul's Greek is often lame, involved, and confused, and yet his epistles must have been more finished than his speeches, for he quotes his converts as saying that his speech was contemptible; and yet following the discussion of the use of the gift of tongues comes this ethical gem of 1 Cor. XIII., and the maker of black goats' hair tents, preaching the doctrines of a crucified carpenter, gives to literature that speech in Acts XXVI. that excited the oft repeated admiration of the great American orator, Daniel Webster.

S. Francis Xavier was only a year in Japan, he never learned the language; he preached from Roman letter manuscripts, but 500,000 souls resulted from the spiritual seed sown,—and in spite of bloody persecutions the doctrine lives and thrives yet in those parts, and the Satsuma crest means to Christian eyes the eternity of the doctrine. "Wherefore brethren, covet to prophesy, and forbid not to speak with tongues."

SATURDAY'S STORM.

YOKOHAMA.

The south westerly gale of Saturday was preceded at Yokohama by a rapid fall of the barometer, and early in the morning seafaring men prophesied more than "a capful of wind" before dusk. Rain began to fall in slight showers about 11 o'clock, and by noon the downpour had increased in severity. As the afternoon wore on the wind sprang up—but this did not deter the hardy sportsmen of the Yokohama Yacht Club from continuing their races. By six o'clock a hurricane was raging and continued till late in the evening, the storm blowing itself out after midnight. Little damage, beyond blown-down fences and broken foliage shrubs and plants, has been done in Yokohama.

SHIP ASHORE AT NEGISHI.

During the height of the gale on Saturday, the schooner Awa Maru, 70 tons, was driven ashore at Negishi and now lies high and dry on the beach.

It happened that some of the crew of the vessel were on shore at the time, and hearing their comrades crying for help, tried to put it to the ship. The heavy sea prevented them from launching a boat, and finally one of them, Inagaki by name, despite the furious gale, swam off to the vessel and reached all his shipmates. It was a courageous action worthy of high praise.

EIGHT LIVES LOST AT KOBE.

Telegraphing at 5:35 p.m. on Saturday, our Kobe correspondent said that a storm had been raging there since noon, but had then abated somewhat. Considerable damage has been done in the harbour and several junks were driven ashore. Mr. Sim's auxiliary steam-yacht, the Snowflake, was driven up on the Bund wall. Several lives were lost among the sends of Kobe harbour.

Kobe, June 4.

About 50 boats and junks were sunk during Saturday's storm, with a loss of 8 lives. The damage on shore is also extensive.

When the steamer Airlie came in a Chinese seaman got washed overboard. A boat was immediately lowered, manned chiefly by Europeans, to rescue the unfortunate sailor. They could not find him, however, and the sea was so rough that the boat could not return to the ship. Finally, after pulling about for nearly two hours, a landing was effected at Ono.

The steamer Indrapura only narrowly escaped going aground.

PIRACY ON THE WEST RIVER.

BRITISH STEAMER HELD UP.

Information has been received in Hongkong, says the Daily Press, that Messrs. Banker and Co.'s steamer Wo On was held up on May 23, at Kamchuck, on the West River, cargo being taken and passengers robbed to the extent of $7,000. There are three Chinese torpedo boats on the river to assist the Sandpiper to suppress piracy. One of them passed the Wo On while the latter had her flag flying reversed but took not the slightest notice of her. The captains on the West River report that these torpedo boats do nothing but tow junks up and down from port to port, and as they get their coal gratis from the Government they make a nice squeeze for themselves. In the evenings they make a practise of anchoring in the creeks and become for the nonce flower-boats, being crowded with singing girls.

The Renown will not come out to the Far East after all, Vice-Admiral Sir John Fisher preferring to have her as his flagship in the Mediterranean, the reason being that she is one of the best fitted and most comfortable of our modern warships. The Renown has been Sir John's flagship during the full period of his command on the North America station and was to take him home to England.

CHINESE AFFAIRS.

It is stated, observes the N.-C. Daily News, among native sources in Newchwang, that there are over 25,000 Russian troops in the Liaoting peninsula, not including the garrisons at Port Arthur and Talienwan. These 25,000 Russians are said to have their baggage, ammunition waggons, etc., all in complete readiness to move to any point within forty-eight hours of the order to march, and of these troops nearly 5,000 are composed of Cossack cavalry. We (Japan Mail) believe the number to be considerably exaggerated.

Shanghai mandarin circles are saying that Japan has been trying to get the Chinese to throw in their lot with her in resisting the aggressions of the Russians, but that the Tsungli Yamen had instructed Minister Li Sheng tu, at Tokyo, to reply that unless the sister empire could persuade Great Britain to join in the opposition proposed, China dared not move, as it would be fatal to her, and that for her own protection China must stand by Russia, unless efficient help be given to enable her to resist Russia successfully and permanently.

The Ostasiatische Lloyd of the 27th May publishes a note about the recent Russian demands for a railway to Peking. It is to the effect that Russia finding vast swamps to cross in following the route originally projected to Vladivostok, wishes to give it up and construct a line direct from Kiachta to Peking following the old caravan route. Thence the line would lead via Mukden to Newchwang and Port Arthur, with a branch line to Vladivostok.

The authorities of Nanking are said to have been thrown into a considerable state of trepidation upon arrival of the Empress Dowager's edict appointing Kang Yi to investigate matters in Kiangsu province, and immediate preparations were made to give a fitting reception to the dreaded envoy of a dreaded Mistress. Amidst all the turmoil, the only person who remained cool and calm was the man whose affairs are specially to be investigated, viz., H. E. Viceroy Liu. There are not wanting those whose declare that the Viceroy is "all right," and that being in his own stronghold in the Yangtze Valley, Kang Yi will not dare to harm Liu in any way. Others, again, declare that Viceroy Liu has all along been most anxious to retire from official life, and that he welcomes the advent of any chance to enable him to leave Nanking for his home in Hunan for good.

The new Taotai of Shanghai, Huang Heenyuan, who has for many years been resident director of the China Merchants at Tientsin, is said to be a man of fully six-feet-five in height, with breath in proportion. Huang, according to the local correspondent of a Shanghai contemporary, has no clear a head as he has fine a body. He talks little, listens much, and is unequalled in the quickness with which he seizes the essential points of a plan or scheme. He does not speak English and has never been out of China. In business his national predilections never appear. He is a Cantonese, and before now has acted as locum tenens in the Tientsin Haikuan Taotaihip: indeed, he was generally suspected to be the next nominee for this position. In connection with the appointment, it may interest readers to know the gossip of the native official class, even if they do not receive it as gospel; en dit that Tls. 250,000 were paid for the billet; and that during the last five years the Shanghai Taotaihip has fallen from the second place to the third in lucrativeness. It used to come next to the treppo-ship of Canton, but the Tientsin billet now has that honour, and is worth more than that of Shanghai.

Owing to the varying degrees of fineness and weights of the dollars coined in the various Government mints in the provinces of Kuangtung, Fukien, Chékiang, Kiangsu, Anhui, Hupéi, and Chihli, which cause great inconvenience to traders who are unwilling to accept these silver dollars as legal tender, it is stated that the Empress Dowager intends soon to issue a decree commanding a combination of all these mints into one, to be situated in Peking, where all the money coined will be of one standard weight and fineness.

The N.-C. Daily News translates the following notes from its German contemporary:—In obedience to instructions from Peking, General Yuan Shih-kai, during the first days of May, started for the Shantung borders from his cantonments of Hsianochan, near Tientsin, with 5,500 men. Each of his soldiers carried 200 cartridges, while the two batteries of field artillery and thirty mountain guns were each provided with 140 rounds of ammunition. In connection with the above, General Nieh, Provincial Commander-in-Chief of Chihli and commanding the Army Corps at Lintai (near the Kaiping colliery) also began to move southwards with a force of 15 battalions of 500 men each, his objective also being Shantung. According to the latest news received, these troops are near Ts'angchow, a short distance north of Têchou. In addition to the above, a corps of Kanan troops, numbering 9,000 men, under General Tung Fuhsiang, are said to be on their way to Shantung on the pretext of going through certain military evolutions. These Generals have maps with them on which are marked the routes to be taken when they arrive in Shantung province, namely, one corps was to march from Têchou to Weihai and thence to Chinanfu (the capital of Shantung), another corps from Têchou via Chinanfu to Weihai, while a third route was marked leading from Chinanfu to Ichoufu. As was pointed out last week, it is apparent that these expeditions are intended to be against the Germans at Jehchao, although the Chinese wish it to be understood that this is not so, and that they are planned only for the exercise of the officers and men in military evolutions. Were this indeed so, such large quantities of ammunition would not be needed, while the absence of military instructors in the ranks of General Yuan's regiments on what is called a march of exercise and instruction is also suspicious. As a matter of fact, these military instructors have all been given a furlough of three weeks, which is significant. Neither can it pass unnoticed that the fleet in being collected in the Gulf of Pechili. The only solution to these movements of Chinese troops seems to be that the Chinese Government deem it necessary to mobilise troops in good time and in the least conspicuous manner, in the vicinity of the frontier. It is feared that, in consequence of the failure of the harvest, famine may prevail in Shantung and disturbances break out in consequence. This would be an excuse for an attack on the Germans which would be attributed to the fanaticism of the uncontrollable natives.

The German newspaper published in Shanghai gives an account of a highland ruse perpetrated by the officers of the Illis at Jehchao to obtain hostages so as to ensure the settlement of the Stenz outrage in that city:—The Chinese Government having guaranteed the Germans in Shantung from further attacks, the Governor of Tsingtao decided to recall his troops at Jehchao, whither they had been specially sent to obtain satisfaction for the attack on Stenz and the punishment of the culprits concerned. This not having been done it was determined to take hostages prior to the departure of the troops. With this in view Captain von Falkenhayn, commanding the detachment, asked the local mandarin to arrange a meeting for him with the principal literati of the city. This was accordingly done, and the time fixed for this meeting was to be on the forenoon of the 25th of May at 11 o'clock. On the morning of that day the German gunboat Illis came over from Tsingtao and anchored off the harbour of Jehchao, and immediately all the baggage and impedimenta of the troops were embarked on the gunboat, the men themselves remaining on shore to await further developments. When Captain von Falkenhayn met the literati he asked them what they intended to do about the Stenz case. As no satisfactory answer could be obtained from the literati, Captain Falkenhayn informed them that he would then take five of their number with him to Tsingtao as hostages. The consternation which this declaration caused was very great, and they with one accord rose up against the local mandarin, accusing him of being privy to this breach of faith; but apparently no one was more astonished at this result of the conference than the mandarin himself. He at once begged of Captain Falkenhayn to take him to Tsingtao instead of the five hostages, but was promptly refused. When at last the literati saw that the German officer was in earnest, they submitted with the best grace they could, and went on board the Illis under the escort of the troops. In the meantime the news had got to the families of the five hostages, and the former brought money, etc., for the latter to take with them to Tsingtao. The Illis then weighed anchor and steamed back to Tsingtao. The five hostages are placed in one of the camps on the island, where they are allowed perfect freedom, but are obliged to report themselves before dark to the officer on duty.

Writing from Newchwang under date May 27, the local correspondent of the N.-C. Daily News says:—

Lawlessness is rife in the province. At a place called Huaijinhien, about 180 miles east from this, a band of mounted robbers is said to have made general good delivery, and afterwards to have killed six Russians whom they met on their way back. At another place Huatêhsien, about 300 miles north from this, another band have carried off the local magistrate. At yet another place about 20 miles N. W. from this, General Chang's troops attacked some robbers and were repulsed with the loss of nine lives. In the port itself a fracas occurred a few days ago, just after sunset, between some smugglers and the Taotai's people, one of the former and three of the latter being killed, while a stray bullet from the scene of conflict crossing the river whizzed unpleasantly close to some foreigners who were taking a stroll along the bund.

The Universal Gazette, as translated by the Shanghai Mercury, gives the following account of the Tientsin-Chinkiang Railway. The line extends 635 miles and the proposed loan is £7,400,000 at 5 per cent. interest, to be issued by the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank and the German Bank, the agreement to be exchanged when the engineers have completed the survey of the route. The line is to be completed in 5 years, and 50 years is limited for the repayment of the entire loan. The Board of the railway will consist of three officials appointed by China and three each by Great Britain and Germany. The section from Tientsin to the southern boundaries of Shantung is to be under German control and the remaining section to be controlled by the British. The Chinese Government will guarantee the loan and the line itself will be held as security.

Piracy has been very frequent in Ningpo waters of late. Two native craft were boarded and one lost a considerable amount of money, while the crew of the other were carried off and held for Tls. 8,000 ransom. The vessel was also held and Tls. 7,000 demanded. Later on a Chinese gunboat, disguised as a merchant vessel, succeeded in bringing a few of the pirates to justice.

Sir Nicholas Hannen and Capt. F. Kleffel, sitting as Arbitrator and Naval Assessor, respectively, in the cases of the collision between the China Navigation steamer Tamsui and the Norwegian steamer Hermes, which occurred near Gough Island, on March 23rd last, have found the Hermes solely to blame.

Says the Hongkong Telegraph:—The many friends of Captain Inman Sealby of the steamship Coptic, will regret to hear that his return to San Francisco will be his last trip across the Pacific in the O. & O. line. His transfer from the Pacific to the Atlantic means well-deserved promotion for him. On his arrival in San Francisco he will turn over the ship to Captain Rinder, formerly of the Belgic.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The King of Siam has taken to cycling. The other evening, accompanied by fifty other cyclists, His Majesty took a ride round the city.

Mr. W. Wallace, who is now staying at the Imperial Hotel, was robbed of a watch, valued at £50, at Nara Station on the 22nd ultimo.

The new French flagship D'Entrecasteaux arrived at Saigon on the 12th May. Admiral Courrejolles has raised his flag on the D'Entrecasteaux.

Prince Keiki Tokugawa, the last of the Shoguns, visited Yokohama on Tuesday and took tiffin at the Oriental Hotel. He was accompanied by a small suite.

Messrs. Mori & Co., one of the oldest firms in Japan, are closing business in Yokohama and Kobe. The accounts of the firm have been transferred to Messrs. Ahrens and Co.

Admiral Dewey is passing his time quietly at the Peak Hotel, Hongkong, and now feels very well. He, however, does not wish to attend any public functions—he will have enough of them when he gets home.

The Sunday Daily Mail has been withdrawn, ostensibly in deference to public religious opinion. Sir Edward Lawson has not replied to Mr. Harmsworth's suggestion to withdraw the Sunday Daily Telegraph simultaneously.

The mission of H.E. Kang Yi, Assistant Grand Secretary, who is now staying at Nanking, is the raising of a loan to the amount of several million taels in Hu-nan and surrounding districts, and also the inspection of the forces.

Mr. G. R. Birt, chairman and managing director of the Millwall Dock Company, who disappeared in February last leaving a deficit of over £200,000 in the affairs of the concern, has been sentenced to nine months' imprisonment. Mr. Birt is 70 years old and the father of thirteen children.

Local admirers of Shakespearian and high class drama will be glad to learn that an American company, staying in Yokohama on its way to Manila, will play on the 13th, 16th, and 17th. Miss Janet Waldorf is the star of the company, and the performances ought to be well worth patronizing.

Mr. A. Coxe, while travelling by train on Tuesday morning, met with a painful accident soon after leaving Hodegaya. Some miscreant threw a stone at the passing train, and the missile shattered one of the windows, fragments of which struck Mr. Coxe in the face, inflicting a nasty wound. It is time these outrages were stopped.

The German cruiser Hertha, which replaces the Prinzess Wilhelm on the China Station, arrived at Singapore on the 21st May. The Hertha was built in 1897, is of 5,650 tons displacement, engines of 10,000 i.h.p., and has a speed of 30 knots. She carries 500 tons of coal, under normal circumstances, but she can carry 950 tons with a displacement of 6,100 tons, and provision is made in her for liquid fuel. Her commander is Capt. von Usedom Tregattenkejtian.

Mr. Rehei Fujiwara, Captain of the Osaka Shosen Kaisha steamer Miyagawa Maru, which came into collision with the N.Y.K. steamer Kinshiu Maru near Tadoan last November, it will be remembered had his license suspended by the Marine Court of Inquiry at Osaka for nine months. He appealed, however, to the Higher Marine Court of Inquiry at Tokyo, where judgment was rendered on the 3rd inst. that the license of Captain Rehei Fujiwara be suspended for six months.

The Secretary of the Chilean Navy has received official dispatches from naval authorities at the Straits of Magellan and from the commander of the small Chilean gunboat Huemul, wrecked in those straits, stating that the captain of the British Atlantic liner Liguria steamed past the wreck, paying no attention to the signals of distress, although they were seen aboard the Liguria. The captain of the steamer asserts that he did not see the signals, as it was night time, and it was thought the fires were made by savages. The crew of the Huemul were saved, but suffered six days of terrible privations on weather-beaten rocks till rescued by the German steamer Luzor.

Following is the record of the Australian cricket team to date:—

May 8.—South of England at Crystal Palace; drawn.

May 11.—Essex at Leyton; won by Essex by 126 runs.

May 15.—Surrey at Kennington Oval; won by Australians by an innings and 71 runs.

May 18.—South of England at Eastbourne; won by Australians by 172 runs.

May 22.—Yorkshire at Sheffield. (No report.)

May 25.—Lancashire at Manchester; won by Australians by an innings and 84 runs.

June 1.—First Test Match at Nottingham; drawn.

The officers of the Seventeenth Regiment of Chasseurs have a girl baby as a regiment mascot. She is proudly, and probably with justice, declared to be the only regimental mascot of the kind in the world. Several officers of the Seventeenth Chasseurs found the little girl abandoned in a railway carriage at Rambouillet, where the regiment is stationed. The baby would have been taken to a foundling asylum, but the officers, being kind-hearted and in a good humour, decided to save her from that fate. They took her home to adopt her as "the Daughter of the Regiment." Arrangements were made with a sergeant's wife to nurse her. The little girl will in future go wherever the regiment goes, and be educated at its expense.

When the Italian cruiser Piemonte entered Nagasaki Harbour en route for Shanghai on the 25th inst., a high official of the port visited the warship, and the Commander asked him if he would return the salutes fired by the cruiser. The officer, who not well acquainted with French, in which language the conversation was conducted, hardly grasped the meaning of the request, and thinking the captain was speaking of some such trifling matter as the weather replied, "Yes." But trouble ensued when the warship fired 21 guns, and there was no reply from the land. The Commander considered he had received a great insult, and sent some officers ashore with a protest. It was then found that there were no saluting guns about the Harbour Office. This matter was reported to the Italian Legation by the Commander, who took it quite au grand sérieux.

Some detailed information has come to hand, says the China Mail, respecting the piracy of Messrs. Banker and Co.'s steamer in the West River. It appears that a number of old women came on board at a port between Canton and Kumchak. These women had in their possession a large amount of money which they kept on their persons. A number of men came on board at the same port. As the steamer neared the Kumchak rapids, these men broke up into parties. One party took possession of the upper deck, another body of men went down into the engine room and ordered the engineers to stop the ship, while a number of the thieves obtained the money from the passengers by means of threats. The Chinese captain was then ordered to take his steamer in the direction of Kongmoon, and anchor. When the steamer had anchored, two sampans put off from a couple of lighters lying near the bank and took off the thieves with their booty. After the departure of the thieves, the captain turned round the steamer and made for Canton, where he reported the occurrence.

We must now return to the north and witness the final struggle which was to begin the Japanese retreat from the whole north. It was not till long after the fifty days had expired that General Sim Yu-gyung returned from Nanking. The Japanese had sent time and again asking why he did not make his appearance, but now on the sixth day of the twelfth moon he entered the city of Pyong-yang, making no excuses for his tardiness, but delivering his message as follows: "I have seen the Emperor and he says that if you wish to become vassals of China you must first give up all the territory taken from Korea and you must give back the two princes whom you have captured. If you do not see fit to comply with this demand the Emperor will send a million men and destroy you." He then gave to each of the Japanese leaders an ornament for the hat, from the Emperor. This was a trick to discover how large the Japanese force might be. It was determined that there must be about 20,000 Japanese troops in the city. What reply the Japanese gave to the Emperor's demands is not told, but that it was a negative one seems sure from what followed.

The Chinese army of counter-invasion lay just beyond the Ya-lu River. It was an enormous host and, as armies went in those days, it was a thoroughly effective one. In connection with this army was an official who held the rank of "Military Adviser," by the name of Sang Kung-ch'ang. The office carried no active power in the field, but it seems to have been a sort of check upon the commander-in-chief, for the duties of the office were to keep the Emperor informed of what was going on at the seat of war. The actual General-in-chief was Yi Yu-sung. Under him were three generals, of the Right, Left and Centre, respectively. The General of the Left was Yang Wan, and under him were Generals Wang Yu, Jung, Yi Yo-ma, Yi Yu-o, Yang So, Sa Da-n, Son Su-ryum, Yi Ryung and Kal Bug-ha. The General of the Centre was Yi Yo-bak, and under him were Generals Im Jagang, Yi Bang-jin, Ko Ch'ak, Ch'ao Sé-jung, Ch'uk Keun, Chu Hong-mo, Pang Si-whi, Ko Seung and Wang Mun. The General of the Right was Chang Sé-jak, and under him were Generals Cho Seung-hun, O Yu-ch'ang, Wang Pil-ul, Juk, Cho Ji-mok, Chang Sung-ch'ang, Nak Sang-ji, Chin Bang-ch'il, Kok Su and Yang Sin. The rear guard was under the command of General Pang Si-ch'an and the engineering corps was commanded by Generals Yu Whang-yang and Wun Whang. The main army was composed of 43,000 troops, while in the rear was a reserve force of 8,000. This army crossed the Ya-lu on the twenty-fifth of the twelfth moon, the dead of winter. It is said that when on the march this army stretched along the road a thousand li (three hundred miles and more) and that the sound of their drums was continuous along the whole line.

General-in-chief Yi Yu-sung, dressed in crimson robes and riding in a crimson chair, arrived in Eui-ju and immediately sought an interview with the King. The latter said: "I have governed this country badly. The Emperor has been put to a great deal of trouble on my account, and all these good men have come a long cold road to fight for us. Though I lay open my vitals with a sword I cannot repay you all for this kindness." General Yi smiled and said, "The Emperor's might reaches to the heavens. For the sake of Your Majesty's happiness we have been sent and all your enemies will soon be put to flight." To this the King rejoined, "Our nation's life hangs by a thread and the result lies with you." General Yi raised his two hands in salute and answered, "I am come at the Emperor's orders and life or death are all one to me. When I started out my father said to me, Fight valiantly for Korea and return victorious, and so how can I do less than my best?" The Koreans say that this man's father was a native of Sun-san in the province of P'yeng-nan, Korea, but that for some offence he had fled to China and together with many of his relatives was enjoying high position under the Emperor.

General Yi started for P'yeng-yang with his whole army, taking 80,000 bags of rice and 20,000 pounds of powder. His troops were not provided with muskets but they had small cannon. The Japanese on the other hand had muskets but no cannon. Upon the arrival of the Chinese at An-ju they were met by the Prime Minister Yu Sung-nyong, who laid before General Yi a map showing the roads leading to P'yeng-yang. General Yi took red ink and indicated on the map the various routes by which he intended to lead his forces to that city. Calling General Sa Da-su, he sent him forward to deceive the Japanese by saying that a few Chinese had come to effect a peaceful solution of the difficulty. The Japanese were pleased at this and sent twenty of their people to meet, as they supposed, Sun Yung-nyung at Sun-an. General Sa feasted them there, but meanwhile had the place surrounded and in the midst of the banquet the Japanese were treacherously assaulted and cut down, three only escaping. From these the Japanese learned of the hostile intentions of the Chinese and were greatly disturbed, but being forewarned, they put themselves in readiness for an assault.

And so the old year died—the terrible Im-jin Year which witnessed the indescribable horrors of the ruthless invasion which swept it from end to end, which saw too the gradual awakening of the dormant military spirit of the people, until at its close the wave of invasion had not only broken and spent itself, but had left the remnant of the invaders cut off from their home land by one of the greatest naval geniuses of his own or any other age, surrounded on all sides and hemmed in by forces which, though perhaps unable to cope with them in the open field in a pitched battle, could yet harass and cut them off on every side. It must be clearly borne in mind that the Chinese did not raise a hand to help Korea until the invasion had virtually collapsed. The Koreans without the aid of China could probably have staved the Japanese out of P'yeng-yang and driven them southward cutting them off on the left and right till they would have been glad to take ship for home. In a sense the Chinese counter-invasion was an extremely unfortunate thing for Korea, for the dormant energies of the people were just rousing themselves to action. Armies were being levied, every day saw the Japanese forces melting away, and there was a magnificent opportunity for Korea to turn upon her devastators and drive them headlong into the sea. It would have given a tremendous impulse to patriotism and national self-respect, and it might have been a stepping-stone to a strong national life; but the coming of the Chinese soldiery immediately threw everything into Chinese hands, and they reaped all the benefits of the situation. Even the Koreans themselves did not realize how they were playing into the hands of China. The Japanese in P'yeng-yang were weary and sick, at heart glad of any excuse for retreating. It could be done without too great a loss of dignity. It was at just this moment that the Koreans put the game, already won, into the hands of China to reap all the credit and all the prizes of success. The Koreans leaned back upon China and relapsed into their old self-complacent "Inol's paradise."

With the beginning of the new year General Yi moved southward toward P'yeng-yang as far as Suk-ch'iu, where he intended to halt for the mass sacrifice at Sun-an, and wishing to give a little time for preparation as possible, pushed on by night and in the morning planted his banners before the ancient city of P'yeng-yang. The city was forthwith surrounded. The Japanese could be seen covering the slope of the hill within the wall with their blue and white flags, and soon they opened fire on the besiegers. At the same moment they rushed to the walls and manned them. The Chinese Generals of the Left, Centre and Right were stationed with their respective forces before the three gates Ch'i-sung, Ham-gu, and P'u-t'ung. The General-in-chief Yi, with a banner in one hand and a drum-stick in the other, rode swiftly from one division to another encouraging the men. His forces could hardly be held in check, they were so eager, in spite of their long cold night march, to rush at the wall and scale it. They were not long kept from their desire, for at eight o'clock word was given for the whole assaulting force to advance to the wall. The cannon thundered, the fire-arrows flashed through the air, the very ground fairly trembled with the noise of battle and the tramp of eager feet. One of the fire-arrows alighted in the quarters of the Japanese general-in-chief, and it was soon in flames, which soon spread to all the surrounding buildings. The Japanese guarded the walls with the greatest gallantry and with spear and arrow, hot water, and stones they made it quite impossible for the Chinese to effect an entrance. The wall bristled with weapons, so that, in the words of a native chronicler, it was "a hedge-hog's back." So it happened that the Chinese forces fell back from the fierce defence of the Japanese. Many of them contemplated a general retreat and started to leave the field, but General Yi, who was always found where most needed, saw the defection of his men and, pursuing them, struck off the heads of a few as an example to the rest. Then he turned and cried, "Fifty ounces of silver in the first man to set foot upon the battlements of P'yeng-yang." This was doubtless a more powerful appeal than he could have made to their patriotism or love of glory. Immediately the tide of battle turned. A Chinese captain, Nak San-j'i, a man well along in years and whose proportions were so ample that the Korean chronicler says of him that he weighed a thousand pounds, led on a company of men, and by a mighty effort succeeded in reaching the top of the wall. He held his ground there while others could scale the wall at his back, and so an entrance was effected. The Japanese began to desert the wall and soon the Chinese entered by the P'u-t'ung and Ch'i-sung Gates, while the Korean allies entered by the Ham-gu Gate. By this time the Japanese had entirely left the wall, and had moved themselves as best they could in various parts of the city determined to make a desperate stand. The Chinese infantry and cavalry both swarmed in on every side and all Japanese stragglers were cut off, while the fight throughout the city became general. Before the Japanese could firmly establish themselves upon the hill and in other defensible parts of the town they lost two captains, 2,285 men, 45,002 weapons of various kinds, besides 1,015 Koreans, whom they had held as captives.

Many of the Japanese had taken refuge in various government buildings which had barricaded as best they could. The Chinese went to work systematically to burn these down, and in the few hours remaining before the fall of night nearly half of the entire Japanese force succumbed to the weapons of the Chinese. One instance will suffice to illustrate the method of procedure. Many of the Japanese had taken refuge in a large building on the wall, well up on the side of the mountain and looking directly down upon the waters of the river. General Yi had it surrounded with piles of wood, the timbers of houses, and hewn logs; and these were set on fire. The entrapped Japanese then had the choice of roasting in death or of leaping down upon the ice of the river. Hundreds chose the latter alternative, but the ice was not strong enough to stand the tremendous strain, and they were all engulfed in the river and carried under the ice below. As for those that remained it is said that the smell of burning flesh could be discerned a quarter of a mile away.

General Konishi had taken refuge with a large body of troops in a building called the Yong-gwang-jung, very near the Ta-dong Gate, which opens directly upon the water front. Night had fallen, and the fight had lulled for a time. What took place at this time may be open to some doubt. The Korean account says that the Chinese commander sent a message to Konishi demanding the surrender of his whole force and that Konishi replied, "Our remaining force is small, and we wish to evacuate the city and retreat if we may be allowed to leave quietly." It is affirmed that General Yi consented to this, and left the Ta-dong Gate unguarded, and in the dead of night the Japanese troops passed swiftly out and crossed the river. On the face of it this statement is hardly credible, but, judging from future events, the Koreans believe that General Yi received a large bribe from the Japanese as the price of this act of leniency. It is true that future events justified the Koreans in suspecting some such thing, but as the Japanese were immediately beside the Ta-dong Gate and under cover of night might easily have forced their way out, especially as the Chinese were exhausted by their long forced march and the fight about the city, we may well believe that the Japanese did not need to appeal either to the pity or the aversion of the Chinese in order to effect their escape. It may be, too, that General Yi did not wish to be hampered with so many prisoners of war and was rather glad than otherwise to let them get away. Of course the Koreans who had suffered so terribly at the hands of the Japanese would have been glad to see every one of them massacred and their anger at seeing them escape may have led them to impute wrong motives to General Yi. Subsequent events, however, gave some colour to these suspicions, as we shall see.

This retreat from P'yeng-yang in the dead of winter was like Napoleon's retreat from Moscow on a small scale. The Japanese were without provisions or proper clothing. Many of them threw aside their arms and luggage and, turning from the main road, begged their way from house to house. When at last they reached the city of Soul and found food and safety they were in a savage humour. Most of the Koreans who had fled from the capital had now returned, and on them these half-starved and wholly disappointed Japanese wreaked their vengeance. They seized hundreds of the unoffending people and put them to the sword. Scores of them were taken outside the South Gate and slaughtered like oxen.

General Katō, who had led an expedition eastwards into Ham-gu Province, hearing of the evacuation of P'yeng-yang, immediately put his troops in motion and hastened down to Soul, burning as he came. And in a short time all the remnants of the Japanese army were congregated in the capital.

The Japanese retreat from P'yeng-yang was not without its casualties. A Korean general, Ko On-bak, met a body of the Japanese, probably a part of the retreating army, at P'a-ju, seventy li out of Soul, and punished them severely, taking, as it is said, seventy heads; not a great achievement when we remember that the Japanese were practically unarmed.

But by this time the Chinese General Yi was on his way south from P'yeng-yang, rather tardily as the Koreans thought; but hearing of this engagement of General Ko, he quickened his pace. Coming to He-om Pass, some seventy li out from Soul, his horse slipped, throwing him heavily on his face. He was severely though not dangerously hurt. At that moment a company of Japanese was sighted on the mountain side and General Yi ordered instant pursuit. The Japanese, probably a foraging party from Soul, closed with them, and as the Chinese were on a marshy piece of land where they sank to their knees in the mud and had no other weapons with them but their swords, the Japanese inflicted severe punishment on them, killing eighty of their number. General Yi was so weak from loss of blood that he did not dare to prolong the fight. So he called a retreat and the next day went into camp at Tong-p'a, a hundred li from Soul. From that point he immediately despatched a letter to the Emperor, saying "There are 20,000 Japanese firmly entrenched in Soul, and with my present force I dare not attack them. I am also ill and cannot fight. I should be glad if you would send someone to relieve me of the command." Then he retreated fifty li further to Song-do in spite of the earnest entreaties of the Koreans. The Korean General Yi-Bin said, "You came to tender aid to our country. Why is it that you now retreat?" Whereupon one of the general's staff promptly kicked him out of the house.

General Yi ordered General Sa Da-su to go and guard the ferry at the Im-jin river, which was now partly frozen but impassable for boats, and ordered the Koreans to go to work building a bridge for the transport of the Chinese army. Here was a piece of work that might have daunted a better engineer than the average Korean general. But the way the Koreans went about it and the brilliant success they achieved show what the Korean is capable of when really in earnest. And it shows as well how thoroughly they were determined to see chastisement inflicted upon the Japanese. It was a swift broad river, partly frozen, with no possibility of driving piles nor of erecting any supports from the bed of the river itself. It must be a suspension bridge or none at all. On either side of the river heavy timbers were planted firmly in the ground some twenty feet apart. Behind these horizontally were laid heavy logs. Then between these supports on either bank were stretched fifteen heavy strands of the tough fibrous vine called sh'ik by the Koreans. It is the pueraria thunbergiana. Of course these sagged in mid-stream so that they swept the water. To remedy this, stout levers were inserted between the strands and twisted until the cables swung clear of the water by many feet. The foundation having thus been laid, willow branches were spread thickly upon the cables and finally a heavy layer of earth was added and the whole was packed down tight by the tramping of many feet. And so was completed the first suspension bridge which history records. We see that during this war the Koreans had originated three important things, namely the iron-clad, the mortar and bomb, and now the suspension bridge. And on this bridge the whole Chinese army crossed in safety.

But General Yi was tired of the war and was extremely anxious to get back to China. So when he heard that Kato was crossing the peninsula he said, "He may come to Pyeongyang and in that case I must hasten back to that place and hold it against him." So he started back toward that city, leaving General Wang Pil-juk in charge of the forces that were advancing on Soul.

At this point mention must be made of the victories of General Chong Mun-bu in Hamgyong Province. In three successive fights he had defeated a large, though not the main, body of Japanese and seems to have entirely cut it off from forming a junction with General Kato as he retreated toward Soul with his dwindling though still formidable army. After the departure of the Japanese, General Chong went to the far north, even to the Tu-man River, and inflicted severe punishment on all those who had aided the Japanese or had sided with them in the betrayal of the two princes. This done, he pacified the disturbed province as much as he could and then disbanded the militia and sent them to their homes.

Kwon Ryul, the governor of Chin-la, of whom we have heard before, took 4,000 men and marched on Soul, not by the main road but by way of Yang-ch'un. Crossing the Han at that point he went into camp at Hang-jin and surrounded it with a paling of heavy logs. The Japanese in Soul ridiculed it, but sent a strong body of troops to attack it. A long fierce fight ensued, and the result was doubtful. At last the Japanese succeeded in setting fire to the wooden paling, and had it not been for the most strenuous efforts on the part of the Koreans they would have been burned out. But they succeeded in quenching the flames. When their arrows gave out their outlook was again apparently hopeless, but in the very nick of time Admiral Yi Bin, of Chin-la Province, came up the river by boat with 20,000 arrows, and, as the camp was immediately on the river bank, the Koreans were saved, and soon the Japanese were driven back. Kwon Ryul took the bodies of the Japanese who had fallen, cut them in pieces, and impaled the fragments on the top of the stakeade. The next day the Chinese General Sa Da-su arrived, and, seeing these trophies of victory, praised General Kwon highly and sent him to P'ae-jin to guard against any possible northward movement of the Japanese. At the same time small companies were sent in all directions to cut off foraging expeditions of the enemy. In this way the Japanese in Soul were cut off from all supply of fuel. The Japanese general who had suffered defeat at Hang-jin thirsted for revenge, and he led many a fierce sally from Soul, but always with great loss.

In the third month confidence was so far restored in the north that the King began to think of returning toward the capital. The first stage of this journey was as far as Yong-yu. At this same time the Japanese sent a letter to the Korean Yu Sung-nyong, saying that they wished to conclude a treaty of peace. He, as in duty bound, sent this message on to the Chinese General Yi in Pyeongyang. He in turn despatched Sim Yu-gyung, who had before acted as an emissary of peace between the Japanese and the Emperor, to take charge of the negotiations and with instructions more or less definite. When this commissioner arrived in the vicinity of Soul a meeting took place between him and the two Japanese leaders, Konishi and Kato, in mid-stream off the village of Yung-san. General Sim opened the conference by saying, "If you had listened to my advice in Pyeongyang you would have saved yourselves all this trouble. The Chinese 40,000 strong are all about you. They have gone south to fortify the Cho-yung Pass and thus cut off your retreat. The Han River is guarded so thoroughly that you cannot cross; General Yi Yo-sung is returning from the north with 300,000 fresh troops (an unblushing lie), and I am prepared to offer you the only possible way of escape. You must give up the two princes; you must leave the capital and move south to the coast of Kyung-sang Province. Then and not till then will we conclude peace and the Emperor recognise you King as his vassal." The vanquished invaders saw that there was nothing to do but comply, and so in the name of the thirty-seven Japanese generals they engaged to evacuate Soul on the nineteenth day of the fourth moon. It was further agreed that they should leave untouched 20,000 bags of rice which was stored in the government granaries. The two princes were to accompany the Japanese as far as Fusan and were to be handed over to the Korean authorities there.

In accordance with their promise the Japanese evacuated the city on the very day appointed, and General Yi Yo-sung, who seems to have recovered his health rapidly after he found that the Japanese did not mean fight, entered the city the following day. The condition in which he found things is almost indescribable. The Ancestral Temple and three palaces had been burned. Only the Nambyul-gung, which the invaders had used as headquarters, was standing. The country all about was lying fallow, and a great famine stared the Koreans in the face. A thousand bags of rice were hastily brought out and made up into soup or gruel, mixed with pine leaves, and a few of the starving thousands were fed. A General Sa Da-su was passing along the street he saw a young child trying to suck milk from the breast of its dead mother. The sight aroused his compassion and he carried the child to his quarters and ordered it to be cared for. Rice was so scarce that a whole piece of cotton cloth could be purchased with about three quarts of it. A horse cost but three pecks of rice. Famishing men fought and killed each other, the victors eating the vanquished, sucking the marrow from the bones, and then dying themselves of suicide. It is even said that, when a drunken Chinese soldier vomited, half-starved men would crawl toward the place and fight over the possession of this horrible substitute for food. This state of things naturally brought on an epidemic of the native fever, a species of typhus, and the dead bodies of its victims lay all along the road, the head of one being pillowed on the breast of another. The dead bodies in and immediately around Soul were gathered and piled in a heap outside the Water Mouth Gate, and it is affirmed that the pile was ten feet higher than the wall.

It was on the twentieth of the fourth moon that General Yi entered Soul. He took up his quarters in the Nambyul-gung. He seemed to be in no haste to pursue the Japanese, so General Yu Sung-nyong hinted that as the Japanese were in full flight it might be well to hurry after them and cut them down as occasion offered. The Chinese general had no intention of leaving his comfortable quarters so soon, but he gave consent to the project of pursuit and detailed 10,000 men under the lead of General Yi Yok-bak. A day or so later this doughty warrior returned saying that he had a pain in the leg. So ended the first attempt at pursuit. Then the Korean General Kwon Ryul came in from P'ae-jin and urged that there be immediate pursuit, but for some unexplained reason the Chinese commander forbade it, and the native accounts even add that he sent secretly and had the boats on the Han destroyed so as to render pursuit of the Japanese impossible.

After crossing the Han River, the retreating Japanese seem to have been in very ill-humour, for they did not confine their exhibitions of temper to the living alone, but even attacked the dead. They dug open the royal tomb at Chong-neng, a short distance the other side of the river. Digging fifteen measures deep they found some tags and a few bones. These they scattered about on the ground. They then filled in the hole with rubble. Another royal tomb was opened and the casket and remains were burned.

In the beginning of the fifth moon a letter arrived from the Military commissioner, Song Eung-ch'ang, in Pyeongyang, ordering a general pursuit of the Japanese. The Koreans believe this to have been a mere bluff, for the Japanese had twenty days' start of them, and pursuit was of course out to the question. At this point again the Koreans make a serious charge against the Chinese, asserting that the Japanese, before leaving Soul, sent large sums of money toward Pyeongyang for General Yi Yo-sung and Song Eung-ch'ang, and that by this means they secured immunity from pursuit. The delay was a cause of great wonderment to the Koreans and it is not unlikely that this theory of a bribe explained for them most fully the actions of the Chinese. And it must be confessed that there is little in the temperament or antecedents of the Chinese on which to base a refutation of the charge. An instance is cited to bring home the charge. A Korean who had come upon a Japanese straggler and killed him was severely beaten by order of the Chinese general in charge.

Finally, when all too late, General Yi made a pretence of pursuit, but after crossing Cho-yung Pass and still finding himself no nearer the enemy than before, he turned back and resumed his comfortable quarters in Soul. If he thought the Japanese would hasten to take boat and return to their native land, he was much mistaken. It may be that they wished to do so, but the terrible punishment that Admiral Yi Sin sin had inflicted upon the army of reinforcement made them wary of approaching the coast, and so they found themselves practically entrapped. Had the Korean land forces been fed at this time by a man of the skill and bravery of old Admiral Yi the country would have been spared long years of war.

The Japanese in their flight south were brought face to face with this stern fact, and like the soldiers that they were they set themselves to solve the problem. They wanted to be near the sea, perhaps with a view to taking advantage of any opportunity that might present itself of slipping across to Japan, and yet they were so numerous that, living as they must on forage, it would be impossible for them all to encamp at the same place. So they adopted the plan of fortifying a long strip of the southern coast reaching from the harbour of So-sang in the district of Ulsan in Kyung-sang Province to Sun-ch'un in Chin-la Province, a distance of over two hundred and seventy miles. There were in all between twenty and thirty camps. Being thus about ten miles apart they had room for forage and still were near enough each other to render assistance in case the Koreans or their allies the Chinese should besiege them at any point. These fortified camps were all of the same general kind, overlooking the sea from a bluff and on the land side surrounded by a moat and earthworks. These preparations were made with the utmost care, for there was no hope of immediate succour and the Japanese foresaw stirring times.

In course of time the Chinese court was informed of these events and the success of their generals in the north seems to have given them some enthusiasm for prosecuting the war; so additional troops were sent to the front under the command of Generals Yu Jung and Hu Guk-ch'ung. These troops numbered 5000 and were from southern China. Among them there are said to have been many "ocean imps," or savages from the southern islands. These men could enter the water, it is said, and scuttle the enemy's ships from beneath. We are told that there were also in this army some men of immense stature who came in carts rather than on foot. These forces went into camp at Song-jin in Kyung-sang Province. General Oyu-ch'ung went into camp at Son-san, while Generals Yi Ryung, Cho Seung-hun, Nak Sang-jin, and Wang Pil-juk all encamped at Kyong-jai. In the latter part of the fifth moon a large force of Japanese attacked the important town of Chin-ju in Kyung-sang Province. At this place there was a large Korean army under General Kim Ch'un-il, Kim Sang-gi, Ch'oe Gyung-wi, Ko Jong-hu, Yang San-do Yi Jong-in. Under them were large numbers of militia and raw recruits, and this accounts in part for the speedy fall of the town and the terrible slaughter that ensued. The Japanese laid siege to the place, and after nine days, during which time they made a hundred separate assaults, they were reinforced, and the defenders, exhausted by the long struggle, were finally driven from the wall and the Japanese effected an entrance. But even after they got in, the Koreans fought desperately and sold their lives as dearly as possible. Of this most sanguinary battle only one incident is preserved in the Korean accounts. When the Japanese entered the city and had advanced to a point on the wall which overlooks the waters of the Nam-gang (river), a desperate encounter took place, in the midst of which the Korean general, Yi Jong-in, seized two of the Japanese about the waist, and, dragging them to the brink of the precipice, threw himself and them into the water below. Korean accounts say that in this battle the almost incredible number of 70,000 were killed, and that an equal number of the Japanese perished. This latter must be an exaggeration, for the loss of that number would have swept well-nigh the entire Japanese army from the country. We must remember that the Japanese army had received practically no reinforcements from the time it first landed on Korean soil, and it is safe to say that, what with the losses by sickness and accident, together with the thousands who had fallen at the hands of the Koreans and Chinese, the original force must have dwindled to 150,000 or less; in which case the loss of 70,000 men must have put them hors de combat at once. This battle is called the greatest in the whole war by the Koreans, though it is not considered the most important.

An interesting story is told of a dancing girl of this town. When the Japanese took possession of the place she was appropriated by one of the Japanese generals. One day while they were feasting in a summer-house on the wall overlooking the river, she began to weep. He asked her the reason, and she replied, "You have come here and driven away our people and our King. I do not know whether my sovereign is living, and yet I sit here and feast. I can hardly claim to be better than the beasts to sit here and make merry. I must put an end to my life." Thereupon she threw her arms about her paramour and flung herself and him over the edge, thus ending her weary life and helping to avenge her native land at the same time. For this reason she was canonized at a later date and her spirit was worshipped at this place each year by royal edict.

All this time the great Admiral Yi was in camp at Ham-an Island off the coast of Kyung-sang Province. His force was not large, but during his enforced idleness he prepared for future work. He set all his men to work making salt by evaporating sea water, and by this means he got together a great store of provisions. Needing barracks for the soldiers, he offered to the carpenters and workmen all about a bag of salt for a day's work. His energy and patriotism were so contagious that many worked for nothing and the barracks were soon built. At this point the King conferred upon him the admiralty of the three provinces of Ch'ung-ch'ung, Chul-la, and Kyung-sang.

In the ninth moon the Commissioner Sung Rung-ch'ang and General Yi Yo-sang collected their forces and started back for China. They evidently considered the back-bone of the invasion broken, and so it was; but like most spinal diseases it was destined to linger on for years before it came to an end. When these generals set out on their homeward way they left 10,000 Chinese soldiers in the hands of the Korean generals Yu Jung and O Yu-ch'ung to act as a bodyguard for the King. In spite of their suspicions of the corruptibility of General Yi Yo-sang the Koreans speak in high terms of him. They describe him as a young man of thirty, of handsome person, broad mind, and possessed of great skill in the art of war. When he was on the eve of returning to China he bared his head and showed the Koreans that his hair was already turning to gray. He told them it was because he had worked so hard for them, which piece of bathos seems to have impressed them deeply.

TELEGRAMS.

(TELEGRAMS RECEIVED AT THE LEGATION OF FRANCE IN TOKYO.)

DREYFUS VINDICATED.

Saigon, June 3.
Maitre Mornard yesterday concluded his argument tending to demonstrate the guilt of Esterhazy. He said that he did not demand the reversion of Dreyfus' sentence without a fresh hearing of the case, because Madame Dreyfus desired that her husband should be tried again and acquitted. The Court will probably make its ruling to-morrow.

Saigon, June 4.
Esterhazy, who is now in London, has confessed that he is the author of the bordereau.

The Court of Cassation has given judgment ordering the revision of the Dreyfus case, and the re-trial of Dreyfus by the Court Martial of Rennes.

Saigon, June 5.
The French Government has decided that the cruiser Sfax, commanded by Captain Coffinières de Nordeck, which is now at Fort-de-France (in Martinique), shall go to Guyane to fetch Dreyfus, so that he will arrive at Brest about the 26th of this month.

Saigon, June 6.
Proceedings have been opened against Esterhazy with reference to the manipulation of the documents of the secret dossier. An enquiry has been opened on his demand into the subject of the manner in which General de Pellieux directed the inquiry into the Esterhazy affair.

Saigon, June 7.
The Chamber further decided, by 299 votes to 238, to postpone until after the finding of the Rennes Court-martial, the nomination of a commission to prosecute General Mercier, and ordered, by 307 votes to 212, that the judgment of the Court of Cassation should be advertized throughout the whole of France.

MAJOR MARCHAND.

Saigon, June 3.
Major Marchand has been received by the President of the Republic and by the majority of the Ministers. The Chamber has unanimously voted congratulations to General Gallieni, to Major Marchand, and to M. Liotard.

GERMANY IN THE PACIFIC.

Saigon, June 4.
The Cortes has been opened at Madrid. The speech from the Throne announced the cession to Germany of the Caroline, Palao, and the Mariana Islands, in consideration of a payment of 25 millions of pesetas.

ROYALIST DEMONSTRATION AGAINST PRESIDENT LOUBET.

Saigon, June 6.
A number of young Royalists yesterday organised a demonstration against the President of the Republic at Auteuil Races. Various cries were raised, and a general hubbub ensued. Count Christian (?) struck President Loubet's hat with his cane. One hundred arrests were made. The President re-entered the Elysée amid acclamations and shouts of "Vive le Président."

Saigon, June 7.
After a stormy discussion, in the course of which the conservative Deputy, M. Burgentay, was expelled, the Chamber of Deputies, by a vote of 513 to 32, stigmatized the Auteuil scandal; approved by 326 votes to 173 the declarations of M. Dupuy, who described the Auteuil demonstration as an outrage; and passed a motion for closing the clubs.

Saigon, June 8.
Telegrams of sympathy are flowing in from abroad at the Elysée, notably from Queen Victoria and the Pope.

The French Senate, by 258 votes against 20, has offered warm expressions of sympathy to M. Loubet.

(FROM THE "JAPAN TIMES.")

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

THE DUM-DUM BULLET.
DISARMAMENT NOT MAKING PROGRESS.
London, June 2.

The Committee of the Peace Conference has resolved to prohibit the use of Dum-dum bullets. The dissentients to the resolution are England, Italy, and Austria; nor is the Conference likely to endorse the Committee.

The question of the reduction of armaments is not making progress, owing to pronounced differences of opinion among the delegates.

MARCHAND AT PARIS.
Major Marchand has arrived in Paris.
ITALY AND CHINA.

The Italian Chamber of Deputies has approved the declaration of the Foreign Minister that Italy has no intention to pursue in China the policy of occupation, its policy being merely for commercial expansion.

A DERBY HORSE KILLED.
Holocauste, which broke its leg in the Derby race, has since been killed.

THE DREYFUS AFFAIR.
London, June 4.

The French Court of Cassation has quashed the verdict of guilty on Dreyfus, and ordered the case to be retried before the Court Martial of Rennes.

Count Esterhazy has confessed that he had prepared the Bordereau.

London, June 5.
The decision for holding a Court Martial at Rennes is based on the irregularities at the first Court Martial, and on the evidence that Esterhazy was the author of the bordereaux.

A cruiser has been despatched to fetch home Dreyfus, who is to arrive at Brest on the 26th of June.

London, June 6.
The Chambers have resolved that the judgment of the Court of Cassation should be placarded throughout France and to postpone the prosecution of General Mercier until after the Court-Martial at Rennes shall have concluded its task.

HONOURS FOR MR. JACKSON.

Mr. Jackson, General Manager of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, has received a knighthood.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF DUTCH INDIA.

General Roseboom has been appointed Governor-General of Netherlands India. TRANSVAAL.

According to the Blue Book concerning the Dynamite Monopoly question in the Transvaal, Mr. Chamberlain, Secretary of State for the Colonies, sent in a strong protest in February last against the measure, in response to which the Government of the South African Republic stated that there was no infringement of the Explosives Monopoly Convention. When another protest was made during May, the South African Republic replied curtly reiterating its former statement.

The conferences at Bloemfontein are proceeding in absolute secrecy.

London, June 8.
The conference at Bloemfontein has turned out a failure. President Krüger had proposed considerable concessions concerning the questions of franchise and naturalization, which Sir Alfred Milner regarded as inadequate; but President Krüger made all proposals independent of England's acceptance of the principle of arbitration over all the differences between the two countries. It is surmised that this constituted the especial difficulty. The position is regarded as grave.

SPAIN AND GERMANY.
Queen Christina's address from the Throne at the opening of the Cortes states that the Government has signed a treaty conceding the Caroline, Pelew, and Ladrones to Germany, subject to the Cortes' approval.

COL. DU PATY DE CLAM ARRESTED.

London, June 5.
Col. Du Paty de Clam has been arrested charged with forgeries in connection with the Dreyfus affair.

ONE MILLION STERLING FOR THE CAROLINES.

Germany pays one million pounds sterling for the Carolines and Spain keeps a coaling station in each group which Germany is required to defend in case of war.

MORE BIRTHDAY HONOURS.
Mr. J. P. Rodger, the British Resident in Selangor, has been gazetted a Companion of St. Michael and St. George.

CRICKET.
The first test match between England and Australia has resulted in a draw.

PRESIDENT LOUBET ASSAULTED.

London, June 6.
President Loubet visited the races at Auteuil, when a violent demonstration of the Patriotic League took place. Baron Christiani struck the President with a stick. Several arrests have been made, including many titled royalists, mostly the élite of and the match resulted in an easy win for Surrey with 99 points to 51.

Mr. J. L. Jacobsen, who won the Australian chess championship from Mr. Crane and recently successfully defended it in a protracted match against Mr. Jones, has announced his resignation of the honour. Perhaps this is due to some failure in the negotiations for his match with Mr. Wallace, to which we recently referred. Meanwhile Mr. Wallace informs the public through the newspaper columns, "that Mr. Jacobsen has resigned the championship in his favour, being afraid to defend it," and that he (Mr. Wallace) now considers himself the champion of Australia.

THE Educational Department has ordered 38 scholars abroad to complete their education.

THE final federation referendum in South Australia stands, 66,000 for and 17,000 against.

A FIRE broke out at Tanskudo-machi, Ushigome, Tokyo, about 1.30 a.m. on the 30th.

Seven houses were wholly, and one partially burnt, and a godown was destroyed.

MAJOR MARCHAND has arrived at Toulon. The authorities and deputations received him with enthusiasm.

THERE are fears of a dysentery epidemic in Kanagawa Prefecture. Several cases are reported.

THE Paris Assize Court has acquitted M.M. Dérondelle and Habert charged with inciting the French Army to rebellion.

SIR ALFRED MILNER and President Krüger have arrived in Bloemfontein. Official receptions were held in their honour.

THERE were 32 cases of dysentery during May in Tokyo, while in the districts under the jurisdiction of the city there were 18 in all.

GENERAL GALLIENI, Governor of Madagascar, has arrived in Paris. He was received at the station by various delegations.

A COLLISION took place on the railway at Takasaki Station on Monday evening resulting in the destruction of two passenger cars.

A WASHINGTON despatch says that the Japanese Government are negotiating the engagement of two tobacco-experts for the Agricultural and Commercial Department.

MESSES Tanuma Goyemon, Tanabe Kohichi, and six others propose building an electric railway at Yokohama with a capital of 150,000 yen. They have petitioned for official sanction.

THE report on the Suez Canal states that the receipts for 1898 reached eighty eight million francs, the largest figures on record, and alludes to the increasing trade between America and Asia.

THE report of the President of the Civil Chamber of the Court of Cassation—written by M. Ballot-Beaupré—is in favour of revision of the Dreyfus case, and of its re-submission to the Council of War.

VISCOUNT SAKI CHUYU (21), Yamaicho, Ushigome, Tokyo who had been confined in a reformitory on account of loose habits of life, was arrested on Tuesday on a charge of being implicated in uttering a forged bank-note.

THE death is announced of Mr. Kamiya Saburo, who passed away on Wednesday morning at the Hospital attached to the Imperial University. He had held office as Consul and Consul general at San Francisco and Hawaii successively.

A DESPATCH received on the 31st ult., states that the torpedo boat-destroyer Yugiri arrived at Macao on the 29th ult. from Singapore and left for Shanghai the following day. The Inauma, a sister vessel, arrived at Colombo from Aden on the 30th.

A STUDENT was discovered infected with a form of contagious eye-disease early last month at the Home Ordinary Elementary School. In spite of measures of disinfection the disease rapidly spread among the students, and 305 cases are reported.

MR ODAGIRI, Japanese Consul in Shanghai, reported under date of May 24th, that it being feared that the plague would spread at Swatow, and the Shanghai Council recognizing that port to be infected, it has been determined to enforce quarantine on all ships coming to Shanghai from Swatow.

TAMANO ICHIKUMA, son of Mr. Tamano Risei, ex-President of the Court of Cassation, who has been leading a dissolute life of late, was arrested on the 29th ult. on a charge of having concealed some of his property when the latter was seized by creditors. The following day he was sentenced to one month's rigorous confinement by the Tokyo Chibo Saibansho.

ABOUT 600 peasants in Hongo and Mizuno villages, Kawachi District, Tochigi Prefecture, proceeded to the Prefectural Office on Monday morning and sought an interview with the Governor. They had a grievance in connection with a canal which has lately been commenced.

MEMBERS of the Political Economic Investigation Society and the Tokyo Chamber of Commerce entertained Mr. Arthur Dixon on Tuesday at the Imperial Hotel. Baron Osaki, Mr. Shibawawa, and other leading Tokyo business-men, numbering over 100, were present. Mr. Dixon spoke on commercial and industrial affairs.

THE graduation ceremony of the Rikugun Chuo Yonen Gakko (Central Military Preparatory School) was held on the 29th, and was honoured by the presence of the Emperor. Diplomas were given to 41 graduates by the President. His Majesty was pleased to present binocular field-glasses to three graduates.

ON Sunday at noon a Dutchman, cook aboard the German steamer D. H. Watten, now at anchor at Yokohama, rowed ashore in a boat. He was returning to the ship when the boat was capsized by the strong wind. The man was on the point of drowning when he was rescued by one Arai, who happened to pass in a sampan.

ON Tuesday a jinrikisha man named Akizuki Takijiro (32), living at Kyobashi, inflicted serious wounds with a kitchen knife on three fellow coolies who were drinking in a horse-flesh-shop. Akizuki was enraged because the other coolies begged a sum of 3 yen soon after they had borrowed yen 1.50 from him to pay the bill. The coolie thought he was being imposed upon.

ABOUT 12 o'clock on the 26th, a man, apparently 20 years old, ran into the Isezaki Police Station, Yokohama, carrying a drawn sword, and stated that he was a younger brother of Shirokura Kinsaburo, living at Kamocho, and had just wounded his brother and his brother's wife. A police inspector found the man and women lying in pools of blood, and their aged mother almost demented with terror.

THE Emperor graciously contributed two pieces of white silk fabric and 1,000 yen toward the funeral expenses of the late Marquis Daigo, besides 2,000 yen as a special gift from His Majesty to the relatives. The Crown Prince and H.I.H. Prince Kuninomiya also made gifts. Marquis Daigo's funeral took place on the 27th ult. The coffin left the residence just after noon, accompanied by military escort and a large crowd of attendants. The remains were interred at Aoyama Cemetery.

A WELL 10-DO person named Tanji Kinji living at Todamachi, near Yokohama, was arrested on Monday. He had two daughters, but not content with these, adopted another girl, aged 10, last year. This latter child he tortured mercilessly. On one occasion, suspecting her of stealing a five yen piece, he tied her hands together, and hanged her head downward from the roof of the kitchen, flogging her mercilessly with a bamboo. When the child was examined by the police she was found covered with wounds caused by hot iron tongs, and was very feeble owing to the scarcity and coarseness of her food.

THE CIVIL CODE OF JAPAN.

Mr. J. H. Gubbins has now published the Second Part of his translation of the new Civil Code, thus bringing his work to its completion. This part comprises two Books, the first on "Kindred," the second on "Succession." It is incomparably the most interesting portion of Japanese civil law, for it embodies all the customs of the country with regard to family relations, marriage, and inheritance. Recognising the fact that in the provisions of the laws relating to these topics may be found full details about a highly special phase of Japanese civilization, and recognising also that not even the average student, still less the every-day reader, is likely or competent to collect evidence so fragmentary in character, and to construct from it a comprehensive synthesis of the subject, Mr. Gubbins has prefaced his work with an introduction treating of the Japanese family system. His essay, 59 pages in length, appears to us to be an eminently learned and lucid exposition of a recondite theme. It constitutes, in fact, one of the most valuable contributions yet furnished to a knowledge of Japanese manners and customs. Our readers must not suppose that Mr. Gubbins has confined himself to throwing into connected form the disjointed story told by these sections of the Code. He has done a great deal more. He has written the history of the old ethics embodied in the provisions of the new laws, and has shown not only the peculiarities of the Japanese family system, but also the indications already apparent of an inevitable conflict between such a system and the egoistic civilization of the Occident which Japan is now rapidly assimilating. The essay has absorbing interest for every one desirous of understanding the Japanese, and we are much mistaken if the profound research and exceptional power of analysis it displays do not add considerably to Mr. Gubbins' reputation as a scholar. With regard to his translation of the laws themselves, his thorough knowledge of the Japanese language and his legal qualifications—he is a student of the Middle Temple—guarantee the accuracy of his work, and in every case his choice of language appears to be very happy. He has also followed the excellent plan pursued in his previous volume, namely, appending in the margin of every article its Japanese original. The advantages of such an addition are obvious. Another most valuable feature of the work is a copious index covering the whole Code—Parts I. and II. This Index has been compiled with the greatest care. It covers 72 pages, and by its aid one can refer in a moment to the exact provisions bearing upon any particular subject. The preparation of such an Index and the compilation of the Introduction referred to above are features which enormously enhance the value of the work and place Mr. Gubbins' translation of the Code far ahead of all competitors. There is, unfortunately, a somewhat formidable list of errata. A few of them represent corrections of translation, but the vast majority are due to typographical blunders. Mr. Gubbins employed Japanese printers, and, although Japanese printers deserve great credit for their success in setting manuscript written in a tongue that is foreign to them, they nevertheless fall into many errors, and seriously augment the labour and worry of an author. Indeed, although the preparation of Mr. Gubbins' Introduction and Index amply account for the delay that has occurred in his publication of this Second Part of his work, we strongly suspect that much of the responsibility rests with the printers. The two volumes will certainly be recognised by the public as standards, and should effectually silence all complaints about the inaccessibility of Japanese laws to foreigners.

THE FOREIGN LOAN.

Considerable interest has been excited by the news that Japan has obtained a foreign loan of 10 million pounds sterling, the rate of interest being 4 per cent. and the price of the bonds, 90. The Mainichi Shimbun sent a member of its staff to various responsible persons to make inquiries—the Vice-President of the Bank of Japan; the Vice-Minister of Finance; the Chief of the Commercial Bureau in the Foreign Office, and a Private Secretary of the Foreign Office, Mr. Hara—but they all declined, or were unable, to furnish any information. Our contemporary found, however, the usual refuge, "a certain influential person," and learned from him that an agreement had been concluded some time ago, but that, the particulars having been kept quite secret, telegraphic intelligence has come only now. The Syndicate underwriting the loan consisted, he explained, of Messrs. Samuel Samuel & Co., the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank, and two other great capitalists. The Kokumin is more explicit. It professes to have been officially informed that great efforts were made to obtain a four per cent. loan at about 95, but that, owing to the loan's clashing with the floating of bonds for Chinese railways, it was found impossible to get a better figure than 90. Inasmuch, however, as the 3-per-cent. bonds are only worth 100 in the home market, it is plain that 4 per cents. could not be sold for more than 80, so that the price obtained abroad is 10 per cent. better than the price in the domestic market. The actual rate of interest is 4½ per cent., which is nearly 1 per cent. more than Germany pays, but Germany and Japan are very different, of course.

Rumours more or less conflicting are in circulation about Japan's new foreign loan, but the salient facts seem to be tolerably distinct; namely, that the agreement was signed on the 29th or 30th ultimo; that the underwriters are a syndicate consisting of the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank, Parr's Bank, the Chartered Bank, and the Specie Bank; that the rate of interest is 4 per cent.; that the Syndicate purchase the bonds at 90; that ten years are to elapse before redemption commences, and that redemption is to be thereafter completed in forty-five years. As to the manner of redemption, however, we have no details. The present Japanese system confers on the Treasury discretionary power to regulate the amount redeemed each year; an arbitrary arrangement, not at all satisfactory to foreign investors. We do not know, also, whether any engagement has been given about the taxing of the bonds. But since, if the interest is paid abroad, they now escape taxation in Japan, it is possible that no special stipulation on that subject has been considered necessary.

The transaction is not brilliant, but it can not be called unsatisfactory when we remember that the field was already occupied by a Russian loan and a Chinese railway loan. The Tokyo Asahi, however, gives currency to a statement that better terms were offered by a syndicate composed of Messrs. Samuel Samuel and Company, the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank, and the Chartered Bank. Their representatives submitted to the Treasury a proposal the conditions of which were, 20 years without redemption, 30 years for redemption, 4 per cent. interest, and bonds at 95. The Asahi wonders why this proposal was rejected, but the Asahi's statement requires confirmation.

The facts as to the new foreign loan have now been published in the Official Gazette. They are these:—

I.—The loan amounts to ten million pounds sterling worth of 4 per cent. bonds, which are underwritten by a syndicate composed of the Yokohama Specie Bank, Parr's Bank, the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank, and the Chartered Bank.

II.—The bonds are not registered, and have the coupons attached. Their denominations are expressed in English pounds sterling; namely, £50, £100, and £500.

III.—The rate of interest is 4 per cent.

IV.—With regard to the redemption of the bonds, they are to run for a period of 10 years, counting from January 1st, 1899, after which redemption is to commence and be completed in 45 years, the bonds to be redeemed each year being determined by lot.

V.—The interest will be paid in June and December every year.

VI.—The amount of the loan is to be paid over to Japan in six instalments, commencing from June 1899, and the first half year's interest will be paid in December of the same year.

It will be seen from the above that the bonds differ from ordinary Japanese consols in three respects: first, their denominations are expressed in sterling, not in yen; secondly, their unredeemed period is to be 10 years instead of 5; thirdly, their redemption is to occupy 45 years instead of 50. Concerning the cost of this loan to Japan, an easy calculation shows that for 90 million yen which she now receives, she will have paid back 226 millions by the year 1949, when the redemption is to be completed. The total would be 228 millions were the bonds to run for a full period of 10 years before redemption commences; but by reckoning from January 1st, 1899, and making the first half-yearly payment of interest in December of the same year, the period prior to redemption is in reality reduced to 9½ years. Thus stated, the figures seem to show that Japan pays 126 million yen for the accommodation of 90 millions now given to her. But we have to remember that money is worth at least 5 per cent. in this country. Hence, adopting the same rule of simple interest, and assuming that the proceeds of the loan can be productively utilized at once, another short calculation shows that the sum actually accruing from the loan by the year 1949 will be 243½ million yen, and since the sum paid will aggregate 226 millions, as shown above, the net benefit realized by Japan will be 17½ million yen. Of course these figures do not apply if the money is devoted to unproductive purposes, as armaments. The results would be larger, also, if the interest were compounded, but we confine ourselves to an easily intelligible statement.

A FINANCIAL COMPLAINT.

The Japanese are fond of saying that foreigners are ignorant of this country's affairs, but it sometimes seems to us that the compliment might be returned with interest. The Mainichi Shimbun, for example, declares that the native agents and clerks of foreign merchants in Yokohama receive as good pay as chokunin officials and live in just as fine style. Who thrust such a phantasy into our contemporary's head, we wonder. There is probably not one tedai or banto in Yokohama who receives a salary of 100 yen a month, whereas the lowest pay of a chokunin official is 250 yen. However, this question of employes' emoluments is only incidental to the Mainichi's general argument, which aims at showing that unfair discrimination in favour of the foreign merchant is made by the Specie Bank. It is not the first time that our contemporary has given utterance to this grievance. It ventilated the subject with great vehemence and no apparent result about a year ago, but it now approaches it from a different stand-point. The general impression, we read, is that the foreigner has far more capital at his command than the Japanese. But in truth such is not the case: The majority of the foreign merchants conduct their business with a capital of from ten thousand to a hundred thousand yen. Very few indeed have a capital of half a million. On the other hand, there are numbers of Japanese traders who are good for half a million or more. Yet they do not make the same profits or enjoy the same luxury as the foreigner. What is the reason? Is it not that the foreigner knows how to utilize his capital much better than the Japanese does, and that he can obtain credit from the banks on much easier terms? It is here that the Mainichi's arraignment of the Specie Bank comes in. The people at the Specie Bank, it avers, trust a foreigner much more readily than they trust a Japanese, and while they honour the former's bills without hesitation, they will not look at the latter's without substantial security. Hence the foreigner has a manifest advantage.

It might have occurred to our contemporary that the fault in this matter lies, not at the door of the Specie Bank, but at the door of the Japanese merchant. Such, at least, would be the view taken by any foreign critic. If a bank gives to A credit which it denies to B, not the bank is to blame, but B's failure to be worthy of trust. It is very probable that Japanese merchants are more or less hampered in their business, as compared with foreign merchants, by the difficulty of obtaining accommodation from the banks, but to hold the banks responsible is putting the saddle on the wrong horse altogether. We may add, too, that we doubt the correctness of our contemporary's fundamental assertion. We doubt whether the plums of the country's foreign trade fall into the lap of the foreigner. The volume of the trade has increased enormously in the last two decades, yet the number of foreigners engaged in carrying it on has remained virtually stationary, which certainly would not be the case if they were making money. The Japanese element, on the contrary, grows more and more numerous, and it is in the Japanese settlement that we detect all the evidences of expansion and prosperity. The banks may not be kind to the Japanese merchant, but he "gets there" all the same, a fact which does credit to his shrewdness and business capacity.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

The journey taken to Kyoto by Mr. Mitsuhashi, of the Foreign Office, has set the tongue of rumour wagging. According to the Asahi's information, the Emperor, reading the telegrams recently received, desired to address some inquiries to the Cabinet, and in the absence of the Prime Minister, sent Marquis Tokudaiji to the Foreign Office as bearer of certain questions. The Minister of Foreign Affairs deemed it advisable to consult Marquis Yamagata before replying, and sent Mr. Mitsuhashi to Kyoto for that purpose. Such is the Asahi's version. It is very probable, we imagine, that Mr. Mitsuhashi's mission has for its object the conveyance of some message to Marquis Yamagata, but if the Emperor wanted information about foreign affairs, His Majesty would send for Viscount Aoki and consult him directly. There would be no occasion for communicating with the Prime Minister in the ordinary course of events.

The sensational stories circulated about the mission of Mr. Mitsuhashi, of the Foreign Office, to the Premier in Kyoto, are now replaced by a statement that the purpose of Mr. Mitsuhashi's journey is to obtain Marquis Yamagata's views about a question submitted by Baron Hayashi, who represents Japan at the Peace Conference in Holland. Baron Hayashi seems to have found that the Conference's deliberations had assumed a character not clearly contemplated by his instructions.

The appointments long predicted in connexion with the Foreign Office in Tokyo, have now become an accomplished fact; namely, Mr. Hayashi Gonsuke to be Minister Plenipotentiary in Korea; Mr. Nakada Keigi to be Minister Resident in Siam, and Mr. Sugimura Shun to be Head of the Commercial Bureau in the Foreign Office, vice Mr. Hayashi. We are not cognisant of the reasons which have prompted a change of Japanese Representative in Seoul, for Mr. Kato's success there is understood to have been unequivocal. Probably the explanation is that Mr. Kato, having served nearly five years, will be appointed to some other post in the ordinary routine.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.

Sinister predictions have recently been based by certain vernacular newspapers on the excess of imports over exports since March last. For example, comparing the March and April returns, it is found that the exports of the principal staples declined as follows:—

	March. Yen.	April. Yen.
Raw Silk	2,320,000	1,490,000
Habutaye	1,240,000	720,000
Cotton Yarn	2,890,000	1,960,000
Copper	1,100,000	920,000

The Fiji Shimpō, however, points out with much truth that the export trade is always comparatively small during the first half of the year. Even in 1892, when the exports for the whole year exceeded the imports by 19,770,000 yen, the imports showed an excess during May. It may therefore be reasonably expected that the second half of the year will redress the balance to some extent at all events.

LOOK AT HOME.

There is no gainsaying the sound common sense of the Kokumin Shimbun's views about Japan's present-day foreign affairs. The advocates of a stalwart policy in China, the men who cry out for a basis of operations in Fuhkien and denounce Viscount Aoki as a worthless statesman because he does not amuse them with displays of fireworks—these complainants would do well to consider the uses to which they and their countrymen have put the privileges secured by the Shimonoseki Treaty. New Japanese settlements in China were provided by that agreement, but they remain to this day nurseries of weeds and residences of vermin. Would a concession in Fuhkien fare differently? The Japanese are intelligent. They bring a clear faculty of discernment to the study of the world's history. They must be sensible, therefore, of the reason why Great Britain's growth has no element of artificiality. They must see why she utilizes all the opportunities she obtains, and why each new step of advance that she makes is justified by the story of her previous progress. It is because the enterprise of her people precedes the action of her officials. There is nothing tentative or experimental about the privileges her statesmen busy themselves to obtain from foreign countries. Definite practical proof has been obtained in every case that the privileges will be turned to profitable account by British subjects, and will neither remain mere empty concessions nor inure to the benefit of foreigners only. But, while Japanese agitators expect their Government to obtain new privileges from China, it does not occur to them to reflect that the privileges already obtained remain a dead letter. The ultimate truth is that the Japanese have no spare capital. They have not money enough even for their own needs. Impenitency is fatal to enterprise abroad. If Englishmen were not perplexed to discover uses for their vast accumulations of capital; if, like the Japanese, they had at their own doors opportunities to profitably employ every available shilling, they would be comparatively quiet stay-at-home folk, for, though the capitalist himself may not go abroad in search of investments, he is always ready to come to the aid of those that do. When the Japanese have developed something of the Britisher's mood, acquired something of his capacity to exploit new fields, and begun to strike out on their own account, it will be time enough for them to dictate a policy of aggrandisement to their statesmen.

SILK CROP IN CHINA.

A telegram published by the Fimmin and said to have been received from Shanghai on the 24th ultimo by the Yokohama Silk Company, says that the production of silk in China this year is expected to be 62,000 bales of white; 8,000 bales of green-white (awo-shiro), and 7,000 bales of best filatures. That would be a yield ten per cent. better than last year's. The production for the past six years stand thus:—

1894	67,200 bales
1895	70,000 "
1896	60,000 "
1897	60,000 "
1898	70,000 "
1899	77,000 " (estimate).

THE JAPANESE IN KOREA.

There are 2,000 Japanese residing in Sŏul; 6,000 in Jinsen; 5,000 in Fusan; and about 3,500 elsewhere in Korea, making a total of 16,500. If to these be added the men who go every season to fish in Korean waters, it is estimated that the aggregate can not be less than twenty thousand. Mr. Kato, Japanese Representative in Sŏul and now in Tokyo, has been adducing these figures in support of his contention that Japan has great interests in the peninsula, and that her people should bestir themselves to make the most of their present opportunities before Europeans and Americans come in to compete. Mr. Kato has represented his country in Korea ever since the assassination of the Queen. He says that his position after that terrible affair was very difficult. The Koreans hated and distrusted the Japanese, and Mr. Kato found nothing but cold looks, if not actual hostility, everywhere. But by degrees the evil past has been lived down, and now the Japanese occupy a good place in Korean esteem. Mr. Kato might have supported his assertion by pointing to the comparative immunity from outrage which his nationals now enjoy in the peninsula. For quite a long while after the death of the Queen, not a month, sometimes not a week, passed without intelligence that a Japanese merchant or traveller had been killed or dangerously wounded by Korean roughs. The Tokyo Government showed a great deal of long-suffering in its manner of dealing with those incidents. It might have made them a pretext for demands of a very substantial character. But it probably recognised that they were partly due to resentment resulting from the Queen's fate. We never hear of such sanguinary incidents now. The inference is very plain.

ANTI-TAX-INCREASE LEAGUE.

The League for effecting a reduction of taxation held a meeting in Kyoto on the 27th instant. Delegates from two cities and twenty-seven prefectures were present, and the audience is said to have numbered two thousand four hundred. The principal political leaders who attended were Count Okuma, Viscount Miura, Messrs. Ohigashi, Suzuki, &c. The meeting endorsed by acclaim a proposal pledging the Progressist Party to agitate for restoring the Land Tax, the Soy Tax, and the Post and Telegraph rates to the amounts levied prior to the recent changes.

It appears to be the general opinion that this agitation for reduced taxation is not likely to be very successful. The people are not really suffering from heavy taxes. No one is sensibly embarrassed by the increases that the Diet voted last session, and any folks who can be induced to support the agitation will obey motives of craft, not dictates of honest conviction. Still the issue has at all events the advantage of being tangible and intelligible. In the past it has been the misfortune of Japanese political parties to stand upon platforms incapable of clear definition. No one appreciated the disadvantages of such nebulousness better than Count Okuma, and he and his colleagues are doubtless charmed to have found a text which appeals to the discernment as well as the interests of the people.

"SELECTED RELICS OF JAPANESE ART."

The first volume of this work is now published. We have already spoken of its scope and object, but we may here repeat that the intention of the publishers is to lay before the world a thousand pictures of the finest specimens of ancient Japanese art, and that the task will involve the issue of 20 volumes each containing about 50 plates. The prelates of the Zen Sect of Buddhism are the chief promoters of the undertaking. They have placed at the disposal of the publishers all the heirlooms of the great monasteries over which they preside, and other Sects are lending their coöperation. It is only in the temples that really grand and authentic examples of this country's old art are to be found, and unfortunately they are virtually inaccessible to the general public. It is true that a zealous dilettante can obtain access to these treasures by going from temple to temple. But, unless he is armed with special credentials, he must select the fête days when access to the heirlooms of the monasteries is granted to the general public, and in any case he will not only fail to see some of the choicest specimens, but will also experience nearly insuperable difficulty in obtaining information essential to an intelligent review of their periods and artists. We have often alluded to these difficulties, and expressed a strong hope either that steps would be taken to bring the various objects together in a national museum—which would certainly be the most satisfactory course—or that pictures of them would be taken and published. About 10 years ago, if we remember rightly, a Government Commission, under the Presidency of Viscount Kuki, was sent round to inspect all the art treasures of the temples, and it was understood that the Commission seized the opportunity to photograph the best specimens. The photographs are now in the possession of the Art Museum. We imagined that they were destined to illustrate a comprehensive history of Japanese art, materials for compiling which were to be collected by Viscount Kuki and other connoisseurs and students. But apparently the project has not made much advance towards achievement, and in the meanwhile the Zen Prelates and certain ardent students of art have come forward, selected a thousand of the finest specimens in the monasteries, and commenced to publish pictures of them in a series of volumes which, when completed, will form a magnificent and absorbingly interesting album. It is scarcely necessary to remind the public that Japanese art may be said to have grown up under the shadow of Buddhism. The greatest efforts of sculpture, of painting, of decorative carving, and of lacquering were made on behalf of the temples. That is especially true of the Zen Sect. One of the last of the Ashikaga Shoguns, Yoshimasa, whose life of artistic refinement and voluptuous self-indulgence made the second half of the fifteenth century memorable, is counted to this day the greatest dilettante Japan ever produced. It was he that elaborated the tea ceremonial, and it was in his palace at Higashi-yama that a collection of objects of virtu was formed which to this day holds easily the first place in the nation's traditions of everything eminently aesthetic and artistically orthodox. In all that phase of his career Yoshimasa had the countenance and encouragement of the Zen prelates, and it may well be supposed that he did not fail to follow the example set by the Imperial Court and the great nobles from the days of the Empress Suiko through the Nara, Heian, Kamakura, and Muromachi epochs, the example of enlisting the aid of the country's best artists for the decoration of the temples, the provision of their furniture and paraphernalia, and the enrichment of their heirlooms. Even Hideyoshi, with whom aristocratic traditions counted for so little, Hideyoshi, three of whose most renowned lieutenants had originally been a carpenter, the son of a druggist, and a menial, respectively—did not neglect the canon of generosity to the temples or fail to add to their art treasures. If, when Buddhism was disestablished after the Restoration of 1867, it had occurred to the Government to adopt immediate precautions against the dispersal of the temples' heirlooms, there might now be a possibility of forming a national museum which would be a Mecca to all the art pilgrims of the world. A grand opportunity was lost—not wholly, however, for, though many noble specimens have been sold abroad, broken up, or otherwise lost to the nation, many still remain, as is amply attested by the beautiful volume now before us. It will at once be evident to any one examining the volume that the compilers have found it impossible to arrange the specimens in historical sequence. They tell us so, indeed, quite frankly. Had they been able to do so, the value of the work would have been immensely enhanced. But there will be nothing to prevent re-arrangement after the completion of the series, for the authors have wisely refrained from numbering the plates, and as each is accompanied by a very full note explaining the subject, identifying the artist, where identification is possible, and drawing attention to the most noteworthy features of the work, any amateur will be able to place the pictures hereafter in regular sequence. These notes are printed in Japanese and in English. Their authors are Mr. S. Fujii, of the Middle School of Saitama, and Doctor J. Takakusu, of the Imperial University of Tokyo—a gentleman deeply versed in Buddhist lore. The English text is revised we are told, and special notes in art history and criticism are added by Professor C. F. Fenollosa, but there is reason to doubt the statement. The celebrated photographer, Mr. Ogawa; the wood-engraver, Mr. O. Morikawa; and the colour-printer, Mr. T. Tamura, are responsible for the execution of the illustrations, and Mr. S. Tajima is the general editor. All these gentlemen have done their work admirably, but we venture to say one word to Mr. Tajima, namely, that he had better refrain from publishing any English text which has not had the benefit of Mr. Fenollosa's revision. Japanese cannot write book English, any more than Englishmen can write book Japanese. It is easy to see that very few of the notes accompanying the plates have passed through Mr. Fenollosa's hands: they are not composed in the strong, nervous, and highly idiomatic English of which he is master, as proved by the preface to which his name is affixed. Indeed the composition of some is almost ridiculous, as when we are told, for example, that the "noble and dignified feature" (of four images) "can inspire a fear to us," and that "their strong constitution of body and quiet attitude are worthy of the patrons of the religion and of the world;" or elsewhere, of another image that "his meek countenance and formal dress are the marks of a master-work of the old age;" or again, of an image of Fudo, that it was sculptured by Kobo Daishi "doing homage three times in each cut." Moreover, in a leaflet descriptive of "the woven figures on the cover and the written characters on the title," we find it stated that "Emperor Uda was the 59th of the Imperial line who deeply believed in the law of Buddha"; and that "Kobo Daishi was notorious for his calligraphy." Now it is true that the Emperor Uda was the 59th of the Imperial line, but it is not true that he was the 59th who believed in Buddhism, since twenty-five of his predecessors never even heard of Shaka, and to say that a man is "notorious" for a learned accomplishment is an execrable abuse of terms. The trouble—we that speak have suffered—the trouble of working in association with Japanese is that one never knows when they will break away on some independent line of their own, and disfigure a whole enterprise by solecisms which might have been completely avoided had the principle of co-operation been scrupulously adhered to. The "woven figures" referred to in this leaflet are the decorative design of the silk cover, which is said to be an exact reproduction of the brocaded silk stole worn by the ex-Emperor Uda—whose date, we observe, is given as 867 to 931, whereas all the historical records with which we are acquainted represent him as having come to the throne in 893 A.D. Of the 53 plates contained in this first volume, three are chromoxylographs; the remainder, colotypes. They are really admirable reproductions, telling us more about the artists of old Japan than volumes of description could teach. Only one example of bronze sculpture appears in this part, but we presume that the deficiency will be made good hereafter. To us the most interesting plates are the reproductions of works by celebrated painters. Looking at these pictures by Soga Jashoku, Meicho, Kano Motonobu, Sesshu, and Kano Eitoku, and recalling the shallow and flippant generalizations of certain foreign writers who deservedly rank as great sinologues, we are reminded of the old truism that too much learning is one direction often makes men blind in another. Possibly these volumes will open their eyes. It is to be sincerely hoped that the enterprise will repay its projectors. The expense must be very great. It ought to be possible to find in America and Europe purchasers of the 1,000 copies to which the edition is limited. We can not too strongly recommend the work—or at any rate this first volume of it—to every one interested in the art of Japan.

DOGS AND DIPLOMACY.

The uses of diplomacy are evidently very varied, according to the view of the Yomiuri Shimbun. It represents the Spanish Minister as actively engaged negotiating with the Japanese Foreign Office about the recent poisoning of his pet dog. An important international question, truly! The Foreign Office, our contemporary goes on to explain, experiences great difficulty in obtaining satisfaction for His Excellency, inasmuch as the action of the police is impeded by Consular Jurisdiction. A certain lady, of German origin but naturalized in America, is suspected of having ordered her betto to lay in likely places pieces of meat sprinkled with strychnine. But the lady can not be arraigned before her Consul in the absence of tangible evidence, and evidence is hard to obtain, since the betto, in his capacity of a foreigner's servant, is beyond the reach of the police.

Dismissing the absurd notion that the Foreign Office can have been approached about such an affair, we may point out that unless it can be proved that the poison was laid on the public thoroughfare or within the compound of some one who was not the poisoner, the police have no competence to take any step. There is a theory that some of the dogs found the strychnine on the road-side, and that some received the dose within the precincts of their owners' residences. It would be very difficult, we fear, to prove anything of the kind. Were proof forthcoming, however, the betto and his mistress would be liable to punishment, whereas if they confined their operations to their own compound, they were within their rights.

DYSENTERY.

Some uneasiness is caused by the returns of dysentery received from provincial districts. Not only has the disease declared itself unusually soon, but its virulence is already marked. The record for a period of 5 days shows 15 cases in Niigata Prefecture, 17 in Kumamoto, 15 in Kagoshima, 17 in Miyazaki, and 13 in Tochi. In Tokyo also the disease has made its appearance, and the Vice-Minister of Home Affairs, the Governor and the Chief of Police, after consultation, have applied to the Mayor asking for an emergency meeting of the City Assembly, and the appointment of a sanitary committee.

We find some very interesting figures in the Jimmin with reference to dysentery. The terrible ravages made by the disease in Japan have often been referred to in these columns, but our contemporary's statistics are more eloquent than words. During the five years ended in 1897, the total number of persons attacked by the eight infectious diseases in Japan was 938,216, and out of that aggregate no less than 552,109, or 58 per cent., were dysentery patients. Further, the deaths from these 8 diseases aggregated 269,086, and of these 137,880, or 51 per cent., resulted from dysentery. In short, dysentery attacks 110,420 persons on the average every year, and kills 27,578. Turning to Tokyo, the Jimmin points out that the total number of persons attacked by the eight diseases in the above five-year period was 17,107, of whom 6,921 were dysentery patients; and the total number of deaths was 5,298, dysentery being responsible for 2,148 of them. That is to say, dysentery was the cause of illness in 40 per cent. of the cases, and the cause of death in 40 per cent. also. It further turns out that Tokyo is incomparably the most backward city in the whole empire with regard to sanitary precaution. Not backward in proportion to its population, but actually behind far smaller towns in the amount of its expenditure for this important purpose. Here are the striking figures:—

AMOUNT ANNUALLY SPENT FOR PURPOSES OF SANITATION IN THE YEAR 1896
Tokyo	11,126 Yen.
Yokohama	39,211 "
Osaka	67,000 "
Kobe	47,000 "
Kyoto	13,000 "
Sendai	10,000 "
Niigata	14,000 "
Hiroshima	11,300 "
Takamatsu	19,000 "

Tokyo takes the wooden spoon all round. It is the worst governed and the most unprogressive city in all Japan. It will wake up some day and be thoroughly ashamed of itself.

NIPPON YUSEN KAISHA.

The semi-annual general meeting of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha took place in the Hall of the Seinen-kai, Kanda, Tokyo, on the 26th instant at half-past three p.m. The President, Mr. Kondo, having taken the chair, addressed the meeting as follows:—

Gentlemen—The past half-year has been a time of depression for the maritime carrying trade on the coast and in neighbouring waters. No signs have yet become apparent of an improvement in Japanese economical conditions, and a comparative dullness of goods traffic has to be recorded. The fishing industry in Hokkaido proved almost unprecedentedly unsuccessful, and that fact, supplemented by the opening of railways in the Hoku-iku district, caused a very marked diminution in our revenue as compared with the figures for the preceding year. With regard to our European service, again, there has been since last autumn a great falling off of goods traffic and a marked tendency to dullness, but by exercising diligence in obtaining cargoes, we were able to secure a fairly good result, and to escape the large reduction of business that threatened at one time. As for the American service, the conclusion of the war with Spain was followed by a tolerably good trade. On the Australian line, the depression existing in Japan resulted in an unavoidable diminution of imports, but, on the other hand, exports increased and the passenger traffic was good. Nevertheless, in consequence of employing vessels of an expensive character on these lines, we found it difficult to secure a proper return on the capital involved, and had to ask the Government for assistance. Our application was successful, and since April we have been in receipt of an increased subsidy. Finally, on the Bombay line our returns have been satisfactory. Such are the general results of the half-year's working. The accounts are as follow:—

Brought over from preceding period	Yen. 587,036
Net profit, &c., for the half year ...	1,155,110
Total	1,742,146
To Reserves	Yen. 57,735
Rewards to Officers	42,293
Dividend, at the rate of 9 per cent.	990,000
Carried to next account	652,098
Total	1,742,146

We do not propose a larger dividend because we anticipate small returns during the next half-yearly period owing to a depressed state of the carrying trade in domestic and adjacent waters. Moreover, now that the Company has achieved its long-entertained hope and obtained a special subsidy from the Diet for the American and European lines, we have incurred corresponding responsibilities as to the nature of the services.

After the conclusion of the President's speech, the report was passed without discussion, and the meeting broke up at half-past four, having lasted only an hour. Vernacular newspapers state that 2,076 shareholders were present—the number is scarcely credible—representing 295,330 shares. The three largest shareholders were, the Imperial Estates Bureau (80,550 shares), Baron H. Iwasaki (26,447 shares), and Baron T. Mitsui (8,212 shares).

MARQUIS ITO ON CHINA.

"This is certainly not a time for inactivity," Marquis Ito is reported to have said, speaking at Kurume on the 17th instant with reference to the China question. "The Far-Eastern problem has entered an acute stage since the war. It is not possible to express in words the degree of the acuteness. * * * Looking closely at the condition of China, we find it changing from day to day, and the probable result seems to be that, before many years have passed, she will fall into an exceptional state. Hence, when I was last in China, I approached the Ministers charged with the conduct of the country's affairs, and expressed my opinion plainly. I came back filled with regret at observing that virtually no change corresponding to the progress of the age is taking place either in the customs of the Chinese, or in the disposition of the people, or in their traditional habits, or in the education which they have so long trusted. It is true that none of the officials with whom I spoke dissented from my views. What Japan desires for her own sake and for her neighbour's is that China's integrity should be preserved, that she should become progressive, and that she should maintain her position in the Orient. But it must be confessed that China has fallen into a condition which offers very little hope of these things being accomplished. What then is to be the issue? It will be, I think, that we shall find ourselves separated from the countries of Europe by only a narrow strip of water. It seems to me therefore of paramount importance under such circumstances that Japan should take steps for her own protection, that she should seek to improve her position, and that she should make every effort not to let her rate of progress fall behind that of the countries by which she will be confronted."

These words, assuming them to correctly reported, are very unequivocal. They indicate complete loss of hope in the possibility of saving China, and they also indicate a firm belief that her partition among the Powers of Europe is only a question of time. We entirely agree with Marquis Ito.

Count Okuma's optimistic views about China's resistance to disruption are not shared by the Fiji Shimpō. That journal's opinion is that the so-called "future problem of China's dismemberment" is not a future problem at all, and will never enter the realm of practical problems. The world will have no opportunity of discussing the event until it is an accomplished fact. If China were so small that the operation of cutting into her involved a clashing of weapons, we might expect her dissection to be preceded by discussion and arranging. But she is so huge that every one can take a slice without encroaching upon his fellow amputator. It is true that England and Russia have been talking together lately and that their pourparlers have resulted in a Convention. It is also true that some folks attribute the Convention to a desire on the part of the contracting parties to avoid a collision with one another. But the Fiji thinks that the true motive of the negotiators was to proclaim their rights and thus extend their claims. The first announcement of the Chinese disruption problem will be an advertisement that disruption is achieved, and that the integrity of the ancient empire exists no longer even in name.

LAWS AND THEIR STUDY.

Do the Japanese read their own laws, we wonder? The Fiji Shimpō declares that they do not, and is disposed to blame them greatly for want of diligence. Laws, it says, have from time immemorial been regarded by the Japanese as mere instruments of punishment or vetoes against wrong-doing. Beyond perusing the special enactments posted up from time to time in public places, a man had no need to trouble himself about the laws. All that was necessary was that he should follow the dictates of his own conscience, assured that, if he did so, the law would never intrude itself upon his daily life. Civil legislation was something of which he had no conception. But our contemporary thinks that he ought to abandon that mood of indifference, since codes of civil law and civil procedure have been enacted and promulgated. It will not do for him to live by rule of thumb, trusting to be rescued by a legal expert from any difficulties into which his ignorance may plunge him.

That is a sensible homily no doubt. Does it apply to the Japanese alone? The foreign residents will very soon pass under Japanese laws, and many of them profess to be very uneasy on the subject. Do they make any attempt to acquaint themselves with the nature of this country's laws? There is no difficulty to be overcome in acquiring a fair general knowledge. Able translations of the Codes have been published in English, German, and French. They are accessible to everybody. But to the majority of the community they appear to be a sealed book, and, judging from some of the comments that have appeared in the local press, even those that undertake to criticise them will not go to the trouble of reading them.

RUMOURED AGITATION.

Some publicists are quite determined that the calm now prevailing in the official world shall not continue, if they can possibly create a storm. Even the usually sedate Mainichi Shimbun lends itself to that kind of effort. It represents the leaders of the Liberal Party as having held a secret meeting, and resolved to address to the Cabinet various questions; as, for example, what are the relations between the Government and the new political party; whether the Government intends to help the Liberals in the July elections for members of the Local Assemblies; what is to be done about the long-talked-of special regulations with regard to official appointments; will due consideration be given to the Liberals' views about railways, harbour construction, and education; and what course does the Cabinet intend to take about China. Such assertions must be received with all reserve.

The same journal has another item of intelligence. It alleges that the Liberals have at length awoken to the necessity of curtailing the military expenditure, and that Count Itagaki, calling on Viscount Katsura on the 24th ultimo, submitted four suggestions on behalf of the Liberals:

first, that the Army estimates for next year shall not exceed those of the present year; secondly, that measures shall be adopted to increase the number of soldiers who are allowed to return home before the expiration of their time with the Colours; and thirdly, that soldiers shall not be employed any longer as body-servants for officers. These, our readers will observe, are precisely the views recently advanced by Viscount Miura. Of course it might be possible to give effect to the second and third proposals without changing the post-bellum programme, but to keep next year's estimates down to this year's figure would involve abandonment of the expansion scheme at the point to which it has already been carried. We do not for a moment suppose that Count Itagaki has advanced any such doctrine.

IS THERE ANY EXODUS.

Truly we fail to discover any grounds for the Nichi Nichi Shimbun's assertion that the prospect of passing under Japanese jurisdiction is thinning out the foreign community of Yokohama. Our contemporary says that, according to the Japanese forecast, an access of foreigners should result from the opening of the country, but events are falsifying the prediction. People are emigrating to Hongkong, to Shanghai, and to Singapore. Vacant houses abound on the Bluff; even the prisoners in the British Consular jail are to be moved to Hongkong. Have these allegations a basis of fact? We do not hear of any departures. There used to be a great deal of talk about something of the kind. The prophets of evil foretold that, rather than submit to Japanese jurisdiction, many of the foreign merchants would put up their shutters and go elsewhere to seek fortune under the ægis of their country's laws. We have had the pleasure of encountering precisely one person who professed to be leaving Japan for that reason. It was about a year ago. He passed through Tokyo on his way from Kobe to Europe, and subsequent inquiry revealed the fact that his departure was due to a want of appreciation on the part of his fellow-residents, none of whom found it worth while to pay him to stay. Is it likely that any one professing to fly from Japanese jurisdiction is really influenced by considerations similar to those which drove out the Kobe patriot? No one is going to fly until there is something to fly from. The door of exit will always stand open. As for the prisoners in the jail, the Nichi Nichi's reference to them is entertaining.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

The torpedo-destroyer Ikasuchi, which left Hongkong on the 21st ultimo, arrived at Sasebo on the 25th at 8 p.m. She was built at Yarrow's. Her launch took place on the 15th of last November, and she set out from England on the 8th of March, so that her voyage occupied 78 days—a very leisurely gait. The Ikasuchi is 311 tons displacement, and has a speed of 31 knots. She was brought out by an English crew.

Japanese bonds held by foreigners in England have hitherto escaped taxation, if the interest on them is paid outside Japan. But their days of immunity are over. Required to make up a deficiency of nearly three millions in the public revenue the Chancellor of the Exchequer has obtained the consent of the Commons to impose a tax of five shillings per £100, or $\frac{1}{20}$ th per cent., on all bonds on the occasion of their transfer or sale.

The Emperor of Korea is said to have given five interviews to Mr. Oniwa Chobei, and to have conferred on him the second class of the Korean Order. By way of explaining such graciousness, our Tokyo contemporaries allege that the Emperor believes Mr. Oniwa to have initiated the project of transferring a sum of 20 million yen from the Chinese Indemnity to the Japanese Imperial estates, and that His Majesty hopes to have Mr. Oniwa advocate a similar appropriation of 5 millions for the Court in Sōul. A brilliant idea!

Our Tokyo contemporaries announce, with some not unnatural satisfaction, that Mr. Kurosawa Reikichi has been appointed to a post in the Imperial Chinese Customs at Amoy. The rules of the Service declare all nationalities eligible, but hitherto Europeans and Americans alone have been admitted. Mr. Yano, Japanese Representative in Peking, appears to have recommended Mr. Kurosawa to Sir Robert Hart, and the Inspector-General has now acted on the recommendation. Mr. Kurosawa completed his education in America. He ought to be competent to discharge the duties which he now assumes.

It is stated by the Yomiuri Shimbun that the engagement of Dr. Myers as Adviser to the Formosan Government has been discontinued. The information is contained in a telegram dated at Taipei on the 28th instant. Dr. Myers' views as to the best method of administration in the island were said to be more or less in conflict with those of Dr. Goto, the Head of the Civil Government Bureau, and, if the Yomiuri's intelligence be correct, we surmise that the opinions of the two experts could not be reconciled. When Dr. Myers left Tokyo, there did not appear to be any prospect of his services terminating.

All the dignity of big type and double leading is given by the Shogyo Shimpō to a rumour that the French syndicate—or individual—who two years ago obtained from the Korean Government the concession of the Sōul-Wiju railway, has offered to sell the privilege to a Japanese capitalist, following the example set by the American concessionaire of the Sōul-Chemulpo road. Assuming that the offer has been made, the question is—will any Japanese be found to accept it. We doubt it. A railway from Sōul to Wiju has no prospects whatever as a money-earning enterprise. It has great strategical importance, but private capitalists do not spend their funds upon purely political objects.

The Yoroku Chōko and the Chiuo Shimbun publish a scandalous story of the grossest character, the principal actor in which is a former Cabinet Minister who is also a prominent member of the Diet and was once his country's representatives at a foreign Court. We refrain, of course, from giving the particulars of the affair or the name of the gentleman concerned, and, indeed, if the tale rested on the authority of the Yoroku alone, it would not receive much credence. But the added testimony of the Chiuo is not without significance. It will be interesting to see what steps are taken by the ex-Minister. If he suffers such a tale to pass without refutation or denial, the public can not choose but condemn him—that is to say, the foreign public, for there seems to practically no limit to the licence that the Japanese public allows to the press.

"Is something striking to be done in foreign politics, or are the country's armaments to be reduced? One or the other of these two courses must be taken. The ostensible reason assigned for expanding the armaments was the inception of an active foreign policy. It was pre-empted that the same submission made to the three Powers in the matter of Liaotung had been necessitated by insufficiency of armaments. It was further alleged that the same cause must be held responsible for Japan's inaction in the face of China's partition by foreign States. But we can not tell how the conditions of Western countries will have changed before Japan's armaments are complete. * * * To go on keeping a great force of men with the Colours, as is done to-day can not be a wise course. Is the battle to be joined forthwith, or is a minatory attitude to be assumed? Whatever is done should be done quickly. Otherwise the national resources will be exhausted." Such is the Nippon's way of thinking. It is a fine example of statesmanship!

The members of the Tokyo City Assembly are the object of much abuse and ridicule now-a-days. Their project—from which they were with difficulty diverted—of despatching a committee to Europe and America for the purpose of inspecting and reporting upon the municipal control, sewerage, drainage, policing, communications and so forth of all the chief cities of the Occident, in the brief space of 10 months, naturally provoked much merriment, and it is now openly declared that their complaisance in allowing the Tramway Company to increase its fares by 20 per cent. is the result of a generous distribution of douceurs by the Company. The clever caricaturist of the Fuji Shimpō occupies his brush with this subject. He shows a tram-car drawn by centaurs with the heads of City-Assembly members. The driver holds suspended before them a bag of money dangling from the end of a pole, and the centaurs gallop along in pursuit of the bait, while the horses, relieved from their wonted labour, sit by the road-side fanning themselves, with inane surprise depicted on their countenances. Japanese public morality must be in a rather decayed condition if we may credit all the things that are written and said about it.

Those that may be credited with an intimate knowledge of Marquis Ito's sentiments are unanimous in denying the possibility of any union between him and Count Okuma. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun delivers the latest judgment on this subject. It declares that the rupture between Marquis Ito and Count Okuma in 1889 was final: there is not the least probability of their coming together again. Further, Marquis Ito has no disposition at present to re-enter the political arena. What he might do in the event of a national crisis is a question apart; but, speaking generally, he is not inclined to ally himself with any of the parties now occupying the field. Their methods and their organization are objectionable to him. At all events, he would insist upon his own terms, and whether they could be carried out under present circumstances is doubtful. Evidently he regards the political education of the people as one of the most important problems of the time, and in obedience to that conviction he is travelling hither and thither, and delivering sometimes as much as three lectures a day. It is certain that the audiences he addresses will acquire a greatly enlarged knowledge of the spirit of constitutional government.

Our readers are aware that a committee was appointed some time ago to investigate the question of erecting permanent buildings for the Diet. The present structure is of a purely temporary character, and would have been already replaced by a solid edifice had not financial difficulties stood in the way. We read in vernacular journals that the Committee, at its meeting on Saturday last, debated three questions: first, whether the plans should be prepared by Japanese architects; secondly, whether their preparation should be entrusted to some eminent European architect; and thirdly whether a prize should be offered for the best design by any architect of whatever nationality. The third system was finally decided on, with a further provision that the various designs be examined and judged in Paris at the time of the International Exhibition. Whether that entails the presence of the Committee in Paris we do not know, but, inasmuch as the total expenses of the competition—including the prize—are estimated at 500,000 yen, we are inclined to think that the Committee intended to provide for a trip on their own account to Europe.

Rumours are circulated to the effect that another assassin in posse has arrived from Korea. He is said to be the notorious I Isik, who came to Japan some years ago to compass the death of the ill-fated Kim Ok-kyun, and was sentenced to banishment on his return to Sōul, not—some folks said—for having attempted the crime of murder, but for having failed to accomplish it. This worthy gentleman has grown weary of exile, and having changed his name to I Sesik, made his appearance on the 24th instant at Moji, among the passengers in the S.S. Chikugo Maru. The report assigns to him a mysterious companion, who seems averse to letting his face be seen, and adds that the two men wore Japanese costume, and took refuge from public observation in the cabin of a Mrs. Yun Hyochang, who was on her way to Japan to join her husband. It is altogether a very sketchy kind of anecdote, for nothing is said as to this secret executioner's intended victim, nor do we know that any political refugee now sojourning in Japan is sufficiently important to merit such a delicate attention as a special murderer all on his own account. However, some of the Korean residents in this country are said to be considerably alarmed, mainly, so far as we can perceive, on the general principle that when a man like I Sesik is abroad, assassination is in the air. But the Japanese police are not at all clumsy in keeping touch with a would-be criminal. If Mr. I is really out on a knifing expedition, he will probably have his trouble for his pains.

FOREIGN POPULATION OF JAPAN.

According to a table compiled by the Fiji Shimpō, the foreign residents of Japan at present are as follow—we append the corresponding figures for 1891 for purposes of comparison:—

	1899.	1891.
Chinese	5,297	5,344
British	1,763	1,725
American	1,140	967
German	481	523
French	420	378
Russian	214	74
Korean	196	6
Portuguese	124	138
Swiss	69	58
Austrian and Hungarian	66	51
Dutch	61	93
Italian	46	39
Danish	37	56
Swedish and Norwegian	31	44
Spanish	24	15
Belgian	13	20
Hawaiian	13	14
Brazilian	11	—
Grecian	4	—
Turks	3	—
Mexican	2	4
Total	10,015	9,549

These figures indicate an almost stationary condition. The only noteworthy increases are in the cases of the Russians and Koreans. The four nationalities by whom the foreign trade is almost entirely carried on, namely, the British, the American, the German, and the French, aggregated 3,596 in 1891, and now number 3,804, an increase of 211. On the other hand, the value of the foreign trade swelled from 142½ million yen in 1891 to 442½ million in 1898. Thus, if we compare the foreign population with the trade, we find that whereas the average share of each foreign resident in 1891 was 14,923 yen, the corresponding amount in 1898 was 44,183 yen. It is certainly a remarkable fact that this rapidly increasing trade does not attract some commensurate increase in the number of those that carry it on, and it is a still more remarkable fact that, whereas the bulk of each foreign resident's business appears to have swelled more than three-fold, the profits accruing do not seem to have increased at all. Doubtless there are many explanations of the discrepancy, but probably the principal explanation is that the major part of the profits resulting from the trade go into the pockets of the Japanese. We have no statistics at hand to show the growth of the Japanese section of the treaty-port population during the past decade—in other words, the increase in the number of Japanese that make a living out of the foreign trade,—but we believe that the figures would be striking were they set down. Certainly in Yokohama's case, while the foreign settlement has not received any notable extension, the Japanese town has increased beyond all forecasts.

ELECTIONS FOR CITY AND PREFECTURAL ASSEMBLIES.

July is evidently to be a lively time. There is every prospect that the elections for City and Prefectural Assemblies will be hotly contested by the two great parties. Mr. Hoshi Toru has decided to stand for the Kojimachi district of Tokyo. He will be opposed by Mr. Tanaka Bukei, of the Progressists, and active canvassing has already commenced.

TOBINO-MONO.

It was one of the characteristics of the Tokugawa Government, according to the Fiji Shimpō, that while wielding very arbitrary sway over the provinces, it left to the citizens of Tokyo a large measure of administrative autonomy. Thus there came to exist in the city a class of men known as tobi-ninsoke, who discharged many of the functions of police, being specially useful in case of conflagrations or to guard houses against burglaries. They were stalwart, active fellows, indifferent to danger and ready to undertake the most perilous service. Another of their special employments was to set up the New Year's decorations, and to suspend the lamps used to illuminate the streets at times of festival. It appears that these men have outlived the circumstances which created them, and have now become a nuisance rather than an assistance. They are divided into bodies, each having its own district—its "rope-stretch" (nawa-bari) as the phrase is,—and every labourer working in that district must pay a certain per-centage of his earnings to the "Fly-fellows Guild," nor can any building be commenced without the Guild's permission, given in exchange for due recompense. In fact, these men are public parasites batten on the hard-earned gains of the working classes. The Fiji recommends that they should be formed into permanent fire-brigades, and thus brought under efficient surveillance.

THE BANK OF FORMOSA.

The number of shares of the Bank of Formosa offered for public subscription was 40,000, and the number applied for was 158,000, including 10,000 by the Imperial Estates Bureau. It follows, therefore, that each applicant will receive about 25 per cent. of the amount applied for by him. There is nothing at all surprising in these figures. With the experience of the Bank of Japan and the Specie Bank to guide them, capitalists naturally anticipate that before many years have passed the shares of the Bank of Formosa will be at an immense premium. Under such circumstances the fact that the applicants have been numerous does not furnish any index whatever of the state of the Japanese money market.

ITERATION.

We can not but admire the pertinacity of the Yomiuri Shimbun. Finding that its iterated and reiterated attacks upon the Minister of Foreign Affairs produce no effect owing to their extreme vagueness, it now quotes its Shanghai correspondent as alleging that Viscount Aoki has preferred two demands to the Chinese Government, and that both of them have been refused amid the jeers of foreigners. One of the demands is "something about the relations between the two empires"—that is our contemporary's delightfully nebulous way of stating the case—; the other is for mining privileges in Fuhkien. "What will Minister Aoki do next?" asks the Yomiuri. Smile at these silly canards we imagine.

FOREST FIRE IN HOKKAIDO.

The forest fire which broke out in Hokkaido on the 15th or 16th ultimo had not been subdued on the 22nd, when the latest advices were forwarded to Tokyo. The conflagration seems to have originated at Soya, which adjoins Saghalien. Thence it spread southward, finding highly combustible material in the grasses and trees parched by a long succession of sunny days. On the 19th it invaded the Otaru district, and the Headman took some unsuccessful steps to arrest its progress. On the 22nd, the woods at the source of the Katsu-no-gawa were reported to be in flames, and a force of 150 men was despatched to the scene. It is not yet known whether their efforts were efficacious.

ORIENT MARK LODGE OF JAPAN.

The annual installation meeting of the Orient Mark Lodge of Japan, No. 304, E.C. was held at the Masonic Temple, Yokohama, on Tuesday evening. There was a good attendance of the Brethren. Wor. Pro. Stanley E. Unite installed Wor. Bro. A. Bellamy Brown in the Master's chair with impressive ceremony, the musical portion of the service being in the capable hands of Bro. W. Karl Vincent. The Worshipful Master then invested his officers—some by deputy—as follows:—

Wor. Bro. Stanley E. Unite.....	I.P.M.
Bro. Rev. W. J. White	S.W.
Bro. Thos. W. McIlraith	J.W.
Wor. Bro. Geo. Hodges.....	Treas.
Bro. F. W. Thomas	M.O.
Bro. F. C. Heib	S.O.
Bro. C. T. Benney	J.O.
Bro. H. J. Owen.....	Sec. & Regs.
Bro. J. MacDonald.....	S.D.
Bro. L. Dawette	J.D.
Bro. E. Trösch	I.G.
Bro. J. Delborge	Tyler.

A cold collation was served at the closing of the Lodge, at which the usual loyal and Masonic toasts were duly honoured.

THE VICTORIA CROSSES.

The London Gazette announces that the Queen has been graciously pleased to signify her intention to confer the decoration of the Victoria Cross on Corporal James Smith, of the Buffs (East Kent Regiment), whose claims have been submitted for her Majesty's approval, for his conspicuous bravery during an engagement at Bilot, on the North-West Frontier of India, on the night of the 16th-17th September, 1897. The following is the act of courage for which he was recommended:—On the night of the 16th-17th September, 1897, Corporal Smith, with a party of the Buffs, responded to Lieutenant Watson's call for volunteers, and followed that officer into the burning village of Bilot, driving off the enemy with the bayonet. Afterwards, although wounded, he continued firing steadily and coolly, and also helped to carry the wounded to the place prepared for them. When Lieutenant Watson left, in order to fetch assistance for the wounded, Corporal Smith held the position till that officer's return, exposing his life freely in watching the enemy and directing the fire of his men.

Memorials have been received at Peking by the Board of War from various Brigadier Generals commanding troops in Northern Kansu, reporting considerable unrest amongst the Mohammedan Chinese in that vicinity. This is said to be due to the arrival of large numbers of Russian emissaries who have been lately stirring up discontent in the country. We have heard these stories before, but anyhow reinforcements are urgently needed in Kansu, and it is probable that General Tung Fu-chiang may be sent back to restore order.

DREYFUS.

THE telegrams received during the past few days seem to point to the innocence of DREYFUS. It looks now as if his so called "confession" to Captain LEBRUN-RENAUD would be verified—the "confession" in which he said:—

"Je suis innocent. Dans trois ans on reconnaitra mon innocence. Le ministre le sait, et le commandant Du Paty de Clam est venu me voir, il y a quelques jours, dans ma cellule, et m'a dit que le ministre le savait. Le ministre savait que si j'avais livré des documents à l'Allemagne ils étaient sans importance, et que c'était pour en obtenir de plus importants."

"I am innocent. In three years my innocence will be admitted. The Minister knows it, and Major Du Paty de Clam came to see me a few days ago in my cell and told me that the Minister knew it. The Minister knew that if I had given up documents to Germany they were without importance, and that it was to obtain more important ones."

The "three years," however, have been prolonged to five. It makes for DREYFUS' innocence that he has waited quietly. A guilty man would have found some means of doing away with himself. Major FORZINETTI who was governor of the Clerche-Midi prison where DREYFUS was incarcerated in 1891, deposed before the Court of Cassation that after the verdict he remained with DREYFUS until 3 o'clock in the morning trying to console him, and that he induced DREYFUS to swear not to take his life since the public verdict would then be that "the traitor had done justice on himself." FORZINETTI added that at parting DREYFUS shook hands with him, and told him that it was only the grave from which there was no coming back, and that he had the conviction that one day his innocence would be acknowledged. If that forecast prove correct, what amends can France make to the unfortunate man? It is one of those cases where redress is impossible. There is a suggestion that DREYFUS will have the satisfaction of recognising in himself a benefactor of his country, since his terrible experience will probably be the means of doing away with trials by courts-martial in times of peace, and of putting an end to the system of secret-service money which the Minister of War has at his disposal. That kind of abstract consolation does not count for very much, however. But, in truth, if DREYFUS is declared innocent, there will be, first of all, the illimitable pleasure of returning to his family, his country, and his service with re-established honour. It has been well said that physical pain is worth suffering for the sake of the enhanced value it imparts to health. We can conceive no joy greater than that of DREYFUS will be if he recovers his liberty and his fair fame. Nature, in short, will compensate him though his fellow-men can not. And the French, essentially a generous and emotional nation, will spare no means to make him forget his sorrows. We do not think that he will be a subject for pity if his innocence be established.

THE EDUCATIONAL QUESTION.

IT is always possible to create a prejudice against any official measure in Japan by representing that it has been undertaken at foreign suggestion. That line of action was adopted with remarkable success by the enemies of the New Code in 1891. They proclaimed that wholesale legislative changes were pressed upon the nation in deference to alien principles and without due regard for the immemorial manners and customs of the people. Similar tactics are now being adopted by the conservatives who desire to see the educational field closed to foreigners and to the inculcation of foreign ethical teaching. The Nippon, as might be conjectured, leads this opposition. It publishes an article in which the Foreign Office is represented as having bowed to the dicta of the British and American Ministers and of the Missionaries, and the Educational Department as having yielded to the remonstrances of the Foreign Office. Our readers recall, doubtless, the subject in question, but the memory of some probably requires to be refreshed. A short time ago, the Department of Education submitted to the High Educational Council a draft of proposed school regulations, which contained several illiberal clauses—clauses whose effect would be to banish religious teaching altogether from the instruction of Japanese youths, and to greatly hamper foreign educational enterprise in Japan. Public opinion, so far as it is reflected in newspaper columns, rebelled strongly against such narrow conservatism, and the leaders of officialdom were also understood to disapprove, so that the proposed restrictions did not seem likely to become law. The Nippon has now returned to the charge. It alleges that the Foreign Office, having been approached by the American and British Ministers and by the Missionaries, has shown its usual obsequiousness to foreign pressure, and has made such a strong protest to the Educational Department that the latter, with its wonted weakness, has yielded and agreed to pigeon-hole the projected regulations. The Nippon professes to feel very bad because foreign interference is permitted in such matters, and endeavours to make its readers feel bad too. The device will probably succeed, for many of the Nippon's readers will not be in a position to detect that this appeal to their patriotism is based on pure falsehood. The Representatives of America and Great Britain are too familiar with the legitimate limits of their diplomatic functions to interfere in matters of the kind, and the missionaries have too much tact to be betrayed into such blunders. In short, the Nippon has allowed itself to be egregiously misled. If, happily for the cause of sound education and for the sake of their country's reputation, Japanese statesmen are disposed to reject the views of the High Council, foreign interference can not in any way be credited with having inspired their wholesome mood.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE HOKKAIDO RECLUSES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

CHER MONSIEUR,—La haute bienveillance que vous témoignes au personnel de la Mission Catholique, comme aussi votre amour de la vérité, me donnent lieu de croire que vous serez bon accueil à ces quelques communications, destinées à redresser les erreurs qui circulent sur les Monastères Cisterciens du Hokkaidô.

Et d'abord, il faut que je vous rassure au sujet de l'âge des religieux, puisque c'est le thème principal de vos réflexions.

La plus jeune des huit sœurs (et non vingt) installées à Yunokawa le 30 Avril 1898 (et non depuis trois ou quatre années) est âgée de vingt-neuf ans. Les deux premières postulantes japonaises qui viennent de se présenter à la communauté, auront 28 et 23 ans respectivement, lorsque la Règle les autorisera à faire la demande de s'engager dans la vie monastique. Je pense que ces explications vous suffiront.

Pour ce qui est des austérités du cloître, je me bornerai à vous dire que la règle de St. Benoît, qui est un chef d'œuvre de sagesse et de discrétion, concilie admirablement la pratique héroïque des conseils évangéliques avec les lois de l'hygiène. Et vous en avez la preuve dans ce fait remarquable que, chez les trapistes, la moyenne de la vie dépasse 60 ans. Si le niveau de leur longévité est tant au-dessus de celui du commun des mortels, leur bonheur n'est pas en moindre proportion. O beata solitudo! O sola beatitudo! s'écriait l'illustre Cistercien, St. Bernard. Au monastère, on ne travaille qu'à faire des bienheureux, et dans la mesure exacte où l'on y propage la sainteté, on y propage le bonheur. Vous vous en convaincrez d'ailleurs en lisant tel ou tel chapitre de l'Imitation, qui est l'ouvrage le plus compétent sur la matière,—par exemple le Chapitre X. du III^e Livre, intitulé: quid spero mundo, dulcis est servire Deo. Il n'y a donc pas lieu de plaindre les heureux habitants des monastères. Du reste ils y sont librement, ils y persévèrent librement, et, au Japon comme partout, ils paraissent enchantés de leur sort.

Quant au "terrible greeting, memento mori, "the monks' vesper digging of their own graves, "and their couches on the straw of their own "coffins—all these things are" . . . une pure fable, mise à la mode par Chateaubriand, mais c'est une fable.

Avant de finir permettez-moi, Monsieur; de citer le témoignage d'un illustre penseur, Joseph de Maistre, qui écrit, à propos de la vie religieuse au point de vue social et politique, ces graves paroles justifiées par l'expérience des siècles: "Jamais il n'y eut d'idée plus heureuse que celle de réunir des citoyens "pacifiques qui travaillent, prient, étudient, "écrivent, font l'aumône, cultivent la terre, et "ne demandent rien à l'autorité."

En vous remerciant de votre bienveillance—que veuillez nous continuer—je me dis, cher Monsieur, avec une sincère estime,

Votre très humble et dévoué serviteur,

A. BERLIOZ, Evêque de Hakodate.

Evêque de Hakodate, Japon, le 24 Mai, 1899.

(TRANSLATION.)

SIR,—The great good-will you show towards the personnel of the Catholic Mission, as well as your regard for the truth, warrant me in believing that you will welcome this communication, which is intended to correct errors that have been circulated on the subject of the Cistercian monastic settlements of Hokkaido.

In the first place, I must reassure you on the subject of the age of the nuns, since that is the principal subject of your remarks.

The youngest of the eight (not twenty) sisters who have been settled at Yunokawa since the 30th April, 1898 (not, as has been stated, for three or four years past), is twenty-nine years old. The two first Japanese candidates who have just presented themselves to the community will be twenty-eight and twenty-three respectively by the time the rules authorise them to make their demand for admission to monastic life. I think that these explanations will be sufficient for you.

Concerning the austerities of the cloister, I will limit myself to saying that the rules of St. Benoît, which are a master-piece of wisdom and discretion, reconcile admirably the strict practice of the counsels of religion with the laws of hygiene. You will see the proof of this in the remarkable fact that, with the Trappists the average of life exceeds 60 years. If the level of their longevity is so much above that of ordinary mortals, their happiness is in no lower ratio. "O beata solitudo! O sola beatitudo!" wrote the illustrious Cistercian, St. Bernard. In the monastery they only work to make people happy, and, exactly in proportion as they propagate sanctity, they also propagate happiness. You may further convince yourself of this by reading a chapter here and there of "The Imitation," which is the most competent work on the subject—for example Chapter 10 of the Third Book, entitled "Quod spreto mundo, dulce est servire Deo." There is, therefore, no need to pity the happy inmates of the monasteries. They are, moreover, there of their own free will, they remain of their own free will, and in Japan, as everywhere, they appear to be enchanted with their lot.

As to the "terrible greeting, memento mori, the monks' vesper digging of their own graves, and their couches on the straw of their own coffins"—all these things are a pure fable, made fashionable by Chateaubriand, but still a fable.

Before concluding allow me, sir, to quote the testimony of an illustrious thinker, Joseph de Maistre, who writes, à propos of the monastic life from a social and political point of view, these grave words, which have been justified by the experience of centuries: "Never was there a happier idea than that of bringing together (in such communities) peaceful-minded citizens who work, pray, study, write, give alms, cultivate the earth, and ask nothing of authority."

Thanking you for your courtesy, &c.

A. BERLIOZ, Bishop of Hakodate.

DIE MEDICINISCHE MONATS SCHRIFT IN TAIWAN.

ON THE PRESENT SANITARY CONDITION OF JONAI, THE CITY WITHIN THE WALLS OF TAI HOKU,* ESPECIALLY AS REGARDS A SYSTEM OF OPEN SEWERS.

The sanitary conditions of Jonai, as I first knew it about three years ago, presented several peculiar features. The city in its form is that of an area approximately square enclosed by high walls, the length of any one side being about three quarters of a mile. This area is nearly dead level, and the soil is of a most tenacious clay. The rainfall is very great, amounting to terrific floods during the typhoon season, and there are many portions depressed even below the general plane. These are in great part due to the fact that the Chinese built their houses for the most part, or at any rate to a very great extent, out of the clay or "mud" within the enclosed space of the City. I regret to say that the Japanese have done the same to some extent and are still doing it. The general result is that the ground is water-logged, the underground water reaching within a few inches of the surface, and there being much stagnant water. The problem of drainage is thus made one of the greatest difficulty. On the other hand the city had streets for the most part broad, even when taken over from the Chinese, and there is now what I cannot help considering an excellent supply of water, for by boring to a depth of a little less than 200 feet, water immediately flows from the bore at the ground surface, or even some feet higher.

I know that some doubts have been thrown on the quality of this water, and it is true that some of it has a more or less "sulphury" smell. But sulphur in small quantities is harmless, and I cannot help believing that the water must be remarkably free from pathological bacteria in the state in which it rises in the bore, and I cannot help thinking that, if samples of the water have proved unsatisfactory on bacteriological examination, bacteria have not come from the stratum 180 feet underground; but from either tanks on the ground level or the decomposing bamboo that generally lines the upper part of the bore. I have seen tanks in a condition of uncleanness that guaranteed a large percentage of bacteria. The water is soft, containing but a small quantity of mineral matter, and that of a harmless nature. I speak of the water supply as, in my opinion good, but this does not refer to the method of collecting or of distribution. This needs to be systematised, and a plan has already been made whereby there may be water at high pressures in iron pipes in every street. In any case the superfluity of artesian well water was one of the reasons for adopting the present sewerage system which may be said to be to a certain extent unique. Three years ago there was a great deal of the squalor and filth that seems to be the accompaniment of a Chinese population in whatever part of the world it may be. This has been very greatly cleared away, though there is yet a good deal to be done. In general appearance the city has vastly improved. Three years ago it would have been described by any countryman of mine as a "filthy" city, now it would be described on a general inspection as distinctly clean, for it is only on penetrating into obscure alleys and back ways that it is seen that there is still much to be done in the matter of house-drainage and garbage removal. This improvement is entirely apart from the many handsome buildings that the Japanese have erected, and the fine new roads that they have constructed—which latter should make Tokyo think shame of herself—if she is capable of so doing. The problem of the drainage and sewerage system was the first that was taken hold of by Mr. Y. Hamano, C.E., and myself, about 3 years ago in connection with Tai-Hoku. At first it appeared that an underground reticulation of pipe and brick sewers approaching in principle the "Separate System" would be the best to adopt, and indeed such a system was designed. In the case of the "Separate System" in its integrity, as recommended by Waring, nothing but sewage is admitted to the sewers proper. Underground water is dealt with by separate drains, and the rainfall is, so far as possible, carried off on the surface of the streets, various means being resorted to where a heavy rain would be likely to lead to flooding.

Our first design was for a set of underground sewers which would receive all sewage, and also act as drains for underground water, the surface water to be dealt with by the existing street side drains or gutters, which were to be cleaned out, improved, and where necessary added to, and I have no doubt that would be a better system than the one actually adopted, but, on going into this matter, the difficulties assumed a most formidable aspect. Perhaps it would be more correct to say that the first cost assumed formidable dimensions. In fact it ran up to a sum which simply could not have been afforded.

With underground sewers of the kind just described the fall must be such as to render the sewer self-cleansing—that is to say if the system is to be efficient. Now, as I have already stated, Jonai is nearly dead level. From Jonai to the Tamsui River there is, however, a fall of about 22 feet and the distance is not great so that the system would have been possible—indeed not presenting any really considerable engineering difficulties—, but the fall within the City would all, or very nearly all, have had to be got by making a sewer deeper and deeper as it approached the outlet, and, as the minimum or top-point level could scarcely have been less than 3 feet below the street surface, the excavations for trenches towards the lower ends of the sewers would have been very great, and difficult, with the soil to be dealt with. Then the numerous and deep man-holes that would have had to be built would have been a very heavy item of expense, and the question of house connections would have presented great difficulties.

These things being as I have described, an efficient sewerage and drainage system seemed to be almost an impossibility for many years to come, I being both by education and prejudice entirely opposed to the idea of open sewers. It was at this juncture that Mr. Hamano and I visited Singapore, where we inspected the sewerage system there, a great part of which (far the greater part, in fact) is open, or at any rate then was.

The system struck us very favourably. The sewers were clean and gave off no offensive smell. It was then that it suggested itself to me that this system was the system for Taihoku. The constant overflow of artesian wells was such as to make it almost perfect for such a city. The present Jonai system is based on that of Singapore and the reasons why I call it to some extent unique is that I believe the Singapore system may be said to have grown up, whilst that of Taihoku was designed as a whole, from the beginning. Indeed, what is being described is only a part of a system designed for Jonai, Daidotei, and Banks, that is to say Taihoku both within, and without the walls. That within the walls is finished, that without is not yet begun, though it is all included in the one scheme.

Further, the presence of the continual flow from artesian wells introduces a novel feature. Of course open sewers are not suitable for large and busy cities such as Tokyo, London, Paris, Berlin, New York, &c., but they have some very distinct advantages for such a city as Tai-Hoku, where the streets are wide, the traffic is comparatively small, and best of all, where there is the continual flushing from the over flowing artesian wells. The great points are these:—The condition of the sewer can be seen at all times, and it (the sewer) can be very readily cleaned out should it not be in a satisfactory state. The ventilation is of course perfect. The first two items are on the assumption that the cross section of the sewer is scientifically designed, and that material and workmanship are good. The most scientific section would hypothetically be that of the small end of an egg, generally called the "oval section," but for all practical purposes a semi-circular invert with vertical sides is good enough, and it is probably preferable on account not only of the ease, but of the comparative accuracy with which a sewer of such section can be constructed, but a few words of qualification are necessary:—

A "self-cleansing velocity" could by no means be obtained for the whole of Tai-Hoku for open sewers except by making some of them extravagantly—nearly impossibly—deep. There is, however, a very slight slope of the ground, and there is nothing impracticable in making the larger sewers 4 ft. to 5 ft. deep. Thus by keeping the upper ends of the sewers as high as practicable, and gradually deepening, an additional fall of about 1 in 1250 ($\frac{1}{1250}$) can be obtained—at places more, at places less—and a very fair velocity can be obtained, indeed in most places one that will prevent deposit, though it may not remove it.

It was on account of these considerations that the writer, with a good deal of diffidence, suggested to the recent Governor-General of Formosa, H.E. Baron Nogi, a complete set of open sewers for Tai-hoku. His Excellency gave instructions that a mile or so of experimental sewers be made. In consideration of the success of these the writer was directed to design a complete system for Tai hoku. This was done, and the portion for Jonai has, as already indicated, been finished. The work must, I think, be considered, if not perfect, at least a success. With but little care the sewers are kept clear. In virtue of the over flow of artesian well-water, many of them flow like mountain streams, and there is no perceptible smell from any of them. The work was carried out under the able supervision of Mr. V. Hamano, C.E. Whilst mentioning those who have been connected with the carrying out of this sewerage system it would be very unfair to omit the name of Mr. K. Nabeshima, the foreman of works, to whose great intelligence and unflagging energy the success of the design is in great measure due.

* Tai-Hoku, formerly called Taipei, is the capital of Formosa.

Various difficulties were met with in carrying out the plan, and some mistakes were made at the beginning; but as these were entirely of an engineering nature, and as I am not writing for an engineering magazine, they are not described here. For the same reason details as to materials and methods of construction are not entered into. The main system is finished, but there still remains to make it thoroughly efficient by improved house drainage, and by taking advantage of it for the removal of surface-water and for the lowering of the level of the ground water. The inverts of the sewers have been kept low enough to allow of house drains, at their upper ends, simply semi-circles or "half pipes," to discharge into the sewers.

Most of the surface-water can be drained away by the sewers; but there will still be places needing filling-in, and the great difficulty is to get material to fill in with. The material excavated for the construction of the sewers will go some way, but it will not be enough. The ground water can be lowered an average of several feet by the use of numerous "agricultural drains" discharging into the open sewers.

It is impossible to end a general survey of the sanitary condition of Taihoku without referring to two things:—the desirability of upper stories for sleeping rooms in every case possible, and the desirability of planting the City (and not only the City) with the blue gum tree, or Eucalyptus globulus. That Tai Hoku is a malarious town goes without saying. Flat drainage and other improvements will greatly reduce the extent of malaria I have no doubt; but I have not the least doubt that malaria will cling to the city for many years to come, if not for all time. Now if there is one particular point on which authorities on the subject of malaria appear to agree it is that the malarial miasma reaches to a varying height from the ground, and that this miasma is particularly dangerous during the night. Some consider that it works its fatal work during sleep more than at other times. It has struck me (the observation is probably not original) that this, if an actual fact, may be due to the unconscious "mouth-breathing" common in sleep. I remember that the great Goethe, who has touched on nearly every subject pertaining to humanity, mentions that, being about to travel during the night across the Pontine marshes near Rome in a carriage, and sleep being probable, he and his companions tied handkerchiefs over their mouths, to exclude the miasma of fever, which rose to a considerable height from the ground. In those days plasmadium had not been heard of, and I think the words "bacterium" and "bacteria" had not even been invented. All this clearly points to sleeping at a considerable height from the ground, 10 to 12 feet being the minimum heights commonly recommended. Yet by far the greater number of houses in Tai-Hoku are but one story high, and these include the official residences and even the Tai-Hoku hospital!

I write in Tai-chu, where there are being built at the present time official residences only one story high! It seems the greatest pity. There seems to be a curious misunderstanding as to cost. On asking why these buildings were not two stories high, with sleeping-accommodation on the upper floor, I was answered that "it would cost too much." This is a complete mistake. Of course a two storied building costs more than a one storied building if the unit be one square yard, meter, or one tsubo of area of ground, or any other unit of superficies; but if cubical contents, the true standard, be taken, a two storied house is cheaper than a one storied—much cheaper if the land be expensive, either in first cost or in capitalised rent. Thus, taking the hypothetical case of a building of 24 rooms all of the same size, that of two stories high will be found cheaper than that of one story. It is for the sake of cheapness that Americans build "sky-scrapers."

As regards the Blue-gum tree very little need be said. In the matter of malaria, the scourge of nearly the whole of Formosa, its prophylactic properties have been amply proved in Australia and in other countries, and there can be no doubt of the advantage that would accrue were it planted generally in Formosa.

Several attempts have, indeed, already been made at cultivation, but these have been on a small scale and they have not been very successful. The difficulties would appear to be that there are some two hundred to three hundred varieties of the Eucalyptus, that the Globulus is the only useful one so far as prevention of malaria is concerned, and that till quite recently there has been some doubt as to which of many kinds imported was this actual Globulus. Again, it seems that a certain depth of properly drained soil is necessary, and that the tree needs the most tender care to protect it from the effect of wind for about three of its first years, after which, however, it becomes very robust.

So far as Tai Hoku is concerned, all that can be said is that the drainage system already described will probably give the necessary depth of dry soil, whilst it is quite worth the trouble to give the care necessary to protect the young trees from wind for the three years or so necessary.

It is on the authority of a German botanist that I state that the common sunflower has been found quite as prophylactic in the case of malaria as the blue gum tree. Surely it might be tried—for example in the grounds of the Tai Hoku hospital, at present one of the most malarious spots in the City.

It must be distinctly understood that what I say about great improvements in sanitary matters in Tai Hoku applies to Jonai—the intra-mural city—only. Banka, where far the greater proportion of Chinese now live, has, indeed, been a good deal improved; but Twatnia within which is the foreign settlement, remains as insanitary as ever; some say it is in a worse condition than when the Japanese first took it over.

W. K. BURTON.

THE SENDAI FESTIVAL.

With perfect weather for the whole three days, the Sendai Festival, which began at 4 a.m. on the 23rd ult. and lasted till the night of the 26th, passed off without a hitch of any kind. Never within the memory of the oldest citizens had the town attracted so many visitors. All the chief thoroughfares were thronged from early morning to midnight. The police force was largely augmented, but the crowd was very orderly and there was little drunkenness of an offensive type. Pedestrians arrived from all quarters in their working clothes with their best toggety tied up in a bundle, and, dusty and footsore, made a somewhat sorry spectacle and presented a striking contrast to the gaily decked streets. A town with narrow streets, most of them running straight and constantly intersecting each other, lends itself to decorations of the Japanese type in a way that a city with broader thoroughfares would not do. Many of the streets were provided with wires running over the centre of the roads, attached to poles some 700 or 800 yards apart. On these were hung pretty lanterns each with a little umbrella opened above it. These lanterns, added to those hung in front of each house, sufficed to light up the town at night in parts where the electric dimness which the Sendai people are accustomed to call light is not furnished by the municipal authorities. In the outskirts of the town the decorations were of a purely native type, but in several of the chief streets the ubiquitous American cigarette agents utilised the occasion for advertising their wares. Some of the prettiest arches erected at public expense in honour of the ceremony had the word "Pinhead" or "Hawk" inscribed beneath "The Three Hundredth Anniversary of the Founding of Sendai." The tobacconists had dashi of their own, on one of which was a foreign boat with two spruce looking westerners in the act of bringing a cargo of cigarettes on shore, and near them were hideous monkey-like human figures made of paper floating in the air and waving advertisements to passers-by. All this seemed to certain citizens to be sadly out of harmony with the spirit and life of the man whom the whole province had agreed to honour.

* Since I wrote the above steps have been taken to improve matters, principally on account of the action of Dr. S. Goto, the Civil Governor, who has just returned from Tokyo.

At one of the Southern entrances to the town at the top of the road known as Tsuchi-Isai stood a high platform bearing a life-sized paper horse with Date Masamune clad in full armour on his back, surrounded by numerous pretty coloured lanterns. This object seemed to give more pleasure to the country folks than the pretentious and gaudy cars erected at more central spots.

The funds for the festival were subscribed by all the inhabitants of Miyagi-Ken, with the single exception of one ill-fated little town (Shiroishi) that was almost wholly reduced to ashes a few days before preparations for the festivities commenced. The subscriptions, it is stated, were nearly all voluntary, and they amounted to about two thousand yen. It is worthy of mention that not a few residents of Sendai, in the earlier stages of the preparations for the event, objected to the form that the celebration eventually took. They said that Sendai needs better roads, that it needs a good public library and a great many other things, and asked whether it would not be carrying out the ideas of the founder of the city in the way that, were he living, he would approve of, if the commemoration took some permanent form. But the majority were of opinion that the object of the festival was to attract a great many visitors to Sendai and to impress them with the importance of the place, and that this could be done only by making a big display. The people who came streaming into the city from all parts were mostly ignorant peasants, who would have been disappointed had not the festival taken the shape to which they and their forefathers were accustomed.

In connection with the career of Date Masamune, it is important to remember that one of the great desires of his life, which he did not live to see realised, was the connection of Sendai with the sea by means of a canal. He actually began to dig the canal, but his successors were men of less force of character, and to this day Sendai has been content to be within six or seven miles of the ocean without connecting herself with it, though the provision of a waterway would be one of the easiest pieces of engineering possible to imagine; the country that lies between the town and the ocean being a perfectly flat and well watered plain. Date Masamune founded Sendai, and thus created a lasting memorial for himself, but that spirit of discontent with past attainments, that pressing forward to something beyond, that energy and push which made him second only to the First Tokugawa Shogun, he seems to have carried with him to the grave. While the Sendai folks sing his praises, few of them are conscious that the backwardness of the city to-day compared with places of more modern growth and with fewer privileges, is a proof that the prophet is not without honour except in his own country.

The Sendai Elijah ascended to heaven without bequeathing his garment to any one. We search the annals of the city in vain for a record of deeds worthy of comparison with those of the great baron whose one eye saw infinitely more than it is given to most people to see with two.

BASEBALL.

Y.C. & A.C. VERSUS MIYAKO CLUB.

The opening baseball match of the season was somewhat of a disappointment to players and onlookers alike, as a glance at the scores will show. The home team were not by any means in good trim, and the visitors were far from showing the style that some Japanese vines have displayed in play against a Yokohama team. Batting, of course, was the weak point in the Miyako Club's representatives, and their fielding was rather faulty, while once or twice they were "rattled" in a most deplorable fashion. The game attracted a very good crowd—both outside and inside the fence—and every good bit of play was loudly applauded. Yokohama opened the score with 4 runs in their first innings, but dismissed their opponents for nothing. Eleven runs were made in the second innings, 6 by Yokohama, and 5 by the Miyako. The third essay brought 7, all for the home side, and after that the Japanese gave up hope of catching the foreign players, though they stuck to the match gamely to the end. Yokohama piled up most in the seventh innings, owing to the visitors being "rattled" when all three bases were occupied, and the applause that rang out as man after man got home was loud and long. Messrs. Stone and Gibbs were umpires, and Mr. E. Mendelson scorer. Score:—

THE INTERPORT REGATTA.

Kobe was lucky in the Interport Regatta on Saturday, no less than three of the events being won by the southern representatives. The Hioo Evening News says that unfortunately there was a strong north wind against the boats all the afternoon, and the sea was lumpy. The Interport events were as follows:—

INTERPORT FOURS.—1 Mile.

Kobe.
1.—"HART."		lb.
Bow A. McGlew		148
2 E. Oldenburg		155
3 C. Mancini		150
Stroke P. Sorhagen		152
Cox J. R. Gibson		130
2.—"FRAWIT."
Bow H. E. Hayward		143
2 G. C. Alcock		154
3 J. J. M. Carst		160
Stroke W. Goddard		128
Cox W. M. Carst		129

Time, 8 m. 54½ secs.

Yokohama quickly got a lead of half a length, but did not maintain it long. The Yokohama boat was stroked at about 40 to the minute, while Kobe was pulling splendidly at 30 to the minute. The race, which had been regarded before the start as a certainty for Yokohama, was soon seen to be a certainty for Kobe, for before the half mile was reached Hayward broke his stretcher.

INTERPORT PAIRS.—1 Mile.

Kobe.
1.—"PRIMROSE."		lb.
Bow C. Mancini		150
Str. P. Sorhagen		152
Cox J. R. Gibson		130
YOKOHAMA.
2.—"SNOWDROP."		lb.
Bow G. C. Alcock		154
Str. J. J. M. Carst		160
Cox W. M. Carst		129

Time, 10 m. 12½ secs.

A capital start was effected, but Yokohama, at a very quick stroke, soon obtained a slight lead, which, however, they did not long maintain. At the half mile it was judged that Yokohama was fully two lengths behind. They then steered inside the Kobe boat, and put on a fine spurt. Sorhagen likewise spurred, and increased his lead, coming in four or five lengths ahead. The Kobe men had only been out once together before the race.

INTERPORT DOUBLE SCULLS.—1 Mile.

Kobe.
1.—"PEARL."		lb.
Bow W. Pitzcker		155
Str. A. McGlew		148
YOKOHAMA.
2.—"TURN."		lb.
Bow H. A. Poole		162
Str. Levedag		184

Time, 10 m. 11½ secs.

Kobe won this race easily. Yokohama steered a rather erratic course, and lost time in clearing a junk and a boat. Even before this Levedag had "caught a crab," and stopped a moment, but went on again with every prospect of a close race. The Kobe boat, however, stood out, and left the Yokohama boat hopelessly behind. The boats had a rather strong wind against them, and rowing was distinctly unpleasant.

INTERPORT SINGLE SCULLS.—½ Mile.

YOKOHAMA.—1.
H. Irwine	145 lbs.	152½ lbs.

Time, 3 m. 37 secs.

Owing to the roughness of the water the distance in this race was reduced to half a mile. This was the only race in which Yokohama expected defeat; but victory was theirs instead. Sorhagen, who had rowed in the Fours and in the Pairs, was evidently tired, whilst Irwine was quite fresh and rowed exceedingly well, steering a perfectly straight course. He came in four or five lengths ahead, and was carried up the beach on the shoulders of Yokohama men and heartily cheered by the spectators.

CHINESE AFFAIRS.

According to a Peking dispatch, says the N. C. Daily News, the Empress Dowager has again telegraphed her command to ex-Governor Liu Ping-heng, late of Shantung, to go up to Peking and he, as determinedly, has also again telegraphed his inability to comply with the command, the excuse being, of course, the stereotyped one of chronic illness. Another telegram was also recently sent to Governor Têng of Anhui, commanding him to inform the retired ex-Vice-President of the Board of Civil Appointments, Wu Ting-fên, that his presence is required in Peking once more. This official, who is a member of the Progressive Party, was fortunately on sick leave at his home in Anhui province at the time of the Empress Dowager's coup d'état in September of last year and so escaped its consequences.

Immediately upon the Empress Dowager's assumption of power he got Governor Têng (also a Progressive official) to memorialise his (Wu Ting-fên's) serious illness with a prayer to be allowed to retire into private life. This was most convenient to the Empress Dowager, who wanted then the best and most lucrative posts to reward her adherents, and so Wu Ting-fên got permission to retire, although only a man of about fifty-five years of age. Now, however, the affairs of the Empress Dowager being more settled, she has had time to look about her and call back to office men who, although tainted (sic) with progressive ideas, have not proved themselves her determined opponents. This has led her to send forex-Vice-President Wu and several other retired officials, and, as most probably Wu has also obtained promises from Peking to let bygones be bygones, there is every likelihood of his going up to return to official life by the end of the present month. Apparently the Empress Dowager recognises the sad fact that, as far as knowledge and experience in foreign affairs is concerned, she has been surrounded by ignoramuses ever since her assumption of sole power, and this invitation to Wu Ting-fên, who was also a member of the Taungli Yamên, is probably a step towards calling around her men of more advanced proclivities in the near future.

Professor Giles recently published, through Mr. Bernard Quaritch, a work entitled "Chinese Poetry in English Verse," and has revealed to English readers a rich store, the existence of which had long been known only to scholars. Some of the lyrics are worth quoting. Here is a specimen from Mei Sheng, written in the second century B.C.:

Green grows the grass upon the bank;
The willow-shoots are long and lank;
A lady in a glistening gown
Opens the casement and looks down.
The roses on her cheek blush bright,
Her rounded arm is dazzling white;
A singing-girl in early life,
And now a careless rouse's wife,....
Ah, if he does not mind his own,
He'll find some day the bird has flown!

In a different vein is the following rendering of an anonymous author in the first century, B.C.:

Man reaches scarce a hundred, yet his tears
Would fill a lifetime of a thousand years.
When days are short and night's long hours move slow,
Why not with lamp in search of pleasure go?
This day alone gives sure enjoyment—this!
Why then await to-morrow's doubtful bliss?
Fools grudge to spend their wealth while life abides,
And then posterity their thrift derides.
We cannot hope, like Wang Tzu-ch'iao, to rise
And find a paradise beyond the skies.

This is by Tu Mu in the first half of the 9th century:—

Too late, alas!.....I came to find the lovely spring had fled.
Yet must I not regret the days of youth that now are dead;
For though the rosy buds of spring the cruel winds have laid,
Behold the clustering fruit that hangs beneath the leafy shade!

Chinese poets, as their fellows elsewhere, have many truths, not always the most pleasant, to tell. Li She, in the 9th century, did not find friends in high places above the common run of humanity, and we find him apostrophising them in the following bitter lines:—

The rainy mist sweeps gently o'er the village by the stream,
When from the leafy forest glades the brigand daggers gleam.....
And yet there is no need to fear or step from out their way,
For more than half the world consists of bigger rogues than they!

Hsi Chih-hsiang, the Literary Chancellor of Anhui, who jumped into notoriety when he bitterly denounced Prince Kung and the Viceroy Li Hung chang in the latter part of the eighties, on the charge of favoritism, avarice, and love of display, is dead. It will be remembered that he repeated the performance in 1893, when he wrote tirades against Li Han-chang, then Viceroy of the Two Kuangs, on similar charges to those preferred against the elder brother; and also against Chang Chih-tung, Viceroy of the Hokuang, whom he charged with partiality towards certain officers near him and extravagance in inaugurating huge enterprises which he had no funds to continue and make permanent. These indictments had only the effect of cashiering and dismissing from office half-a-dozen or more of the smaller fry; they did no harm to the principals. The only thing Hsi Chih-hsing succeeded in doing was to make enemies of the powerful satraps and to shut the doors of Peking against himself, where his irascible temper and envy of others were also feared. This, says a Shanghai contemporary, prevented him from remaining there after entering the Hanlin Academy and obtaining the highest preferment for which his literary ability and great erudition in ancient Chinese classic works certainly fitted him.

H.M.S. Woodlark successfully completed her steam trials on the 16th May and was commissioned on Saturday, the 20th, exactly 28 days from the time the sections were landed at Tangkadoo Dock, Shanghai. Her sister ship, the Woodcock, is on the Yangtze above Ichang.

The Portuguese journal Lusitans suggests that Portugal should acquire the district of Houngshan, near Macao, which it thinks would not be very difficult. It would suffice to make the colony yield a rich return to the coffers of the metropolis. Possibly, continues the journal, if the Portuguese Government would negotiate an agreement with the English Government to support us in this pretension the exchange of some territory, useless to us, in our African empire, would secure for us the expansion of our dominion in China.

The Peiho River Conservancy, remarks the N.-C. Daily News, are making great strides in the task they have undertaken. Some big engineering work is being executed at Taku, and the creek adjacent to the village, which is connected by numerous waterways to Little Hainsaike, is to be put under control. At first it was intended to block it up entirely—a scheme that was bitterly opposed by the local gentry. However, the cofferdam was barely finished when the pent-up waters swept it away. Now, the authorities are digging a canal, in which a lock is being built, from above the first bend of the creek to a point higher up the river. There is no doubt that this creek has been largely accountable for the scant water in the river, as below it there are 3½ fathoms, whilst immediately above but 12 feet are to be found. Another creek which runs into the river on the opposite side and close to Michol's farm is being locked. This waterway has a length of 85 miles and was originally cut for the conveyance of coal from the mines near Lutai. When these two undertakings are completed Tientsin may reasonably expect the return of the shipping trade it has been denied these last few years.

The midshipmen of H.M.S. Bonaventure challenged the Shanghai Rowing Club to a mile race in heavy fours, the other day, but were beaten by a couple of lengths.

The North China Daily News was misinformed about the action of the Syndicate that was supposed to have proposed taking over the electric lighting of the two Settlements. Whatever may be the intentions of the Syndicate their scheme is that present entirely in embryo, and no proposals whatever have been submitted to either the English or the French Council.

Our senior Shanghai contemporary learns from a Peking correspondent that Dr. Yang Wing, LL.D., Yale University, U.S.A., was decoyed from Shanghai to Peking recently by direction of Prince Ching. When Dr. Yang Wing reached there he was bound and imprisoned for several days in a temple. Ostensi-sibly this was done because he was believed to have had some relations in, or connection with, the late unfortunate Reform movement, but really to extort money from him or from friends who might have been ready to pay heavily to deliver him from imprisonment, torture, or death. A foreign subject dressed in Chinese costume went to the temple and by threats, accompanied by pistol brandishing, etc., secured Dr. Yang Wing's release. Still spies dogged his steps and he was in great danger until another friendly foreigner discovered a way to send him to Tientsin. It is hoped that he safely reached Japan.

The following Customs Notice to Mariners, referring to a bank to southward of south point of Sharp Peak Island, has been issued from the Shanghai Coast Inspector's Office:—"Notice is hereby given that a bank of small extent, with 8 feet of water on it at low water of spring tides, exists about 2½ cables S. ½ W. from the south point of Sharp Peak Island. To avoid this bank vessels entering the Min River should, after crossing the Inner Bar, bring the south end of West Brother just open of the south end of East Brother, and keep them so until Woga Point and High Sharp Peak are in line. These latter two marks kept in line on a N.W. course will lead into the deep water to the southward of Woga Hall."

The Foochow Echo learns that the sunken rock in Samsah Bay, upon which the German Flagship Kaiser struck in November last, will shortly be marked by a red and black chequered 6-foot sun-buoy without cage.

The Assistant Grand Secretary and President of War, Kang Yi, has been appointed Imperial High Commissioner charged with the special mission of investigating certain matters in Kiangsu. Says a Shanghai contemporary:—"It will be remembered that Kang Yi is the most bigoted of conservatives and has shown himself to be the most bloodthirsty of the Empress Dowager's supporters. It was on this man's advice that the six young Reformers were made martyrs for the cause of Progress without trial or any form of investigation, although the Grand Council had convened at the Great Judgment-hall of the Board of Punishments for this purpose. Had Kang Yi had his own way the streets of Peking would have overflowed with the blood of the rising generation of China's best families, immediately after the fatal coup d'état of September last. That any moderation was shown during the period following that reign of terror was due solely to the firm stand made by Kang Yi's superior officer, Jung Lu, Grand Secretary and Generalissimo of the Armies of the North, who counselled the Empress Dowager to show mercy in order to allay the frantic terror of the people at a time when each man in Peking was suspicious of his neighbour. Jung Lu's moderation was not owing to the fact that he hated Reform less, but because he is prudent by nature and he saw that excesses would urge the excited people into rebellion."

In a later issue the N.-C. Daily News said:—"We learn from a reliable source that the main reason for the visit of investigation of Kang Yi to this province is because of a severe denunciatory memorial against Viceroy Liu K'un-yi and eight of his Taotais by Yu Haien, the present Governor of Shanlung. It is also stated that there were twenty-three charges of misconduct made against either Viceroy Liu or his eight Taotais. At the same time, however, we are told that even if all the 23 charges in question be proved against Viceroy Liu he is too powerful and necessary to the dynasty to be removed at the present moment, and the only sufferers will be the unlucky Taotais in question, one of whom, we believe, is the lately removed Shanghai Taotai, Tsai."

Shanghai is rejoicing in the appearance on its musical platforms of a young Russian violinist of exceptional powers, Prof. Domcheff. So gifted is he that even the sober-minded North China Daily News breaks away from its traditional passionless calm and indulges in poetical imagery to describe the Professor's playing. It says:—"Before half a dozen bars of the opening number had been played, the amateurs and professionals of Shanghai knew the style of the man who had come amongst them. Every bar that followed did but heighten and confirm the initial promise, and to an enthusiastic recall at the completion of the Concerto, the Professor replied with a sparkling little Scherzo. In his hands the powers of the violin are legion. At his command it storms and shrieks, it ralls, it groans. Then suddenly its mood changes and peals of rippling laughter are followed by sweet little melodies, sometimes with quaint little accompaniments, sometimes unadorned by naught but their own simplicity. There is a solo—at times it might have come from flute or fife, so sweet and mellow are its notes; then follows a duet, which in turn bursts in a chorus, as though an orchestra had taken up its abode inside the instrument. Every note in the gamut of human passion answers the magician's call. To him it is the easiest of all things to "rejoice with them that rejoice and weep with them that weep." Very pretty, indeed.

M. Rocher, the Commissioner of Customs at Shanghai, is taking active steps to prevent the further spread of disease among the silk worms of Kiang-si and Chékang. In a letter to the Viceroy of the former province, he says:—

In France forty years ago the Pasteur system checked disease in a few years and saved that nation's silk industry from utter ruin. In China it will do the same. What it is now proposed to do is firstly, to study the extent of the disease, and secondly to teach Chinese breeders how to select healthy eggs. The Chékang and Kiangsu Provinces are equally affected and equally interested in arresting the disease; therefore, in devising remedial measures, joint assistance and joint action are necessary. My proposal is as follows: that a nursery be established in the most convenient part of Kiangsu, and one in Chékang, each station to be under the direct charge of one foreign assistant and both stations to be under a foreign director, whose duty it shall be to direct studies. Expensive buildings need not be erected. Temples in suitable localities would—with slight alterations—answer the purpose. It is estimated that in three years' time the number of pupils trained, and native breeders educated, would suffice to enable native growers to go on by themselves. What is now required is that each Province should guarantee for three years the sum of Tls. 6,000, and if this support is promised the Commissioner will then move the Inspector-General to assist also, and appoint the necessary men. It is a case of "help yourself and God will help you." Before the Inspector-General and the Viceroy will again consent to act and assist, the Provinces must first of all show their willingness and readiness to deal with the matter in an earnest spirit. The reports that the Commissioner has received this year from the various merchants engaged in the trade are very bad, and it is because he loses his train for the Silk Industry of these two Provinces that he now makes this earnest appeal.

The following telegraphic advices from Peking were received in Shanghai on May 27:—"Special edicts, under the seal of the Empress Dowager, have been issued to the Viceroy and Governors of the Liangkang and Min Che provinces to put all the military forces under their jurisdiction on a war footing by the end of May, owing to the menacing and threatening attitude of Germany and Italy in Chinese waters. The Chinese forces are, however, ordered to be on the defensive, until the aggressors shall have struck the first blow, when permission is given to the high military officials to take what active steps they may, under the circumstances, see fit. Perfect freedom is given to the Viceroy and Governors of the province named to dispose of their forces as they deem best when hostilities begin." Commenting on the above, the N.-C. Daily News says:—"In spite of repeated requests of the Tsungli Yamen to the German Legation to withdraw the German troops now quartered at Jüchiao, Shanlung, the latter persistently refuse to do so, giving as a reason that they must remain there until the Tientsin-Chinkiang Railway line shall have been built, in order to be at hand should opposition be shown by the malcontents of the province to prevent the construction of the road. Another excuse, it is reported, is that the Germans will remain at Jihchao until the spheres of influence of the various Powers in China shall have been settled upon.

At the newly opened port of Wuchow a very strong feeling against foreigners, more especially against Christians, is being propagated by the literati. A placard was posted on the walls of that city on the 10th inst., in which, after a long tirade against foreigners and Christians, who are described as "the Devils," it is laid down that these evil persons must be killed without mercy, and the writer then goes on to advocate wholesale massacre of all foreigners. It ends in this wise:—"The hearts of Chinese are as hard as iron and stone. Foreign devils already know it. We have already arranged a good plan to massacre you all and will not let you escape. Now we carefully tell you because we would prefer not to murder you all, but if you fail to take this warning there will be no opportunity for repentance when the massacre begins. A timely warning. The mandarins and all classes of the people of Wuchow have issued this notice."

The China Gazette is "informed by an excellent authority that a provisional agreement has been arrived at between the British and German Governments respecting Wei-hai-wei, under which (if it is carried out) the new British Naval station in North-China may be handed over to Germany in two years time in return for certain important services and concessions by Germany to Great Britain in South Africa. We give the report with reserve, but it is too important to withhold." Unfortunately the reputation of the China Gazette as a manufacturer of "bunders" depreciates the value of this item of news, though the Wei-hai-wei correspondent of the N.-C. Daily News also mentions it.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Admiral Dewey arrived at Hongkong on May 23rd, on the flagship Olympia.

Mr. Jas. Troup, late British Consul General at Yokohama, has a retiring allowance of £777 15s. 7d. allotted to him in this year's estimates.

The City of New York has appropriated the sum of a quarter of a million of dollars (gold) to cover the cost of the Dewey celebration on the Admiral's return to that city.

The electric cars, says the local paper, are running with more or less regularity in Seoul. Koreans at first enjoyed the novelty and we are informed that one man rode and rode until he had used up two dollars. Fancy Seoul being ahead of Tokyo!

Ti Kan, a Chinaman, charged T. W. Genierez and S. W. Francis, Cingalese subjects of the Queen, in H.B.M. Court for Japan, with assaulting him on the 26th ult. Three interpreters, Chinese, Japanese, and Cingalese, were engaged to explain the affair to the Acting Assistant Judge, but in the end the case was dismissed.

The Strawberry Fete at the Bluff Gardens on Saturday afternoon, in aid of the funds of the Ladies' International Reading Room, was a most gratifying success. The weather was genial though cool, and the youngsters, who were present in troops, thoroughly enjoyed themselves. A sum of yen 334.95 was realized.

The Shanghai Mercury notes a report current among the Chinese that Reuters' agent at Peking has offered the Taung-li Yamen to undertake the transmission of all official and foreign cablegrams for the Chinese Government. It is expected that this will shortly be sanctioned. The monthly grant in return for these services has not yet been made public.

At a vestry meeting the other day a Mr. Jacobs accused the vicar of having written a letter in which he stated that a devil had been in the parish for a year or more. "Who is the devil in the parish? that's what I want to know," thundered the irate Mr. Jacobs. The vicar is reported to have said, very quietly, "You know." And then there were cries of "Jimmy Jacobs." The proceedings concluded, says the report, by the vicar pronouncing a blessing.

A young man named Kiriha Inosuke, aged 19, till lately residing with his uncle at Todamachi, Yokohama, was turned out of the house recently owing to his dissolute conduct. Thinking his aunt had been instrumental in his expulsion, he determined to take her life. At 8.30 p.m. on the 30th he visited the house with a dagger, and persuaded his aunt to walk outside. Arrived at a quiet place he attacked her with the dagger, and stabbed her in several places. The woman's shrieks, however, brought help, and the would-be murderer, who ran away, was arrested later.

The finding of the Court of Inquiry into the circumstances attending the stranding of the Benlawers was delivered on Saturday, says the Nagasaki Press. The captain, officers, and crew have been exonerated from all blame, and the Court finds that "the stranding was owing to the pilot miscalculating his distance from Otatishima when abeam of the light on the island and consequently not altering his course sufficiently to the westward, and that the miscalculation was partly due to the pilot having made an insufficient allowance for the strength of the tide, both when approaching and passing Otatishima, and for the consequent increase of the ordinary speed of the vessel over the ground from 10 to 11½ knots, which increase affected the position when abeam of Otatishima as calculated by four-point bearings."

The junk Seitsu Maru (70 koku) belonging to one Watanabe, Chiba prefecture, entered Yokohama harbour loaded with wood and charcoal on Sunday, and after discharging cargo anchored two cho from the Grand Hotel outside the break-water. About nine o'clock on Monday evening two men, one apparently 36 years old and the other 27, approached the vessel in a boat and climbed on board, waking the three sleeping sendo. The new comers, pretending to be detectives, told the crew to come with them for official investigation. This the sailors declined to do, and the two thieves thereupon threatened them with daggers. After binding the sendos' hands and gagging them they secured 42 yen 80 sen and rowed back toward Yatobashi. The matter was reported to the water police, who are engaged in a keen search; but as yet no arrest has been made.

Among the many sources of wealth now being opened up by the construction of the Trans-Siberian Railway, the vast forests of Siberia, says the Saturday Review, are by no means the least important. They cover an area more than ten times the total area of Great Britain. The direction of the Siberian rivers, flowing into the Arctic Ocean, has hitherto precluded the possibility of exploiting this wealth of timber. In view of the extension of the railway, especially in the direction of the densely populated but treeless districts of China, the Russian Government has taken the matter seriously in hand. A complete administrative system has been established, and already three influential syndicates, two German and one Belgian, have been formed for the development of various wood and timber industries in Siberia. It is most regrettable that British manufacturers and capitalists abandon the field of enterprise in Russia's Asiatic Empire to German, Belgian, and French competitors. British interests there have hardly a consul to represent them.

What is the moral, asks the Saturday Review, of losses at sea due to reckless navigation? Who, if the whole truth were told, is responsible; the captain or the owner? Were the question asked at Lloyd's, the answer would be "The Owner." There may be no instructions to keep time at all risks, but the captain knows very well that if he loses time by consulting caution, even reasonable caution, he will be known for worse. Promotion will not come his way, though he may be fortunate enough to keep the command he has. Such a sanction inevitably must prompt in a captain's mind—and not least in the most able—the wish which will produce the thought that the speed which he wants to make is not dangerous. To levy a fine on shipowners proportionate to the tonnage held to be lost by reckless navigation would be a remedy far more effective than the carrying of a superfluous passenger in the person of a Board of Trade official.

THE SALVATION ARMY IN JAPAN.

The following Salvation Army notes have been placed at our disposal:—The half-yearly Council of War will be held in Tokyo and Yokohama from Friday to Tuesday, June 2nd to 6th, when all the officers of the territory will be present. The series of meetings comprise both private and public gatherings, and much interest will naturally centre round the first Salvation Army officers' wedding in Japan. The ceremony will be conducted according to Salvation Army methods by Colonel Bailey in the Kudan Methodist Church, on Tuesday afternoon, June 6th. The happy man is Ensign Yamamoto, Editor of the Japanese War Cry (Toki-no-Koe), the bride being Miss Kie Sato.

The Yokohama portion of the series will include a Staff Council (private) and a public meeting in the Minatoza Theatre, Sumiyoshicho, on Saturday evening, June 3rd, at 7.30 p.m. This will practically be a repetition of the very successful "International Meeting" recently held in Tokyo. The officers will be dressed in costumes representing many of the countries where the Army is at work. There is much rejoicing in the ranks over the result of the recent "Self Denial Week," the total realized, 460 yen, being in excess of expectations. This is a great advance upon the amount raised last year—164 yen—and is evidence of the growing influence of the Army in Japan. It should be understood that this money principally came from Japanese, a very small proportion only being received from foreigners. The British Self-Denial Appeal reached the sum of £38,000, being an increase of £5,000 over last year. It is from the Self Denial Fund that the Army chiefly maintains those branches of its Missionary and other work that have not reached the "Self-supporting basis."

From June 1st the work of the Naval and Mercantile Home carried on at No. 187 will be removed to somewhat smaller premises at No. 123 in the same street. This move has been made necessary by the loss of most of what is known as the "Guarantee Boarding Business." At the time the Army bought from Mr. Kerman the lease and business of the Pacific Hotel at No. 187 it was the custom for American merchantmen to be discharged on arrival here under a guarantee from a boarding master. About 12 months ago, however, the Authorities at Washington issued instructions to the Consulates throughout the East to discontinue the practice, and henceforth the men will have to complete the round voyage. This, combined with an unusual absence of war vessels, has produced a heavy financial loss to the Salvation Army during the year of no less than 3,000 yen and it has been found advisable to surrender the lease and move into premises more suitable to the altered circumstances. The corner block of new houses just erected by Mr. P. Sarda in Honmura Road has therefore been secured. The house is in an excellent position, commanding a view of the Bridge leading to the "hundred steps." It is hoped that here the Army may continue its good work amongst the seamen who visit this port. During the 2 years of its existence the Home has supplied 61,693 meals and 14,223 beds, whilst 107 beachcombers and distressed men have been shipped out of the town.

The present position of the Salvation Army in Japan is 41 officers, 11 corps, 7 outposts, and 2 social institutions.

CLUB HOTEL, LIMITED.

ANNUAL MEETING OF SHAREHOLDERS.

A FANCIAL DISCUSSION.

The 10th annual meeting of the Club Hotel Company, Limited, was held on Monday afternoon at the Hotel.—Mr. H. C. Litchfield presided, and there were also present Captain Weston, Messrs. J. Johnstone, H. C. Pigott, T. L. Brower, O. Ward, E. B. Jones, Leathier, W. R. Bennett, J. W. Hall, T. Batchelor, G. Booth, M. Russell, and C. H. Fearon (secretary).

REPORT AND ACCOUNTS.

The CHAIRMAN read the report, which was as follows:—

Gentlemen, The Profit and Loss Account and Statement of Assets and Liabilities for the year ended the 31st March, 1899, are now submitted to you. The Gross Receipts for the past year were yen 71,815 36, including Rent and Transfer Fees. The profits of the Company have not equalled those of last year, a result in great measure accounted for by increased cost of provisions and necessities, and also to the diminution in the number of travellers through Japan. An interim Dividend of yen 4 per share was paid to Shareholders in November last, and, by appropriating for the purpose the sum of yen 3,200 placed to Reserve last year, a further Dividend of yen 3 per share may now be paid. Mr. George Syme Thomson having retired from the Board of Directors in consequence of his departure from Japan, there is a vacancy on the Board. Mr. Litchfield now retires in rotation, but is eligible for re-election.

I have compared the above accounts with the Books and Vouchers of the Company, and find the same to be in accordance therewith.

Cecil Guinness,

Auditor.

Yokohama, 30th May, 1899.

THE HOTEL'S AFFAIRS.

Mr. WARD said there was a debit balance of 30,000 yen, and he should like to know what that was.

The CHAIRMAN replied that that was a sum the directors found it necessary to raise to pay the expenses incurred in the completing of the new building in excess of the sum voted by the shareholders last year, and other amounts, and also in part-payment of extra expenses they were put to in consequence of the unfortunate fire in the adjoining building. He (the Chairman) was glad the question had been asked because it gave him an opportunity of saying that this fire showed them that they were not fully insured. Some discussion had ensued with the Fire Insurance Companies, with the result that they had increased the insurance very considerably. The immediate result of the fire was that they had to make good part of the damage done to their property. As for the balance they would find that in last year's report there was a sum at debit to the company with their bankers and in consequence of representations made to them by the Bank they were compelled to repay that loan, and the only available means at the time was to raise money, which they did by a mortgage of the land of No. 5 Bund.

Mr. BENNETT said the stock account also showed a considerable increase. It was practically 4 as against 11.

The CHAIRMAN said that was owing to paying in a larger stock of wines in view of the new tariff. Part of that had of course been paid for by the loan. It was over the payment for these wines that the Hongkong Bank raised the question of the overdraft.

Mr. BENNETT also mentioned the new steam launch.

Mr. JOHNSTONE asked what was the item of 30,000 yen "reserve for fluctuation of property." Was that in cash?

Mr. PIGGOTT—No, Mr. Johnstone, it is not in cash, as you will see by the account here. In the valuation of property that amount stands over and above the share capital.

Mr. HALL—Should that sum be placed as a liability of the company? It makes the accounts look worse than they are.

Mr. BENNETT—It is a liability to the share holders, of course, just as the capital is a liability to the shareholders.

Mr. JOHNSTONE—I suppose it is simply the appreciation of the property.

ANOTHER SHAREHOLDER—The unearned increment.—(Laughter.)

Mr. PIGGOTT—Yes, the unearned increment, if you care to call it so.

Mr. PIGGOTT, calling attention to another point in the report, remarked that the directors simply stated that a dividend of 3 yen might be declared. They did not recommend it in the usual way. They left it to the meeting whether the dividend should be declared or not. It could be paid, but some shareholders, in face of the loan of 30,000 yen, might not think it wise to declare a dividend. The last six months had been very bad, and as the hotel year was rather awkwardly divided, so that one six months extended over the slack time and the other the busy time, the report looked worse than it really was. At present the hotel was doing very well indeed, and promised to do well during the next few months. It was not only the hotels that complained of the last year. The curio merchants were also grumbling; it was a general complaint.

Mr. BENNETT proposed that the dividend be paid and the accounts adopted. Seeing that the hotels property had appreciated he thought they were perfectly justified in doing so.

Mr. BOOTH seconded.

Mr. JOHNSTONE said he would not propose an amendment, but in view of the fact that they had a liability of 30,000 yen it was advisable to pay the dividend?

Mr. RUSSELL asked what was the interest on the loan?

The CHAIRMAN—Seven per cent.

Mr. RUSSELL—The same as the dividend we are paying.

Mr. PIGGOTT pointed out that seven per cent. was being paid only on the loan, while the dividend was on the whole capital. They were paying less interest on the loan than they had done on the overdraft. The Club Hotel was not the only hotel with a loan. There were other hotels doing a large business that had loans. He need not mention names.

Mr. BENNETT—And many companies too.

The motion was then put and carried nem. con.

ELECTION OF DIRECTORS—A COMIC OPERA SCENE.

The question of the election of directors was then discussed.

Mr. WARD proposed the Chairman, Capt. Weston, and Mr. Johnstone.

Mr. JOHNSTONE said he could not serve at present.

Mr. BENNETT said Mr. Syme Thompson was only going away for a short time, and as he was particularly conversant with the hotel's business he (the speaker) thought he might be re-elected.

Mr. PIGGOTT proposed Mr. Bennett in case the shareholders thought it necessary to have another director.

Mr. BENNETT said he could not find time to devote the attention to the hotel's business that he felt was necessary, but he eventually agreed to serve until Mr. Thompson's return.

Mr. WARD proposed Capt. Weston's name.

Mr. JOHNSTONE seconded.

Mr. RUSSELL proposed Mr. E. B. S. Edwards.

Mr. WARD proposed that there should be seven directors.

Mr. BATCHELOR seconded.

Mr. BROWER proposed that the number should be restricted to five.

This was seconded.

Mr. WARD's motion was put first, and declared lost by five votes to six.

The CHAIRMAN, amid much merriment, then put Mr. Brower's motion, and it was carried by six to five.

Mr. BROWER then proposed that Mr. Thompson be elected.

Mr. PIGGOTT seconded.

Mr. RUSSELL proposed Captain Weston.

Captain WESTON declined to serve, but he objected to Mr. Thompson being proposed as a director. He thought it was a farce. Mr. Thompson might be dead, or might not return.

Mr. WARD said it struck him as a farce too.

Captain WESTON—He's a nice man enough, but he's not here, and may not be here again.

Mr. WARD—He may never be here again.

The proposer of Mr. Thompson, however, insisted on his name being included, and a ballot was taken, resulting as follows:—

	votes.
Mr. Bennett	14
Mr. Litchfield	13
Mr. Thompson	7
Mr. Edwards	6
Capt. Weston	1

The CHAIRMAN said according to that Messrs. Bennett, Litchfield, and Thompson were elected. The opposition party called for a scrutiny of the voting to find out whether the weight of shares as well as numbers was against Mr. Edwards.

A scrutiny, occupying some time, was accordingly taken, and was on the point of being concluded when Mr. JOHNSTONE rose, and asked the simple question, "Is Mr. Thompson eligible? Has he any shares in the company?"

No direct answer was returned, but Mr. PIGGOTT gave an exclamation of mingled amusement and consternation which was quite as eloquent as words. The fact had evidently escaped the notice of everyone.

After a pause there was a roar of laughter at the expense of the partisans of Mr. Thompson, and Mr. PIGGOTT then said, "We have had all this trouble for nothing."

Mr. BENNETT—That's what I call a waste of energy.—(Laughter.)

Mr. JONES caused some further amusement by taking the matter quite au grand sérieux, and asking who was responsible. He reproached the directors with not acquainting them with the fact.

Mr. BENNETT said Mr. Jones could see the list of shareholders as well as the directors.

Finally Messrs. Litchfield, Bennett, and Edwards were declared elected.

AUDITOR.

On the proposition of Mr. BROWER, seconded by Mr. LEATHER, Mr. Cecil Guinness was elected auditor. The meeting then terminated.

THE JAPANESE INVASION OF KOREA IN 1892.

BY HOMER B. HULBERT, A.M.
CHAPTER VI.

ATTEMPTS TO SECURE AID FROM CHINA—DIVIDED COUNSELS IN NANKING—AN ARMY SENT—A DESPERATE ENVOY—GENERAL SOK SONG'S LOVE FOR KOREA—THE EMPEROR GIVES ORDERS FOR THE KING'S ENTERTAINMENT—GREAT KOREAN VICTORY IN THE SOUTH—JAPANESE ARMY OF REINFORCEMENT DEFEATED AND DESTROYED BY ADMIRAL YI SUN-SIN—GENERAL YI HONoured—THE BACK OF THE INVASION BROKEN—A VAIN-GLOIOUS CHINESE GENERAL SEVERELY BEATEN—THE MONKS BEGIN A HOLY WAR—A SHARP ANSWER—VARIOUS KOREAN FORCES—A NIGHT ADVENTURE—JAPANESE REVERSES IN THE SOUTH—CHINA AWAKENS—A GRAND CONFERENCE—A TRUCE—THE TIME EXPIRES—A CELEBRATED SOLDIER TRACKED DOWN—ATTEMPT TO RETAKE SOUL—BRAVE DEFENCE OF CHIN-JU—THE FIRST NORTH AND BOMB—VARIOUS KOREAN ATTEMPTS—KOREAN VICTORY IN HAM-GYUNG PROVINCE—ANOTHER IN THE SOUTH—JAPANESE CONFINED ALMOST ENTIRELY TO PYEONG YANG.

The efforts that Korea put forth before she obtained aid from China make an entertaining story, and they show that China delayed it as long as possible and then complied, not so much because she wished to help Korea as because she desired to check the Japanese before they crossed the Ya-lu and began invading the fruitful plains of the Liao-tung peninsula. Before the Japanese ever landed in Korea the King had sent an envoy to Nanking telling the Emperor that an invasion was next to certain; and that envoy was still in Nanking. After the King's flight to the north he sent Min Mong nyong and Yi Duk hyung, as special envoys, to again ask aid. On the arrival of these men with their urgent request there was a great council of war in Nanking. Some of the leading generals said, "There is no need for China to help those wild people. Let them fight it out themselves." It would appear that the policy by which China disclaimed responsibility for Korea, when such responsibility involved sacrifice, is several centuries old. Other generals said, "No, that will not do. We must send troops and at least guard our own territory from invasion." But the Chinese General-in-chief, Sok Song, said, "We must, without fail, render Korea the assistance for which she asks. We must appropriate 2,000,000 cash for their maintenance." The upshot of it all was that General Nak Sang-ji took a small body of troops and marched eastward to the banks of Ya-lu where he went into camp without attempting to render the Koreans any assistance.

In the seventh moon the King sent another envoy to Nanking on the same errand, but with the same lack of success. Then the King called to him one of his most trusted officials and appointed him envoy to Nanking and said, "The salvation of the kingdom lies in your hands. Go to Nanking and leave no efforts untaken whereby the Emperor may be induced to help us." Charged with this important mission, this envoy, Ch'ong Gwi-sun, hastened to Nanking and, entering the enclosure of the war office, sat in the courtyard for seven days weeping; but the officials all turned a deaf ear to his entreaties, excepting the General-in-chief Sok Song. Indignant at the apathy of his colleagues and in spite of the fact that his duty as general-in-chief demanded his presence in Nanking, he arose and said, "If none of you gentlemen will go to the aid of Korea I will go myself." There were special and personal reasons for this man's interest in Korea. In years gone by a Korean merchant, while in Nanking, had met in an inn a beautiful slave girl, and upon inquiry had discovered that she was of noble family but had sold herself into slavery to obtain money wherewith to deliver her father from prison. The merchant was so touched by the sacrifice which she had made—for it meant the sacrifice of honour itself—that he gave all his patrimony and bought her and set her free. In after years she became the wife of this same General Sok Song, and thus it was that he was an ardent admirer of Korea and was determined to see to it that Korea received aid in her present extremity.

At this point the King sent a message to the prefect of Liao-tung saying, "The Japanese have come as far north as Pyeong-yang and I fear I shall have to cross the Ya-lu and take refuge in your district." This the prefect immediately reported to the Emperor, who answered, "If the King of Korea enters your district provide him with a fine house, give him food out of the imperial stores, each day four ounces of silver, a pig, a sheep, vermicelli, and rice. Give him also an escort of a hundred men and let twenty women be detailed to wait upon him."

We have now arrived at the threshold of the counter-invasion which was destined to be one of the main causes of the Japanese retreat, but before entering upon this narrative we must turn again to the south and witness some events which did far more to effect the withdrawal of the Japanese than the coming of the Chinese armies did.

The first of these was the utter defeat of a large body of Japanese who were scouring the province of Chul-la. Entering the town of Ich'i they were met by such a fierce attack on the part of Whang-jin, the prefect of Tong bak, that they turned back and, crossing the Ung-ch'i Mountain, entered the prefecture of Chun ju. Yi Bong-nam, the prefect of Na-ju, and Whang bak, a volunteer general, lay in ambush with a large body of volunteer troops and succeeded in driving the Japanese back, but the next day the invading host came fiercely to the attack and the Koreans had to give way. The Japanese in their exultation now thought they could go back to Ich'i and avenge themselves for their defeat there. General Kwun-myl and the prefect Whang-jin heard of this in time to fortify one of the mountain passes. The Japanese attacked in a desperate manner, creeping up the steep mountain sides on their hands and knees, shooting as they advanced. All day long the fight continued and the Japanese were utterly defeated. Their bodies were piled in heaps where they fell and the records say that the ground was covered with one crimson matting of leaves. This was one of the greatest land victories which the Koreans scored against the Japanese. Retreating to the valley with their dead the Japanese made two great heaps of bodies and buried them in trenches, marking the spot with rough monuments of wood. This was probably one of the bodies of troops for which the Japanese in Pyeongyang were waiting, before attempting the invasion of China.

But meanwhile events of far greater importance were transpiring further south, where Admiral Yi Sun-sin, with his wonderful "tortoise boat," was watching for Japanese fleets. It was in the eighth moon that his watchfulness was rewarded and he beheld on the eastern horizon a vast fleet of Japanese boats bringing a hundred thousand men to reinforce the army of invasion and enable it to push on into China.

Admiral Yi and his lieutenant Yi Ok-keui met this powerful fleet in a place called Kyong-naryang among the islands off the southern coast of Chul-la Province. The evident intention of the Japanese was to round the southwestern corner of the peninsula and sail up the west coast to Pyeongyang. At first the wily admiral made as if he would betake himself to flight and the Japanese by giving chase threw their own line into disorder. When opposite Han-san Island Admiral Yi suddenly turned his iron-clad about and rammed the nearest of his pursuers and then engaged the others either singly or by the score, for his craft was impervious to their weapons. His attending fleet followed and completed the work after he had disabled the enemy's boats. Seventy-one of the Japanese boats were sunk that day, and it is said the very sea was red. But soon a reinforcing fleet came up from Angol Harbour near Han-san, and the Admiral found that his day's work was not yet done. The attack straightway began and soon the Japanese were put in the same plight in which their comrades had been put. Many, seeing how impossible it was to make headway against this iron ship, beached their boats and fled by land; so on that same day forty-eight ships more were burned. The few that escaped during the fight sped eastward towards home. So ended, we may well believe, one of the great naval battles of the world. It may well be called the Salamis of Korea. It signed the death-warrant of the invasion. It frustrated the great motive of the invasion, the humbling of China; and thenceforth, although the war dragged through many a long year, it was carried on solely with a view to mitigating the disappointment of Hideyoshi—a disappointment that must have been as keen as his thirst for conquest was unquenchable.

When the King heard of these splendid achievements he heaped upon Admiral Yi all the honours in his gift, and even those who hated him for his successes were compelled to join in his praise. Konishi had heard that an army was coming to reinforce him, and he wrote an exultant letter to the King saying, "A hundred thousand men are coming to reinforce me. Where will you flee to then?" But ere this letter reached its destination there came the news of the crushing defeat in the south. The whole success of the invasion depended upon forming a junction between the army in Pyeongyang and this army of reinforcement, but Admiral Yi shattered the fleet and the last hope of the invaders perished.

And now at last China bestirred herself and sent General Cho Seung-hun with 5,000 troops across the Yalu into Korea. This was a man whose vanity was as great as his ignorance of the Japanese. He loudly boasted, "Now that I have come, no Japanese will be able to stand before me." Penetrating as far south as Ka-san he enquired whether the Japanese had fled from Pyeongyang, and, being answered in the negative, he exclaimed, "Heaven is indeed good to keep them there for me." Two of the Korean generals ventured to offer him some advice, saying that it was now the rainy season and the roads were very bad and that it might be well to wait until his army could move with greater ease and with better hopes of success. But he laughed and said, "I once took 3,000 men and put to flight 100,000 Mongols. I care no more for these Japanese than I do for mosquitoes or ants." And so his troops floundered in through the mud until they stood before Pyeongyang on the nineteenth of the eighth moon. And lo, the gates were wide open. The Chinese troops marched straight up through the town to the governor's residence, firing their guns and calling on the enemy to appear. But not a Japanese was to be seen. When the whole of the Chinese force had entered the city and the streets were full, the Japanese, who had lain hidden in the every house, poured a sudden and destructive fire into their ranks. The Chinese, huddled together in small companies, were shot down like rabbits. General Sa Yu, the second in command of the Chinese, was killed, and the boastful General Cho Seung-hun mounted his horse and fled the city, followed by many of his soldiers as could extricate themselves. Rain began to fall and the roads were deep with mud. The Japanese followed the fugitives and the valley was strewn with the bodies of the slain. Out of 5,000 men who entered the city only two thousand escaped. General Cho fled two hundred li to An-ju before he stopped. He there gave out that as there had been much rain and the roads were heavy he was at a disadvantage in attacking, and when his second, General Sa Yu, fell he saw that nothing could be done, and so had ordered a retreat. But the Koreans only smiled, for they knew that a sixty mile ride over those roads by a Chinese general meant more than an ordinary retreat. And so he returned to Liautung, this valiant man, and, fearing punishment, averred that "We whipped the Japanese, but the Koreans turned against us and we had to fall back." The Chinese general Yang Sa-henn was sent to investigate this charge, but the King denied it and the truth was soon discovered.

And now a new element in this seething caldron of war rose to the surface. It was an independent movement on the part of the Buddhist monks throughout the country. Hyu Jung, known throughout the eight provinces as "The great teacher of So-san," was a man of great natural ability as well as of great learning. His pupils were numbered by the thousands and were found in every province. He called together two thousand of them and appeared before the King at Bui-ju and said, "We are of the common people, but we are all the King's servants, and two thousand of us have come to die for Your Majesty." The King was much pleased by this demonstration of loyalty and made Hyu Jung a Priest General, and told him to go into camp at Pophung Monastery. He did so and from that point sent out a call to all the monasteries in the land. In Chul-la Province was a warrior monk Ch'oe Yung, and at Diamond Mountain another named Yu Jung. These came with over a thousand followers and went into camp a few miles to the east of Pyeongyang. They had no intention of engaging in actual battle, but they acted as spies, took charge of the commissariat, and made themselves generally useful. During battle they stood behind the troops and shouted encouragement. Yu Jung, trusting to his priestly garb, went into Pyeongyang to see the Japanese generals. Being ushered into the presence of Konishi, the monk found himself surrounded by flashing weapons. But he was not in the least daunted, and looked about him with a smiling face. Konishi addressed him good-naturedly and asked, "What do you consider the greatest treasure in your land?" Without a moment's hesitation the monk answered "Your head," which piece of subtle flattery made the Japanese general laugh long and loud.

Besides these monks there were other movements of a loyal nature throughout the country. At Wha-san, in Chul-la Province, there was a little band of men under Ch'oe Gyoung, who whose banner represented a falcon in flight. Also in Ch'ung-ch'ung Province a celebrated scholar Cho Hön collected a large band of men, but his efforts were frustrated by the cowardice and jealousy of the governor of the province, who imprisoned the parents of many of his followers and so compelled them to desert.

Yi Wan-ik, the governor of Poyeung-an Province, and Yi Bin, one of the provincial generals, made a fortified camp at Sun-an, sixty li to the west of Poyeung. At the same time Generals Kim Eung-do and Pak Myung-hyun, with a force of 10,000 men, made a line of fortified camps along the west side of the town of Poyeung-yang. Kim Ok-ch'u with a naval force guarded the ford of the Ta-dong. These forces advanced simultaneously and attacked the Japanese, cutting off all stragglers. Suddenly the Japanese army made a sally from the city, and the Koreans were dispersed. When they again rendezvoused at their respective camps it was found that General Kim Eung-do and his troops were nowhere to be found. As it happened he was very near the wall of the town when the sortie occurred and he was cut off from retreat. But in the dusk of approaching night he was not discovered by the Japanese. A story is told of a curious adventure which he had that night. One of the Japanese generals in the town had found a beautiful dancing girl and had compelled her to share his quarters. On this evening she asked him to let her go to the wall and see if she could find some one who would carry a message to her brother. Permission was given, and she hastened to the wall and there called softly, "Where is my brother?" General

Kim, as we have seen, was immediately beneath the wall and he answered, "Who is it that calls?" "Will you not help me escape from the Japanese," she pleaded. He immediately consented to help her, and, taking his life in his hands, he speedily scaled the wall and accompanied her toward the Japanese general's quarters. Her captor was a terrible creature, so the story goes, who always slept sitting bolt upright at a table with his eyes wide open and holding a long sword in each hand. His face was fiery red. General Kim, conducted by the dancing girl, came upon him unawares and smote off his head at a stroke, but even after the head fell the terrible figure rose and hurled one of the swords with such tremendous force that it stuck fast in one of the house posts. The Korean general concealed the head beneath his garments and fled, with the girl at his heels. But now for the first time he seemed to become aware of the extreme hazard of his position and, fearing that he would not be able to get by the guard if accompanied by the girl, his gallantry suddenly forsook him and he turned and smote off her head as well. Thus unencumbered he succeeded in making his escape.

We must here digress again to describe the final conflict that put an end to Japanese advances in the province of Chul-la. A general, Cho Hön, in company with a monk warrior, Yung Gyu, advanced on the important town of Ch'ung-gu, then occupied by a strong Japanese garrison. They approached the west gate and stormed it with stones and arrows. In a short time the Japanese were compelled to retire and the Koreans began to swarm into the town, vowing to make a complete slaughter of the hated enemy; but at the moment a severe thunder shower arose and the darkness was intense. So General Cho recalled his troops and encamped outside the gate. That night the Japanese burned their dead and fled out of the north gate, and when General Cho led his troops into the city the next day he scored only an empty triumph. He desired to push forward to the place where the King had found refuge, and in that end he advanced as far north as On-yang in Ch'ung-ch'ung Province; but learning there that a strong body of Japanese had congregated at Yö-san in Chul-la Province, he turned back to attack them. He made an arrangement by letter with Kwun Ryul, the provincial general of Chul-la, to make a simultaneous attack upon the Japanese position from different sides. But when General Cho arrived before the Japanese camp with his little band of 700 men General Kwun was nowhere to be found. The Japanese laughed when they saw this little array and came on to the attack, but were each time driven back. At last the Koreans had spent all their arrows, it was late in the day, and they were fatigued and half-famished. General Cho, however, had no thought of retreat, and kept urging on his men. If he had at this crisis withdrawn his remaining soldiers the victory would virtually have been his, for the Japanese had lost many more men than he; but he was too stubborn to give an inch. The Japanese came on to a last grand charge. General Cho's aides advised him to withdraw, but he peremptorily refused. At last every weapon was gone and the men fought with their bare fists, falling where they stood. The slain of the Japanese outnumbered those of the Koreans, and although they were victorious their victory crippled them. It took the survivors four days to burn their dead, and when it was done they broke camp and went southward. The Japanese never regained the ground lost by this retreat and it was a sample of what must occur throughout the peninsula, since Admiral Yi had rendered reinforcement from Japan impossible.

We return now to the north, the real scene of war. In the ninth moon the Chinese general, Sim Yu-yung, whose name will figure largely in these annals from this point on, was sent from China to investigate the condition of affairs in Korea with a view to the sending of a large Chinese force, for by this time China had become alive to the interests at stake—namely, her own interests. This general crossed the Yalu and came southward by An-ju as far as Sun-an. From that point he sent a communication to the Japanese in Pyeongyang saying, "I have come by order of the Emperor of China to inquire what Korea has done to merit such treatment as this at your hands. You are trampling Korea under foot and we would know why." The Japanese general, Konishi, answered him by requesting that the Chinese general meet him at Kang-bok Mountain ten li north of Pyeongyang and have a conference with him. To this General Sim agreed, and, taking with him three followers, he repaired to the appointed place. Konishi, accompanied by Kuroda and Gensho, came to the rendezvous with a great array of soldiers and weapons. General Sim walked into their midst alone, having left his horse outside the enclosure. He immediately addressed them as follows, "I brought with me a million soldiers and left them in camp beyond the Ya-lu. You, Gensho, are a monk. Why do you come to kill and destroy?" Gensho answered, "For many a year Japan has had no dealings with China. We asked from Korea a safe conduct for our envoy to Nanking, but it was refused, and we were compelled to come and take it by force. What cause have you to blame us for this?" To this General Sim replied, "If you wish to go to China to pay your respects to the Emperor there will be no difficulty at all. I can arrange it without the least trouble." Konishi said nothing but handed his sword to General Sim in token of amity and after they had conferred together for some time it was arranged that General Sim go to Nanking and represent that Japan wished to become a vassal of China. Fifty days was agreed upon for the general to make the trip to Nanking and return with the answer, and a truce was called for that time. A line was drawn round Pyeongyang ten li from the wall and the Japanese agreed to stay within that limit while the Koreans promised not to cross that line. General Sim was sent upon his way with every mark of esteem on the part of the Japanese, who accompanied him a short distance on the road.

The Japanese lived up to the terms of the truce, never crossing the line once, but the fifty days expired and still General Sim did not appear. They then informed the Koreans that in the twelfth moon their horses would "drink the waters of the Ya-lu."

During these fifty days of truce what was going on in other parts of the peninsula? Cho Ung, a soldier of Ch'ung ch'ung Province, was a man of marvellous skill. With a band of 500 men he succeeded so well in cutting off small foraging bands of Japanese that they were at their wits' end to get him put out of the way. One foggy day when the mist was so thick that one could not see his hand before his face the Japanese learned that this dreaded man was on the road. They followed him swiftly and silently and at last got an opportunity to shoot him in the back. He fell from his horse, but rose and fled on foot. But they soon overtook him and, having first cut his hands off, they despatched him.

The governor of Kyung-gui Province was Sim Du. He had found asylum in the town of Sangnyung, two hundred li north of Seoul. Having gotten together a considerable body of soldiers he formed the daring plan of wresting Seoul from the hands of the Japanese. For this purpose it was necessary that he should have accomplices in that city who should rise at the appointed time and join in the attack. Through treachery or otherwise the Japanese became aware of the plot and, sending a strong body of troops to Sangnyung, they seized the governor and put him to death.

General Dim S-min had charge of the defence of the walled town of Chin-ju, in Kyung-sung Province. The Japanese invested the town with a very large force. Within the garrison amounted to only three thousand men. These were placed on the walls in the most advantageous manner by General Kim who was specially skilled in the defence of a walled town. All the soldiers were strictly commanded not to fire a single shot until the Japanese were close up to the wall. They advanced in three divisions, 10,000 strong. A thousand of these were musketeers. The roar of the musketry was deafening, but the walls were as silent as if deserted. Not a man was to be seen. On the following day the assault began in earnest. The Japanese discarded the muskets and used fire arrows. Soon all the houses outside the wall were in ashes. General Kim went up into the south gate and there sat and listened to some flute playing with a view to making the Japanese think the defending force was so large as to make solicitude unnecessary. This made the Japanese very careful. They made elaborate preparations for the assault. Cutting down bamboos and pine trees they made ladders about eight feet wide and as high as the wall. They also prepared straw mats to protect their heads from missiles from above. But the defenders had also made careful preparations. They had bundles of straw with little packages of powder fastened in them, to cast down on the attacking party. Piles of stones and keftles of hot water were also in readiness. As the assault might take place at night, planks bristling with nails were thrown over the wall. This proved a wise precaution, for in fact the attack was made that very night. It raged fiercely for a time, but so many of the Japanese were lamed by the spikes in the planks and so many were burned by the bundles of straw that at last they had to withdraw, leaving heaps of dead behind. More than half the attacking force were killed and the rest beat a hasty retreat.

In the ninth moon General Pak Jin of Kyungsang Province took 10,000 soldiers and went to attack the walled town of Kyong-ju, which was held by the Japanese. It is said that he made use of a species of missile called "The Flying Thunder-bolt." It was projected from a kind of mortar made of bell metal and having a bore of some twelve or fourteen inches. The mortar was about eight feet long. The records say that this thing could project itself through the air for a distance of forty paces. It doubtless means that a projectile of some kind could be cast that distance from this mortar. The records go on to say that the "Flying Thunder-bolt" was thrown over the wall of the town and when the Japanese flocked around it to see what it might be it exploded with a terrific noise, killing twenty men or more instantly. This struck the Japanese dumb with terror and so worked upon their superstitious natures that they decamped in haste and evacuated the city. The inventor of this weapon was Yi Jang-sun, and it is said that the secret of its construction died with him. It appears that we have here the inventor of the mortar and bomb. The length of the gun compared with its calibre, the distance the projectile was carried with the poor powder then in use, and the explosion of the shell all point to this as being the first veritable mortar in use in the East, if not in the world. It is said that one of these mortars lies to-day in a storehouse in the fortress of Nam-han.

All through the country the people were rising and arming against the invaders. A list of their leaders will show how widespread was the movement. In the province of Chul-la were Generals Kim Ch'un-il, Ko G'ong-myung, and Ch'oe G'ung-whie; in Kyung-sung Province Generals Kwak Jan, Kwon Bung-do, Kim Myon, Ch'ong In-hong, Kim Ha, Nyn Wang-a, Yi Da-guei and Chang Sa-jin in Ch'ung-ch'ung Province Generals Cho Hoi, Yung Gyu (monk), Kim Hong-min, Yi San-gyun, Cho Dok-kong Cho Ung and Yi Bang; in Kyung-gui Province Generals U Sung-jun, Chong Suk-ha, Ch'oe Henl, Yi No, Yi San-whi, Nam On-gyung, Kim Tak, Yu Da-jun, Yi Jil, Hong Gy'e nam, and Wang Ok; in Ham-gyung Province Generals Ch'ong Nam-bu, and Ko G'ung-min; in Pyeong-an Province Generals Cho Hui-k and the monk Yu Jung. The country was filled with little bands of fifty or a hundred men; each and all were fighting separately. Perhaps it was better so, for it may have prevented jealousies and personal enmities that otherwise would have ruined the whole scheme.

Chong Mun-bu was the "Military inspector of the north," and it was his business to investigate annually the condition of things in the province of Ham-gyung and to superintend the annual fair on the border at Whae-yung in the tenth moon of each year. He was caught by the Japanese on the road and was held captive, but made his escape by night and found a place of hiding in the house of a certain sorcerer or fortune-teller in Yung-sung. After five days of flight he reached the town of Kyung-sung, where he found the leaders Ch'oe Baek-hun and Ch'oi Dal-wun at the house of a wealthy patron, Yi Bang-sun, who had given large sums of money to raise and equip soldiers. The common people entered into the plan and a force of 10,000 men, indifferently armed and drilled, was put into the field. This force surrounded the town of Kil-ju, where the Japanese were encamped, and after a desperate fight the Japanese were totally defeated, leaving 600 heads in the hands of the victors. A few days later a similar engagement took place with a like result, sixty more heads being taken.

And so it was throughout the country. The Japanese were being worn away by constant attrition; here a dozen, there a score, and yonder a hundred, until the army in Pyeongyang, by no means a large one, was practically all that was left of the Japanese in the peninsula.

Kwon Ryul, the governor of Chul-la Province, said to the provincial general, "If you will remain in Yi-hyun and guard the province I will take 20,000 men and move northward to the capital." He advanced as far as Sa-wun. The Japanese tried to draw him into a general engagement, but he avoided it and kept up a guerilla warfare, cutting off large numbers of stragglers from the Japanese camp. By this means he accomplished the important work of opening up a way to the north, which had been until now closed so that from now on messengers passed freely from the southern provinces to the King.

Travellers up country should always provide themselves with Liebig Company's Extract. It takes up little space and can always be relied on, but be sure it is the Company's signed J. v. Liebig in blue. Lord Roberts, Mr. H. M. Stanley, and Mr. Edward Whymper testify to its unequalled value.

REVIVAL OF CONFUCIANISM IN KOREA.

The Korean Weekly Repository says the following edict has been issued at Seoul:—

Among all the nations of this world there is not one which does not follow the precepts of its honourable and venerated State Religion, for a State Religion comes into existence for the purpose of purifying the minds of men and bringing their actions under government. Why is it that the State Religion of our nation is not in high esteem and is fruitless? Is not our State Religion the cult of Confucius? Whang-chai and Yao-nin inherited the divine commands and rose to the highest pinnacle. Woo tong, Munum, and Chu kung were the heirs of complete and holy doctrines, and the divine precepts. Then came the Master (Confucius), the possessor of the secrets of the universe, who gathered together the teachings of the sages. And his precepts relate to father and son, king and country, husband and wife, elder and junior, friend and friend, and his writings were the books of Odes, History, Changes, Rites, and the Spring and Autumn Annals. The chief thoughts of these books are the illumination of virtue and the renewal of the people. They teach physics, philosophy, morals, psychology, cleanliness of person, order in family, administration of the nation, and the peace of the universe. A literature for all beings and myriads of generations to follow! Outside this religion there are no men and no nations, and all the kings and confucians of history were faithful to it, villains and traitors stood in mortal terror in their schemes.

Then follows a reference to the labours of the various Sages, after which the rise of the cult in Korea is introduced as follows:—

In the time of Kija the foundation was laid and in the time of the Samban it fell into disuse, for the customs of the people were unclean and the doctrine became extinguished.

How comes in the present times have abandoned that begun so long ago and daily fallen away from it, exercise themselves in it with lips and ears only, but with their bodies and their hearts serve a literature of folly, darkening the only science which is real? Even the books of the State Religion are disappearing. If the odes are unsung the schools cannot hear. The holy writings lie abandoned on our desks; officials know only themselves, not the king; the sorrow of the literati in their inability to obtain office; and the waves of covetousness roll high to the very heavens, and every doctrine sweeps the earth; ceremony is in ruins and the precepts lie wounded, and change daily develops and villainous traitors follow in each other's foot-steps, finding a climax in the affair of year sub-mid (1895). Alas, is not this the disaster following the abandonment of the State Religion?

Reason dictates that administration should follow disturbance, and restoration should follow trouble. We have inherited the work of our ancestors and ascended the Throne of kings and saints, and through a hundred troubles and a thousand fears, our one thought has been to establish the State Religion. Our sad thought has been that we might be able to stem the flood and change its drift. The brilliant learning of the Crown Prince was early manifested, and daily his scholarship has advanced so that from now on we and the Crown Prince assume the chief supervision of the Confucian cult, and, illuminating the religion of Kija and Confucius, will bring to pass the will of our royal fathers.

Therefore, all ye officials with care announce this; follow the precepts of the religion and yourselves lead those beneath you. Exalt the rites and teachings, support the customs and achieve a reputation by your earnestness, and increase everywhere devotion to the rites many fold. Use the Confucian Temple College for the development of scholars and scholarship.

The decree ends up with a few general directions relative to the organization of the Sen Shi (Literati).

TELEGRAMS.

(TELEGRAMS RECEIVED AT THE LEGATION OF FRANCE IN TOKYO.)

A FRENCH COLONIAL MAGNATE.

Saigon, May 27.

General Gallieni, Governor of Madagascar, has arrived in Paris. He was received at the station by various delegations.

A GREAT PAINTER'S DEATH.

Rosa Bonheur, the celebrated painter of animals, is dead.

SEÑOR CASTELAR DEAD.

Castelar is dead.

NEGOTIATION WITH FILIPINOS TO CEASE.

President MacKinley has given orders for ceasing the negotiations with the Filipinos.

HONOURS FOR GENERAL GALLIENI.

General Gallieni, Governor of Madagascar, will be entertained at dinner on Monday by the President of the Republic at the Palace of the Elysée, and will then proceed to the home of his family in the Department of Var.

THE FRENCH BUDGET.

The French Senate has passed the Budget, after having subjected it to various modifications which will necessitate its reconsideration by the Chamber of Deputies.

THE DREYFUS CASE.

CIVIL COURT IN FAVOUR OF REVISION.

Saigon, May 28.

The report of the President of the Civil Chamber of the Court of Cassation—written by M. Ballot-Beaupré—is in favour of revision of the Dreyfus case, and of its re-submission to the Council of War.

Saigon, May 29.

The majority of the French journals consider the revision of the Dreyfus case certain.

Saigon, May 30.

To-day M. Ballot-Beaupré, President of the Civil Chamber, reads his report on the application for revision of the Dreyfus case. The interior of the Palais de Justice presents a very animated scene, but is all calm outside. Stringent measures have been adopted to preserve order.

Saigon, May 31.

First Telegram.—The President of the Civil Chamber of the Court of Cassation, M. Ballot-Beaupré, yesterday set forth the arguments of the partisans of revision in the Dreyfus affair; to-day he is setting forth those of its opponents. He affirms, in his soul and conscience, that the borderneau is the work of Esterhazy. This statement caused a prolonged sensation.

The Report of the Civil Chamber is in favour of revision, and of the re-arraignment of Dreyfus before a Court-martial.

M. Manau, Procurator-General, continued his address, demanding the revision of the Dreyfus case.

Second Telegram.—M. Manau, Procurator-General, has commenced his réquisition. He says that it was the borderneau, Esterhazy's work, that led to the condemnation of Dreyfus. The Court has risen.

M. DÉROULEDE ACQUITTED.

The Déroulède affair also comes up for trial in the Assize Court. The hall is crowded. Several of those present gave an ovation to M.M. Déroulède and Habert when they entered the Court. There has not been any incident.

In the Court of Cassation M.M. Déroulède and Habert declared that their intention was to overthrow the parliamentary system. The witnesses for the defense eulogised the accused. There has not been any demonstration, and few persons have had the curiosity to visit the precincts of the Court.

Third Telegram.—The examination of the witnesses in the Déroulède-Habert affair is concluded. Nothing unusual has occurred.

In the Assize Court the Procurator called for the condemnation of M.M. Déroulède and Habert.

Later.

The Assize Court has acquitted M.M. Déroulède and Habert.

[The charge against M. Déroulède is inciting the military to disobedience. The affair occurred on the day of the obsequies of the late President Faure. M. Déroulède, who is a member of the Chamber of Deputies, made an attempt to harangue a regiment of soldiers returning to barracks.—Ed. J. M.]

THE FRENCH BUDGET.

Saigon, June 1.

The French Budget has been definitively voted.

MAJOR MARCHAND.

At Toulon the Authorities gave a brilliant reception to Major Marchand, and the crowd accorded him an ovation.

(FROM THE "JAPAN TIMES.")

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

London, May 27.

A prominent Delegate at The Hague states that, according to the first exchange of views, the Conference is certain to effect something in connection with arbitration and the humanizing of war; but that it is unlikely to effect anything toward disarmament, beyond making recommendations to the Governments represented.

SIR CLAUDE MACDONALD REACHES ITALY.

London, May 29.

Sir Claude Macdonald, British Minister to China, has stopped in Italy to recuperate his health.

Both Sir Julian Pauncefote and M. Georges de Staal have introduced a proposal for a permanent tribunal for arbitration. The idea is making good progress.

THE PHILIPPINE SITUATION.

UNEASINESS AT WASHINGTON.

Uneasiness prevails at Washington, owing to the latest Manila news showing it to be impossible to establish American supremacy without more troops. This involves a fresh call for volunteers despite the unpopularity of the measure.

"THE TIMES" ANTI-RUSSIAN ADVICE.

The Times, reverting to Russian action at Peking, advises the British capitalists to ignore the Russian railway loan which M. de Witte, Russian Minister of Finance, is proposing to raise in London.

THE DREYFUS AFFAIR.

London, May 29.

It is reported that the Judges of the Court of Cassation, sitting over the Dreyfus case, have pronounced in favour of revision and a new trial by Court-martial. The whole Court will undoubtedly endorse the report.

M. Ballot-Beaupré concluded his address to the Court of Cassation by stating that the new fact legally required for the revision was the discovery of two letters of Esterhazy, written on paper identical to that on which is written the borderneau. He finally asseverated that, on his honour and conscience, he has become convinced that Esterhazy wrote the borderneau; and that the honour of the Army does not require the detention of an innocent man at Devil's Island.

MILNER-KRUGER MEETING.

London, May 30.

Sir Alfred Milner has started for Bloemfontein to meet President Kruger. The political circles of the Cape are not sanguine over the success of the meeting.

PLAGUE IN ALEXANDRIA.

Eight cases of the plague are reported from Alexandria, involving four Europeans.

RUSSIAN RAILWAY LOAN.

The Times' St. Petersburg correspondent reports that negotiations have been commenced regarding the Russian railway loan to be raised in England to the extent of 4,500,000 roubles, which, it is believed, are intended as an experiment to test the market.

SUEZ CANAL RECEIPTS.

The report on the Suez Canal states that the receipts for 1898 reached eighty-eight million francs, the largest figures on record, and alludes to the increasing trade between America and Asia.

M. Basanpré, Court Reporter, in his report to the Court of Cassation, strongly insisted on the innocence of Dreyfus, and urged that evidence all pointed to Esterhazy's guilt. The trial has been adjourned.

MARCHAND AT TOULON.

Major Marchand has arrived in Toulon. The authorities and deputations received him with enthusiasm.

The address has caused an immense sensation. The anti-revisionists are dumb-founded and are declaring that Beaupré has been bribed.

AUSTRALIAN FEDERATION.

The final federation referendum in South-Australia stands, 66,000 for and 17,000 against.

DERBY BETTING.

The Derby betting on Tuesday stood at: 2 to 1 on Flying Fox; 5 to 1 against Holocaste; 100 to 8, Oppressor; 20 to 1, Damocles; 40 to 1, My Boy; 50 to 1, Desmond and Innocence; 66 to 1, Scintillant.

MILNER-KRÜGER MEETING.

London, June 1.

Sir Alfred Milner and President Krüger have arrived in Bloemfontein. Official receptions were held in their honour.

RUSSIAN RAILWAY LOAN.

The Russian railway loan amounting to £2,975,000 sterling has been issued in London.

MAJOR MARCHAND INTERVIEWED.

Major Marchand, being interviewed by the Times' correspondent, ridiculed the idea that he contemplated the rôle of Napoleon.

THE DERBY.

The result of the Derby was as follows:

- 1 Flying Fox
- 2 Damocles
- 3 Innocence

THE WAR IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Hongkong, May 22.

Aguineldo's Commissioners met the American Commissioners, when the latter presented a provisional plan for the Government of the Islands when the Filipinos lay down their arms. The President is to appoint a Governor-General, who will appoint the Cabinet. The President will appoint the Judges; and an American or Filipino Advisory Council will be elected by the Filipinos.

SERIOUS ALLEGATION AGAINST THE CANTON VICEROY.

(FROM THE "CHINA MAIL.")

Shanghai, May 19.

It has transpired at Peking that His Excellency Tan, the Viceroy of the two Kwang Provinces, has sent a secret memorial to the Throne in which he eulogises the patriotism and bravery of the Chinamen who attacked the British forces at Taipoh. He says they were filled with the most praiseworthy motives.

The British Chargé d'Affaires has addressed a diplomatic Note on the subject to the Tsung-li Yamen.

As yet, no satisfactory explanation of the Viceroy's duplicity has been vouchsafed by the Chinese Government.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White mates in two moves.

GAME No. 513.

A FINE DEFENCE.

The World's Champion played 30 games simultaneously at Cheltenham, England, winning 24, losing 2, and drawing 4. The following, taken from The B. C. M., is one of the games he lost:—

ALLGAIR-THOROLD GAMBIT.

Notes by James Mason.

- | Lasker. | Col. E. Law. |
|---------------|---------------|
| WHITE. | BLACK. |
| 1—P to K 4 | 1—P to K 4 |
| 2—P to K B 4 | 2—P takes P |
| 3—Kt to K B 3 | 3—P to E Kt 4 |
| 4—P to K R 4 | 4—P to Kt 5 |
| 5—Kt to Kt 5 | 5—P to K R 3 |
| 6—Kt takes P | 6—K takes Kt |
| 7—P to Q 4 | 7—P to Q 4 |
| 8—Kt to B 3 | 8—Kt to K B 3 |
| 9—B takes P | 9—P takes P |

..... Capture of the Pawn may be delayed, but up to and including move 10, on both sides, the opening may be accepted as a model of correctness, in this hazardous game.

- | | |
|----------------|--------------|
| 10—B to B 4 ch | 10—K to Kt 2 |
| 11—B to K 5 | |

Now, however, 11—Q to Q 2, with choice as to Castling, would yield a much more enduring attack. The early exchange of this Bishop is unfavourable; even assuming no further sacrifice of force involved.

- | | |
|-------------|----------------|
| 12—Castles | 11—B to K 2 |
| 13—Q to K 2 | 12—Kt to Q B 3 |

If 13—Kt takes P or 13—Kt to Q 5, the reply might be the same, that is 13..... Kt takes B; and Black's superior force would about as easily assert itself. Anyhow, the attack fails, and the solid difference of the piece remains.

- | | |
|---------------|----------------|
| 14—P takes Kt | 13—Kt takes B |
| 15—K to R sq | 14—Q to Q 5 ch |
| 16—Kt takes P | 15—Q takes P |
| | 16—B to Q 3 |

..... Or 16..... Kt takes Kt; there would be no harm in 17—R to B 7 takes, etc. White could not seriously prolong the contest two pieces behind.

- | | |
|----------------|----------------|
| 17—Kt takes B | 17—Q takes Q |
| 18—B takes Q | 18—P takes Kt |
| 19—Q R to Q sq | 19—Kt to K 5! |
| 20—K to R 2 | 20—B to K 3 |
| 21—R to Q 4 | 21—P to Q 4 |
| 22—P to Q B 4 | 22—Kt to K B 3 |
| 23—P takes P | 23—Kt takes P |
| 24—B takes P | 24—Kt to K 6 |

With this Black makes further gain—wins as a matter of course. Here Lasker might have gracefully resigned.

- | | |
|-----------------|------------------|
| 25—B takes P | 25—Kt takes B ch |
| 26—K to R 3 | 26—K R to K sq |
| 27—B to Q 5 | 27—R to K 2 |
| 28—R to Kt 4 ch | 28—K to R sq |
| 29—R to Kt 6 | 29—K to R 2 |
| 30—R to K B 6 | 30—R to K 6 ch |
| 31—K to Kt 4 | 31—Kt to Q 7 |
| 32—R to Q 6 | 32—Kt to R 5 |
| 33—R to Q 7 ch | 33—K to R sq |
| 34—R to K B 7 | 34—R to K sq |
| 35—K to R 5 | 35—Kt to Q 3 |
| 36—R to Q 7 | 36—K R to K 4 ch |
| 37—K to Kt 6 | 37—R takes B |

And White resigned.

GAME No. 514.

BLINDFOLD CHESS.

Pillsbury, the American Champion, is one of the best blindfold players in the world. A specimen of his brilliancy and far-sightedness is given in the following game.

NOTES.

- (a) If B takes R; 14—Kt to Kt 6 ch, P takes Kt, must; 15—P takes P, mate.
- (b) Startling, but perfectly sound. Think of a man seeing this and what follows, without seeing the board.
- (c) As good as he has, but nothing is good.
- (d) He can't escape mate.

MALAY CHESS.

Mr. Blum gives the Singapore Free Press some interesting notes on Malay chess. He says that the chief points of difference from our game are as follows: The Queen stands always on the right hand of the King. Consequently the board, even if the squares are coloured, can be placed either way, instead of as with us having always a white square to the right; and the White King faces the Black Queen, and vice versa, instead of the Kings and Queens facing each other as in European Chess. This alone is sufficient to throw out all preconceived notions as to the openings. But besides this, the King has certain privileges which he only possesses so long as he has not been checked or moved. It is consequently highly important in the opening not to allow the adversary to check, and what would be in our game a merely useless check and consequently generally waste of time becomes in this game an important manoeuvre. The opening has, therefore, to be, as a rule, on very cautious lines, that the King may not be exposed. The privileges which the unmoved and unchecked King possesses are that he may once move or take as a Knight, and may once move or take over two squares, whether a piece intervenes or not, but only in the direction of a Rook's move, not diagonally. Castling is effected in two moves, and is really not a special privilege as with us, but a consequence of the right of the King to move over two squares, although a piece intervenes. The Rook is moved up next the King, and the latter if unchecked can either at the next move or after other moves leap over the Rook to the square beyond.

Bishops, Knights and Rooks move in the same way as in the European game. So do the Pawns, and they have the right, as with us, of moving two squares on their first move, but there are curious modifications with regard to queening a Pawn. On reaching the eighth rank on the Rook's file the Pawn queens at once; on the Knight's file it has to move back one square diagonally before queening; on the Bishop's file it has to move back two squares and on the King's or Queen's YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, MAY 27TH, 1899.

BIRTH.

At 86, Yokohama, on May 24th, the wife of W. KARL VINCENT, of a Daughter.

MARRIAGE.

At No. 87, Bluff, on Monday, May 22nd, by the Rev. E. C. Irvine and in the presence of J. McLean Esq., U.S. Vice-Consul General, CORNELIA KIWA, third daughter of the late Dr. J. A. C. Geerts, of Yokohama, to FRANCIS S. MAYER of the Japan Herald.

DEATH.

On the 14th of April, at Kronach, Bavaria, FRAU HENRIETTE ENGERT, in her 87th year.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

THE Australians have beaten an All England Eleven by 172.

A JAPANESE Vice-Consulate has been opened at Masanpho, Korea.

DAWSON CITY, Klondyke, has been almost destroyed by fire, and much gold has been lost.

THE Harvard and Yale athletes are to visit England in July in compete with Oxford and Cambridge.

THE half-yearly sale of race ponies by Mr. John W. Hall took place on Thursday. Good prices were realised.

THE Queen's Birthday passed off very quietly in Yokohama. The British Minister (Sir E.

Satow) gave a garden party at the English Legation at Tokyo.

BARON YASUBA YASUKAZU died on the 23rd inst. He was formerly chief of the Hokkaido Administration.

M. P. UL DECHANEL, President of the Chamber of Deputies, has been elected a member of the French Academy.

"MAID MARION" won the first prize (Sir E. Satow's gift) in the sailing race for 39-raters on the Queen's Birthday.

A JAPANESE loan of ten million pounds sterling bearing four per cent. interest and at the price of 90, will be issued next week.

THE Czar has personally appointed a committee to consider the cessation of the transportation of political offenders to Siberia.

AMERICA has offered the Filipinos a government similar to that for the Cubans, having a military character, until the country gets settled.

SOME cases of bubonic plague have occurred at Alexandria, Iunaila, and at Zegazig. Drastic sanitary measures have been adopted.

A FORMOSAN despatch says that the number of cases of plague from the beginning of this year has reached 2,008, with 1,506 deaths.

THE Kaisow, bound for China, which got ashore near Lundy Island, has been floated and is now unloading at Barry (South Wales).

THE Yokohama Spring Regatta was held on Saturday in miserable weather. The English crew easily beat the Germans in the International four.

MANQUIS DAIGO was murdered on Tuesday evening by his nephew Mr. Daigo Kakutaro, who fired two shots of a revolver at him, also severely wounding Miss Kame Daigo.

ON Wednesday a Cabinet Council was held and attended by all the Ministers who were in the capital. Count Matsukata's budget proposals were the chief subject of discussion.

MR. YUGAWA, President of the Tokyo Post and Telegraph Office, and Councillor of the Department of Communications, was on the 20th inst. appointed a Councillor of the Foreign Department.

GRAND-BASSAM has been evacuated in consequence of an epidemic of yellow fever which prevails there. It is probable that the place will cease to be the capital of the French Ivory Coast.

H. I. M. THE EMPEROR is to visit the Central Military Preparatory School on the 29th inst., leaving the palace on 9.30 a.m. On the 31st he will proceed to the Rikugun Keiri Gakko, starting at 10 a.m.

MESSRS. DALLAS and Mungrave's Company have been giving performances every night, their repertoire including "The Sign of the Cross," "The Silver King," "Harbour Lights," "Uncle Tom's Cabin," &c.

A SCHEME for establishing a Higher Commercial School in Osaka is said to be in contemplation by the Department of Education. The Higher Commercial School in Tokyo is able to admit only a part of the candidates.

CONSUL NOZE TATSUO, of Tacoma, has been ordered in Korea. Mr. Otsu, chairman of the Central Tea Dealers' Guild, visited the Foreign Department on Wednesday and petitioned that Mr. Noze should be retained at Tacoma in consideration of his able services in connection with the Canada tea affair.

THE Volkraad has considered President Kruger's franchise reforms. Its tone is unfavourable towards the proposals, as being too liberal, whereas the Uitlanders regard them as absurdly inadequate.

AT midnight, last Saturday, the American liner Paris struck the Manacles Rocks, the scene of the Albatross disaster in October last. Marvellous discipline prevailed and every one of the 780 aboard were saved, and also the mails.

THE President of the French Republic set out on May 22nd with the Prime Minister, M. Dupuy, the Minister of War, and the Minister of Commerce, for Dijon, where the monument erected to the memory of President Carnot was to be unveiled.

THE letter carriers of Paris went on general strike on May 19th, in consequence of a vote of the Senate rejecting an appropriation voted by the Chamber of Deputies for improving their emoluments. They resumed work during the morning. About thirty of them were dismissed or displaced.

SEVERAL bundles of mail matter were found the other day in a barn, belonging to a man living in Higashinokami village, Naka district, Wakayama Prefecture. They bear dates of June, July, and August, 1898, and are supposed to have been thrown away by a lazy letter carrier.

THE President of the French Republic, in a discourse pronounced by him at a banquet given by the Chamber of Commerce at Dijon on May 23rd exhorted the French Chambers of Commerce to defend the export commerce against competition which is increasing from day to day.

THE Peace Conference has assembled, and M. Georges de Staal, Russian Ambassador to England, has been elected President of the Conference. Various speeches were made, eulogising the magnanimous motives of the Czar and hoping that the generous scheme may be realised.

THE Queen's birthday was honoured throughout the world, the Colonial Governors observing the day with levees, banquets, and salutes. President McKinley cabled congratulations in the name of the American people. In the Transvaal, the Volkraad adjourned its sitting in show respect, and salutes were fired.

ON Monday evening, a picture peddler named Yamanaka Kihei (55), living in Fukuicho, Asakusa, attempted to murder his son, named Hashimatsu (27), and the latter's wife with a dagger. He afterwards committed suicide. It appears that the father carried on an illicit intrigue with the woman before her marriage to his son, and he was very jealous of the latter. The husband died, and the woman is reported to be in a precarious condition.

THE Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, Colonial Secretary, speaking in the House of Commons, stated that Sir Alfred Milner, with the British Government's approval, had accepted the meeting with President Kruger at Bloemfontein on the 31st inst., with the view of settling all the pending difficulties and satisfying the demands of Uitlanders.

A SHIZUOKA man named Hattori last month obtained a cheque for one yen on the 35th National Bank. He altered the figure to 8,000 yen, and, coming up to Tokyo, cashed it at the Bank's branch office. The clerk, Fukuhara, who paid the cheque, the forgery of which could be easily detected, has been arrested as implicated in the crime. Four or five other arrests are expected.

RUSSIA AND CHINA.

Sober-minded people will not be at all surprised by the news received on Thursday from Peking, to the effect that no reliance is to be placed in the rumours recently circulated about the Russian Government's having demanded from China a concession for a railway from Newchwang to Peking. We ventured at the time to suggest that the story had no elements of probability, for if Russia entertained such a design yet failed to communicate it to the British Government at the time of making a convention with the latter, she would have stood convicted of plain mala fides; and if she conceived the design immediately after signing the convention, she would have been openly flouting England. It appeared necessary, therefore, to suspend judgment until the exact facts should become known; an attitude of reserve which is now justified, for the telegraph says that no demand was preferred by Russia, nor does she entertain any immediate intention of constructing such a railway. There is no smoke, however, without a fire. Count Muravieff admits that his Government has conveyed to the Tsung-li Yamen an expression of hope that should the necessity for a Liaotung-Peking railway arise in the future, China will give to the project her friendly consideration. What does that signify? We confess that after Count Muravieff's treatment of Sir Nicholas O'Connor, it is impossible to accept any of the Russian Minister's statements without the closest scrutiny. This courteous provision for future contingencies of a remotely hypothetical character is not a wonted trait of Russia's policy in dealing with Oriental countries. She usually says she wants at the moment of wanting it, and takes care to get it immediately. Tentative requests based on motives of pure friendship and relating only to shadowy possibilities still in the lap of the future, are not only a futile species of diplomacy, but also tend to defeat their own purpose by arousing public attention. That is not Russia's way. It is not the way of any resolute Power that knows its own mind. We are bound to say, therefore, that with all the disposition in the world to accept Mr. Muravieff's explanation in the fullest sense, we find that it leaves a great deal to be desired and we venture to predict that the world will see in this railway incident an unsuccessful ballon d'essai. However, it is our pleasant duty to welcome the St. Petersburg assurance as a fresh evidence of Russia's sincere wish to preserve a friendly understanding with Great Britain. All's well that ends well.

The Nippon, always attractively outspoken, believes that Russia had an understanding with the British Government before she advanced her latest claim about a railway to Peking, and that if England has lodged any protest, it is simply because she intends to make the incident a pretext for some demand of her own. In short, the two Powers do not intend to come into collision, and any third Power which sits waiting for the crash, is a fool for its pains. If Russia's scheme of a Peking railway is known to be opposed to the interests of Far-Eastern Asia, why should not Japan alone enter a protest on her own account? Why should she stand idly looking on? And even though the railway be not injurious to the interests of the Far East, it certainly means a great change of conditions. Therefore Japan ought to follow suit by demanding, for example, a concession for the Sôul-Wiju railway in Korea, or for a road in Fuhkien. What would there be wrong in such a step? "People speak of want of ability on the part of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, but it is the Prime Minister that wants ability. He remains sleeping in Kyoto, to the surprise of every-body."

Such are the Nippon's views. But it does not tell us what Japan would do if she obtained concessions for the Sôul-Wiju and the Fuhkien railways. Would she build them? Where could she find the money?

Some time ago that distinguished publicist, Mr. Shimada Saburo, wrote a long series of articles in the Mainichi Shimbun to prove that there is no natural antagonism between the interests of Russia and Japan in Eastern Asia, and that this country is more likely to find itself in collision with England or France than with the Northern Power. To comprehend the "true inwardness" of Mr. Shimada's essay it is necessary to remember that his advocacy of an entente with Russia has its prime motive, not in a desire to see the two countries friends so much as in a wish to bring about a reduction of Japan's armaments. The latter is Mr. Shimada's un-failing purpose, and he promotes it with great ability. Hence one need only consider his pro-Russian proposition a little more closely to perceive that he regards Russian aggression as the peril against which Japan's armaments are directed. If there were no Russian spectre there would be no scheme of armaments expansion. Accordingly, Mr. Shimada sets himself to exorcise the spectre. It is of interest to note that the Nippon taken the same view of Japan's armaments. It concludes that Japan's advance must be in a northerly direction. In the south her attitude is purely defensive. Hence her increase of armaments concern Russia chiefly. The Nippon is nothing if not outspoken. It does not trouble to use diplomatic euphemisms, or think of relying on the reader's power of inference.

YOKOHAMA WATER RATES.

It is stated by vernacular journals that, after the Revised Treaties go into operation, the water rate charged to foreigners in Yokohama will be reduced to the same figure as that imposed in the Japanese town. Under the present system, the foreign rate is assessed at five per cent. of the rental of a house. Thus a building whose rental value is 100 yen a month pays 5 yen annually for its water. But in the Japanese town the charge is by the family. A house pays one yen a month so long as its inmates do not exceed five. For every inmate over that number, an additional 18 sen per head has to be paid.

Of course the consequence of the change would be a considerable diminution in the total amount paid by the foreign community. Firms employing a large number of persons, however, would fare comparatively ill. A newspaper office, for example, with a staff of 25 persons, would have to pay 4.60 yen month. But even that would be less than the present rate.

THE CABINET AND ITS ENEMIES.

There are some indications that credence attaches to the latest rumour circulated in political circles—the rumour that the Opposition, abandoning their anti-Land-Tax tocsin, have determined to make the Cabinet's conduct of foreign affairs their point of attack. Their organs continue to fire broadsides of blank ammunition at Viscount Aoki. They have no substantial ground of complaint whatever. What troubles them is simply that nothing is happening. Of course their persistency will have some measure of success. A mob, if its gaze be directed long enough into the blue sky, can generally discover portents there.

But the other rumour—that the Liberals, disquieted by the contingency of having their own potential thunder stolen by their adversaries, have resolved to give the Cabinet its coup-de-grace through the foreign-policy joint of its armour—that rumour receives no confirmation. Its circumstantial relation by the Mainichi Shimbun is evidently a myth.

Probably in default of some more substantial topic of excitement, two or three of the Tokyo journals have constructed a remarkable story. The Progressists, they say, recognising the futility of attempting to make an effective war cry out of a decayed issue like the Land Tax, have turned their attention to foreign politics, and are organizing a grand campaign in that sphere. This has roused the Liberals also. They think that it will not do to leave their adversaries in possession of such a dangerous weapon, and they have determined to utilize it themselves. One journal professes to publish a verbatim account of the conversation that took place on this subject at a meeting of the Liberal leaders. Of course the statements put into the mouths of Mr. Hoshi Toru and his colleagues are imaginary. It would be waste of space to reproduce them. But their gist is that the time to upset the Cabinet has come; that the Foreign Office is the best point at which to apply the Liberal lever, and that, whatever Marquis Ito may say to the contrary, he will be willing enough to form a new Cabinet when seriously invited to do so. The whole story sounds like a purely mischievous effort to create a sensation. An aggressive foreign policy is about the most objectionable basis on which Marquis Ito could be invited to construct a Ministry.

EVANGELIZATION & EDUCATION.

There have lately appeared in the columns of a Tokyo contemporary several letters from the pen of an Anglo-Saxon writer, advocating the retirement of missionaries from the field of education, and their devotion to the work of evangelization uniquely. It is an interesting subject, and we should have been greatly pleased to read some lucid comparison of the facilities enjoyed by missionaries, and the faculties possessed by them, for propagating Christianity in this country. It has always seemed to us that this question narrows itself to an easily stated issue: are foreign missionaries competent to carry on evangelization in Japanese with any prospect of success proportionate to that which men of equal endowments might expect to achieve in an Occidental country. The answer, we think, must be negative, for the simple reason that only a man born in Japan, and speaking the Japanese language from childhood can possibly hope to use that language eloquently and correctly for preaching purposes. The foreign missionary, as a rule, is full of earnestness, industry and zeal. He applies himself with unflagging diligence to acquire the Japanese tongue, and he succeeds, in a measure. But it is a measure which falls very far short of real proficiency. We have never met a Japanese honestly prepared to say that any foreigner not born and educated in Japan could preach, or speak publicly, in the Japanese language without perpetrating solecisms which deprive his words of all semblance of eloquence. The late Dr. Verbeck had remarkable facility, but he did not constitute an exception to the rule, nor is there a foreigner in Japan to-day, layman or priest, who constitutes an exception. Not one of them could stand up and lecture about ethics and morals in such a manner as to dignify the subject. What follows? Surely this, that until some native Japanese with all the qualities of a winner of hearts appears upon the scene, the work of evangelization must be carried on at a great disadvantage in Japan. Of course if the foreign missionaries chose to educate their sons here, and have them taught the Japanese language as Japanese boys are taught it, there would be a better chance of the need's being satisfied. But there are obvious difficulties in the way of that measure. Meanwhile the missionary himself is greatly crippled for purposes of evangelization, and it is probably because he feels conscious of the fact that he applies so much of his strength in the direction of education. Can there be any better or more rational way of exercising a wholesome moral influence than by instilling high principles into the minds of the young? Is not that a part of the Christian propagandist's duty just as much as the expounding of the gospel? There is no missionary school where secular teaching is the whole programme. The faith which the teachers earnestly profess and uniformly follow creates an atmosphere which the student unconsciously inhales; the example of their lives is an object lesson from which he can not fail to learn something beneficial, and even though he never becomes a professing Christian, he leaves the school a greatly better man than he would have been had these influences been excluded from his education. We believe, and it is the opinion of Japanese with whom we have spoken, that the educational work done by the missionary in Japan greatly furthers the cause of Christianity, or, at any rate, of Christian morality, and that it is sowing seeds which will by and by bear fruit very much richer than the tree of pure evangelization can produce.

THE SHAN-HAI-KWAN RAILWAY.

Telegrams published in Tokyo allege that the Shan-hai-kwan Railway—presumably the Tientsin-Shan-hai-kwan line—has barely escaped being appropriated by the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, owing to the Directors' failure to pay up the interest on the railway's debt to the Bank. It is thought, however, that the removal of Cheung Yik from office will close the episode.

JAPANESE JUSTICE.

Yokohama can not always claim the credit of being original but occasionally it attains high distinction in that line. For example. A little more than a fortnight ago, the Japanese and foreign members of the British Inns of Court held their first annual meeting in Japan, and a number of speeches were delivered, many of them in the Japanese language. To translate these speeches into English, to have the translations verified and to collect the whole for publication was a matter of considerable labour, necessarily involving some delay; but ultimately the whole report was handed to the Japan Times, with a request that it would distribute proofs at as early a date as possible to the principal Yokohama newspapers. The Japan Times complied with the request. To the editor of this journal in Tokyo it sent slips on the night before its own publication, and they were doubtless forwarded to the other Yokohama journals at the same time. Of course that meant that the Japan Times was an issue ahead of its contemporaries, but it is a recognised privilege that the journal which first receives an item of news should be the first to publish it. Up to this point the story is very tame and commonplace, but here comes in the fine display of originality alluded to above. One of the Yokohama journals, on receiving the proofs of the report, commented on the fact thus:—

We have been favoured by the Japan Times with proofs of what appears this morning in its pages, but feel no inclination to reprint news so stale. Moreover, since the press is excluded from these gatherings of the Association, what guarantee is there as to the genuineness of reports furnished we know not by whom? Such tactics appear to us to be decidedly objectionable, and should be dealt with accordingly. If an exclusive privilege was given to the Japan Times,—a Japanese-owned and edited journal—of having a reporter present, or if a report was furnished to it only, such partial conduct we may be permitted to say, affords small prospect of that impartiality towards aliens which is promised to be exercised in the administration of Japanese courts, for it is to be remembered, that amongst those present were several Japanese lawyers who as well now or (sic) hereafter, will occupy the position of Judges on the Japanese bench, in whose proceedings whether as plaintiffs, defendants, or prisoners, aliens will necessarily be more or less interested.

When we speak of the very fresh originality of the above, we do not, as might be supposed, allude to the remarkable forecast contained in the last sentence about "Japanese lawyers who as well now or hereafter, will occupy the position of Judges on the Japanese Bench, in whose proceedings whether as plaintiffs, defendants, or prisoners, aliens will necessarily be more or less interested." It will not be altogether a novelty to find judges on the Japanese bench figuring as defendants or prisoners, but few of us would have had the courage to predict such a fate for the gentlemen whose after-dinner eloquence formed the subject of the report in question. Passing that by, however, the really striking novelty is the contention that to furnish a report in M.S. to one journal only, asking it to send printed slips to its local contemporaries, is, in the impartial, concise, and elegant language of the complaining journal, "conduct which affords small prospect of that impartiality towards aliens which is promised to be exercised in the administration of Japanese Courts." A large vista is opened up by this doctrine. Every body furnishing a piece of intelligence to one journal, is bound, at the risk of being convicted of partiality, to prepare as many copies of the item as there are newspapers in Tokyo and Yokohama, and to forward one to each journal simultaneously. That is a splendid exposition of the rights of newspapers. It would work excellently in London, for example. Even in Tokyo, where there are a score and a half of dailies, the task of the distributor of news would assume formidable dimensions. Yokohama is already very long-suffering. Merchants, firms, companies and societies patiently go on, year after year, advertising in and subscribing to several newspapers which circulate among almost the same clientele, and whose columns, as a general rule, differ from each other only in the nature of their borrowings from European and American exchanges. The theory of the ordinary advertiser is that he wants to secure publicity for the thing advertised, but the theory in Yokohama, if we may judge from the practice, is that the prime purpose of advertisements is to support the journals in which they are published. Thus the newspaper, instead of being a useful and necessary medium, becomes a pensioner on the community's charity. That is a novelty in its line, but the latest doctrine is still more novel, namely, that a private person, or group of private persons, must not exercise the smallest discrimination among journals, but must regard them all as equally eligible media of publication. We should find such claims more amusing did they not threaten to convert journals into public nuisances instead of public servants.

ASSASSINATION OF MARQUIS DAIGO.

A very sad affair occurred in Tokyo on the evening of the 23rd instant, at 7 o'clock. It involved the death of Marquis Daigo and the wounding of his eldest daughter, Miss Kame. In 1874, the then representative of the family, Daigo Chiukoku, died without legitimate issue, and the succession was given to his younger brother, Daigo Chiukei, the late Marquis. By that arrangement an illegitimate son of Chiukoku, Daigo Kakutaro, found himself passed over, and the fact seems to have rankled perpetually in his breast, especially since, being a dissipated kind of person, he often incurred debts which his uncle showed reluctance to discharge. Such reluctance was indeed very natural, for the Daigo family is far from wealthy, and the appointment which the late Marquis held as Lord in Waiting of the Golden-Pheasant Chamber of the Palace constituted an important source of revenue to him. Mr. Daigo Kakutaro had always been on bad terms with his uncle, the Marquis, and they often engaged in vehement discussions on the subject of the family property. One of these discussions took place on Tuesday evening, and Kakutaro became so exasperated that he lost control of himself, seized a pistol, and shot the Marquis through the head. Death was instantaneous. Miss Kame, who tried to interfere in the cause of peace, was severely wounded by a second shot from the same pistol, but whether the weapon was aimed at her or whether she received the bullet accidentally in her attempt to save the life of the Marquis, remains to be ascertained. She is said to have been shot through the lungs, and her recovery is regarded as very doubtful.

A NEW SYSTEM OF STENOGRAPHY FOR JAPAN.

One of the most remarkable facts in connexion with the establishment of parliamentary institutions in Japan was that a staff of competent stenographers were found ready to report the proceedings verbatim from the very beginning. No official attempt had been made to encourage phonographic studies, but for years a number of earnest students had been working under circumstances of no small difficulty and discouragement, and when the time came they were prepared to do for Japan what no country had previously been able to accomplish, namely, to give her a verbatim record of her Diet's proceedings from the moment of its opening. It had been supposed by foreigners that great perplexity would attend the elaboration of a system of short-hand suited to the Japanese language, but the Japanese themselves did not shrink from the task, and that they succeeded fairly well has been proved by the practice of the past nine years. It would have been too much to expect, however, that anything like perfection would be attained at an initial attempt. Improvements were certain to be effected, and it is for the purpose of referring to what appears to be a greatly improved system that we write this note. Mr. Edward Gauntlett has just published a "Complete Exposition of a System of Phonetic Shorthand for the Japanese Language," devised by him after six years' labour. This exposition is by way of preliminary only. The book itself will appear about September next, the Japanese edition published by the Kyōbunkwan, the English by Messrs. Kelly & Walsh, Yokohama. Mr. Gauntlett's system is an adaptation of Sir Isaac Pitman's. It introduces every feature of the latter, such as half-length and quadruple letters, initial and final circles, hooks and loops, &c., and with the exception of one rule no form seems to be used which is not found among Pitman's devices. But, although Pitman's excellent system is taken as a basis, the credit of adapting it to the Japanese language belongs entirely to Mr. Gauntlett, and the achievement is not to be under-estimated, for Mr. Gauntlett has succeeded in elaborating a method which is demonstrably far superior to that now in use among the Japanese. Thus, among the various devices for securing simplicity may be mentioned a rule by which such words as kareru, kureru, torareru and shiraseru can be represented by signs more simple than a small i without the dot. Again, there is a rule by which such expressions as sō de arima sho, heredomo, hasanakereba, narimasenu, &c., may be written as briefly as a small n, and that without the least danger of illegibility. Further words having shi, ku or chi for second or third syllables—as katachi, moshi, &c.—are obtained with remarkable ease, and we find that contractions for common phrases and words are logically formed so as to be easily remembered. Thus sasa stands for sama-dama, inamo for itsu made mo, and so on. Japanese syllables are shorter than English, and it is consequently difficult to make an exact comparison of the labour applying to the different stenographic systems; but, taking a passage of 300 syllables of English shorthand—reporting style—from the Phonetic Journal, we find that Pitman's system requires 334 pen movements, whereas the new Japanese system needs only 301. The comparison becomes very striking, however, when it lies between Mr. Gauntlett's system and the systems already used in Japan. Thus the last passage of shorthand given in Waka-bayashi's Manual contains 404 pen movements, whereas the same words are represented in Mr. Gauntlett's manual by 243 movements, and the last piece in Minamoto's manual contains 293 movements, against 167 according to Gauntlett's method. These facts are sufficient to demonstrate the great advantages of the new system. We should think that it can not fail to prove an immense advantage to Japanese reporters.

STREET IMPROVEMENT IN TOKYO.

This heading must not be read as signifying the repair of the cruelly bad streets with which Tokyo is now afflicted, or even the introduction of some ordinarily scientific method of road-making. It refers solely to one of those colossal schemes which the citizens of the sleepy capital must long ago have learned to regard as belonging to the "dream-land Tokyo" traced in the air some 15 years ago by certain visionaries. Just two and a half years ago, a committee was appointed by the Municipality to compile a programme of street improvement, and it has now submitted its report. The first thing recommended is that the City should proceed to purchase land for the purposes of the programme. On that operation a sum of 20 million yen is to be expended, and a similar sum on removing the houses from the routes of the new or widened streets. Thereafter, road repairing would be undertaken to the extent of 950,000 yen; drainage to the extent of 920,000, bridge-building to the extent of 4 million yen; park-making to the extent of 3½ millions, and the construction of markets and crematoriums to the extent of 4½ millions. Against this total outlay of 53,870,000 yen, the Committee suggests a state grant of 20 millions; a city loan of 10 millions; rent from lands, markets and crematoriums, 8½ millions, and certain rates and charges making up the remainder. It is a 20 years' project, and if carried out, it would mean a great improvement in the dimensions and directions of the streets. But surely what Tokyo urgently needs is not wider roads or new roads but better roads? This building of magnificent castles in the air for people who are grovelling in mud and ruts, seems comically unpractical. Tokyo will presently be called the City of Empty Talk.

The Tokyo City Assembly has not carried out the ill-advised project recently attributed to it. Meeting on the afternoon of the 28th instant, it decided to postpone sine die the proposal for sending a committee to Europe and America to inspect municipal affairs in the principal Occidental cities. On the other hand, a sum of 3,600 yen for preparing a harbour-construction plan was voted mem. con.

There seems to be at length a prospect of that most protracted enterprise, the Tokyo Water Works, being completed. The new iron pipes have been completely laid in the Nihon-Bashi, Asakusa, and Kanda districts of the city, but elsewhere a great deal remains to be done. The Municipal Authorities are said to be pressing forward the work with the intention of getting it completely finished by the end of this year. During the month of June all the rest of the pipes will arrive, it is expected. The work of laying them will probably be finished in the Kyōbashi district in June; in the Hongo and Fukagawa districts in July, and in the Shiba and Azabu districts in August.

ITALY AND CHINA.

It is difficult to credit the telegrams received from Peking with reference to Italy's attitude. She is said to be asking for mining and railway concessions in lieu of the San-mun lease, and her new Representative is reported to have been supplied with the materials for a very effective demonstration in the shape of five or six war-ships. But, if Italy is going to work in that manner, why was the Chevalier de Martino disavowed? If concessions for digging mines and constructing railways are now to be sought at the mouth of the cannon, M. de Martino did not then misrepresent the sentiment of his Government when he preferred an ultimatum about San-mun. It appears to us that Italy would be acting in a wiser and more dignified manner if she kept her war-ships out of sight in these matters. She is not going to resort to force. That is tolerably certain. She has no grievance calling for redress at China's hands, and she is far too civilized to think of using the sword to wrest from a friendly Power privileges of a purely money-making character. Besides, she has no right to ask for such privileges in her national character. She may instruct her Minister in Peking to support the proposals of an Italian syndicate or company asking for this or that special concession, but she is not entitled to demand that any commercial or industrial privilege should be granted to her qua Italy. We want some further particulars before forming a conclusion.

FIGHT BETWEEN CHINESE AND JAPANESE IN HAWAII.

News from Hawaii shows that the Japanese arrested in the sequel of the recent disturbance have been found guilty, with one exception. Of the 23 men apprehended, five have been convicted of manslaughter, 17 of combining to disturb the peace, and one has been acquitted for lack of evidence. The arrests were made indiscriminately at the time of the fracas, and it is consequently supposed that some of those seized had not actually taken part in the fight. On the other hand, some of those that did take part probably escaped. Three of the Chinese were killed and sixteen wounded, whereas only one Japanese suffered any injury. Public opinion was therefore on the side of the Chinese, and they, being, of course, much enraged, left no stone unturned to bring about a conviction. Japanese correspondents suggest that, under such circumstances, even the innocent could scarcely hope to escape, but impartial persons are not likely to endorse that idea. Mr. W. O. Smith, formerly Minister of Justice, conducted the case for the Chinese, and Mr. Robertson appeared for the defence, receiving a fee of $1,500.

"THE LONDON LETTER."

The long-expected London Letter has made its appearance. It is conducted by Mr. Algeron Locker and Mr. Stafford Ransome, its politics are "Palmerstonian," and it has for special purpose the discussion of affairs relating to British subjects all the world over, not merely to those residing in the "tight little island." The contents of the first number are highly interesting, the style of the writing is attractive and forcible, the type is large and clear, and the general get up of the journal is thoroughly modern. Among its attractions is a pictorial "Gallery of Greater Britons." The first picture of the series is a beautiful engraving of Philip's celebrated painting, "Lord Palmerston addressing the House of Commons in 1860." If the succeeding pictures are of equal quality, it will be well worth while to collect the whole for ultimate binding together in an album.

In the opening number of the new weekly we find the first of a series of letters from "John Downright," under the heading "A Revised China." The writer, as his name suggests, advocates an uncompromising policy. He lays down the following postulates:—

1. The Chinese Administration is corrupt and rotten to the core, and is incapable of governing the country.
2. The only method of making China abide by her international contracts is force.
3. The Russians are in the process of absorbing Northern China, and, in measure as they do so, British influence at Peking suffers increasingly.
4. We do not see our way to stopping Russian aggression as far as land fighting is concerned.
5. We cannot make any compact with Russia which would be worth the paper it was written on.
6. There must come a day when Russian aggression will have made the influence of that country paramount with the Chinese Government unless steps are taken to counteract that influence.
7. Russian influence on China is pernicious in that it is neither of a civilizing nature nor embraces the "open door" policy.

On the basis of the above "John Downright" maintains that the only sound plan is to do away with Peking as a political centre, transfer the capital to Nanking, reduce the size of China by lopping off from it the provinces north of the Yellow River, and form a strategical and commercial alliance with America and Japan for the conservation of the reduced empire. The allies should then draw up a scheme for the reform of China, submit it to the Chinese Government, and, if the latter declined to accept it, the alternative would be to notify the world that the existing Chinese Government no longer had the recognition of the allies, to proceed forthwith to transfer the capital to Nanking, to organize a Government with progressive Chinese and with "a brand new Emperor, if necessary," to declare the new Government under the temporary protection and control of the allied Powers, to inform the world that the revised China consisted of the whole of the country bounded by the Yellow River on the north, the Tonquin-Burmese frontiers on the South, and Tibet on the west, and to hand over Korea to Japan, on the conditions that she should keep a sufficient territorial army there to protect it, and that she should maintain the open door. As for the portion of Northern China beyond the Yellow River, such of it as has not yet been absorbed by Russia should be considered a buffer State and left to the control of the existing authorities.

We content ourselves with giving the outlines of this scheme, and with making one comment on it, that it would drive the Manchu Dynasty into the arms of Russia and would practically be an invitation to the latter to absorb the whole of the trans-Hwang-ho territory.

DEATH OF BARON YASUBA.

Baron Yasuba Yasukazu, who had been for some time under treatment in the Red Cross Hospital for heart disease, expired on the 23rd instant at 3.40 p.m. The deceased nobleman served for a long time as Governor of Fukuoka Prefecture, where he gained a high reputation for administrative ability. He was subsequently appointed Governor of Aichi, but soon resigned and entered the newly formed National Unionist Party. The year before last, when the Matsukata Cabinet was in power, Baron Yasuba served as Chief of the Hokkaido Administration, but when the Okuma Ministry came into office, he ceased to be Governor and became a member of the House of Peers. Just before his death, he was raised by the Sovereign to the First Class of the Third Official Grade, and received the First Class of the Sacred Treasure.

"THE TIMES" CORRESPONDENT IN TOKYO.

A Yokohama English journal contains an explicit statement to the effect that a letter on Japanese finance recently published by the London Times from its Tokyo correspondent was written under instructions from the Japanese Government. We are asked by The Times' correspondent to give this statement a most emphatic and unequivocal denial. Neither the Japanese Government, nor any member of the Japanese Government, had the remotest knowledge of the letter in question prior to Reuter's telegram announcing its appearance. The Yokohama journal had nothing except its own vague conjectures to guide it, yet, on the strength of such guidance, it did not hesitate to publish an unreserved statement of fact with the object of injuring this country's credit as far as possible in the eyes of foreign financiers.

MR. YAMADA'S PHILOSOPHY.

In a column of Sendai news published in this issue we refer to a lecture delivered by Mr. Yamada, of the Second High School, and quoted him as having commented on Shaka's declaration, "In the heaven above or the earth beneath, I alone am worthy of honour." On closer inquiry we find that Mr. Yamada's explanation of this somewhat startling declaration is that the ware, or ego, indicated by the founder of Buddhism is not the individual Shaka Muni, but a spiritualized and purified ego, which Shaka shares with all good men. Hence the words can not be construed as self-glorification. They are a glorification of the spiritual essence which pervades all things, and which, according to Buddhist pantheistic belief, is the principal element of the universe; in fact, the element upon which its very existence depends. Thus the ego of the universe is an entity composed of the spiritualized remnants of all the good men that have ever lived.

SELECTED RELICS OF JAPANESE ART.

A Buddhist Society, calling itself the Nippon Bukkyo Shimbi Kyokai, advertises an enterprise of considerable magnitude. It is the publication of an elaborate art album, containing photographs of the finest objects of art in the various Buddhist temples throughout the empire. It is to be a serial publication, 20 volumes in all, each volume containing 30 pictures, and one being issued every four months. It appears, therefore, that 80 months, or 6½ years, must elapse before the series is completed. The projectors promise that the specimens shall cover the whole period from Suiko to Tokugawa, and they claim that the best connoisseurs in Japan have been engaged to select and describe the objects represented. Each plate is to be accompanied by an explanatory note, setting forth the history, measurement, author, owner, date, and so on. Copies printed on paper are to be £1.11s. each, and those printed on silk, £3 each, but, by subscribing for the whole series, a single payment of £27 will procure the paper album, and a single payment of £53 the silk. Payments have to be made in advance, and it is promised that only 1,000 copies shall be printed. We further learn from the prospectus that the compilation of an elaborate history of art and religion is contemplated, and that it will appear as a supplement on the completion of the series.

This is a fine enterprise. We refer to it in detail with the hope of promoting its success, but we desire our readers to understand that we are entirely without knowledge of the promoters or the publishers. Moreover, we venture to hope that if a history of Japanese art and religion is really to be written, the task will be entrusted to people more familiar with English than the compilers of the prospectus appear to be. The temerity of the Japanese in the matter of publicly using foreign languages is astounding. Newspapers, magazines, prospectuses, circulars, and advertisements are perpetually published in a language professing to be English, but so disfigured by grammatical and syntactical solecisms as to render the writers ridiculous. Nothing of the kind happens in any other country, and we can not be surprised that foreigners, observing these rash essays, should be puzzled to determine whether the Japanese are singularly lacking in discernment, or exceptionally rich in self-confidence.

CHRISTIANITY AND BUDDHISM.

The notion is not new that one of Christianity's notable achievements in Japan has been to rouse Buddhism from its lethargy. That paradox was originally propounded in these columns, and has been frequently adopted by other writers. Buddhism's history in Japan is not creditable. It has been an open defier of the law, a political intriguer, a relayer on the sword rather than on the sutras, a stirrer up of strife and sedition. That it has also been a grand civilizing influence can not be denied, but, on the other hand, the civilization promoted by itself has always been fatal to its vitality. Under the Tokugawa Regents the favour enjoyed by it destroyed its morale. When Christianity came in the train of modern foreign intercourse it found the Buddhist pleats sunk in idleness and self-indulgence, and it galvanized them into wholesome activity. It is interesting to find that the fact being recognised by the Yiji Shimpō, leads our contemporary to regret the decadence of Christianity in Japan. For the Yiji thinks that Christianity is decadent. Considering that, whereas large sums have been expended by the propagandists of the Nazarene's creed, and untiring labour has been devoted to the cause by sincere and able men, the results are insignificant; and considering also that the Government is disposed to differentiate fatally against missionary schools by denying to their scholars the privilege of exemption from conscription, the Yiji concludes that Christianity has suffered a serious check (ichitonsa), and foresees that, so soon as the vitalizing influence of the foreign faith's competition is withdrawn, Buddhism will sink into its former state of lethargy. Japan will then be in the eminently perilous condition of a nation that has lost its old canons of morality without getting anything in their place. We disagree with the Yiji in one respect. Christianity has not suffered any defeat. If it is to be excluded from the sphere of education, so also is Buddhism. On an equal footing of competition, we have not the slightest doubt about the victor.

It does not appear that the Buddhists who advocate State recognition of their faith are likely to obtain much support from the vernacular press. Every journal that has hitherto commented on the matter denounces the idea. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun, in a leading article, contends that the Constitution and the Treaties guarantee religious freedom, and since the Christian converts—whom our contemporary estimates at the very low figure of 120,000—enjoy such a right, they are entitled to just the same measure of protection and liable to just the same degree of supervision as any other religionists in the empire. If the principle advocated at the recent meeting in Kyoto were carried into practice, if Buddhism were made the State religion, it would become a political weapon, and its supporters would be in a position to exclude other creeds. Any politicians who enter into agreements with religionists, and make the exclusion of alien religions a political question, will be opposed by the Nichi Nichi to the bitter end.

SOUL-CHEMULPO RAILWAY.

The organization of the Kejin (Soul-Chemulpo) Railway Company—a partnership, not a joint stock, company—has now been completed. Mr. Shibusawa Eiichi seems to have been the principal promoter, and the head office is in his Kabuto-cho residence. The total capital is 2,525,000 yen, of which 1,800,000 yen represents the sum already advanced by the Specie Bank, and 725,000 yen is the working fund. The following gentlemen have put up 62,500 yen each:—Baron H. Iwasaki, Mr. S. Imamura, Mr. K. Okura, Mr. H. Nakamigawa, Mr. S. Uryu, Mr. Z. Yasuda, Mr. T. Masuda, Baron T. Mitsui, Mr. H. Shoda, and Mr. E. Shibusawa. The following have put up 20,000 yen each: Messrs. R. Hara, K. Otani, M. Mayejima, and J. Matsumoto. It would thus appear that the money advanced by the Specie Bank is to remain on loan.

POLICY OF THE HEAD QUARTER STAFF.

There is a curious article in the Keisai Zasshi about the policy of the Head Quarter Staff. We gather that the writer is induced to publish his views in consequence of the death of Viscount Kawakami. In short, he addresses himself to the new Chief of Staff. His general thesis is that the bases of the country's strategy are reprehensibly narrow and timid. For example, he claims that at the time of the construction of the Mito Railway, the Staff officers insisted on the piercing of a tunnel instead of the building of a viaduct, their contention being that the former can be rendered useless to an enemy much more easily than the latter. Such an argument is denounced by him as foully pusillanimous, for the chances of an enemy's penetrating to Mito are too remote to be seriously considered. Then again the original scheme of a Tokaido Railway was changed for an inland route in deference to strategical arguments, which were with difficulty overcome. In the third place, the Head-Quarter Staff opposes the opening of Tokyo harbour to foreign ships on the ground that the capital should not be brought within range of strange men-of-war, and opposes also the removal of the moats surrounding the city because they might prove useful defences. If ever the day comes to give practical thought to such contingencies, Tokyo will be past defence. Besides, if the Kannonaki forts are intended to prevent vessels from approaching Tokyo, they will equally serve to keep war-ships away from Yokohama, and the latter should therefore be closed. The Keisai's final criticism is the scheme of military expansion, which is condemned as the outcome of Russo-phobe unreason.

IMPORT DUTIES.

The Custom returns are not coming up to the estimates formed by the Government when compiling the Budget for the current year. The revenue put down in the Budget was 16 million yen, or an average of 1½ million yen per month. The actual figures for the first 3 months of the year were:—

	Total Imports. yen .	Duties Collected. yen .
January	13,810,918	586,758
February	10,584,696	511,775
March	16,529,115	845,763
April,.....	14,000,000 (approx.)	600,000 (approx.)

It is evident that, unless some marked change occurs, the total revenue collected will not exceed 10 million yen, and there will be a shortage of 6 millions. Of course, the effects of the large importations made at the close of last year in anticipation of the increased tariff has not yet worn off, but there is ground for uneasiness, none the less, as the Hochi Shimbun observes.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

From Tientsin the Chiao Shimbun has received a telegram, attributed to a trustworthy source, to the effect that the Emperor of China is dead. There have been so many false rumours in that sense that no credence can be placed in this latest edition.

A telegram dated at the Hague on the 18th instant says that the Legislature of the Netherlands has endorsed the Administration's proposal that Japanese visiting the Netherlands India shall be treated exactly like Dutch subjects. An honourable decision. Holland's liberal action in this matter contrasts very favourably with the narrow policy of certain other civilized nations.

A telegram from the Japanese Consul in Shanghai speaks of the extension of the Settlement as virtually an accomplished fact. The Consuls of the various nationalities long ago preferred a request for an extension, and the Taotai submitted it, with his endorsement, to Peking, where it received the approval of the Tsung-tsi Yamén. On the 23rd instant, the Taotai issued a proclamation announcing the extension.

Intelligence from Lyons under date of April 20th says that the production of silk-worm's eggs in Europe is from 10 to 20 per cent. greater this year than it was last season, but that French sericulturists in districts injured by late frosts, apprehensive that the supply of mulberry leaves in the Italy would be deficient, reduced the quantity of eggs raised, or threw away the worms in many cases. It is added, however, that the business of sericulture is going on successfully in Italy and France.

Telegrams published in Tokyo announce that the Hyogo Bank suspended payment on the 23rd instant. The Hyogo Bank is one of the petty concerns that do not deserve the appellation they bear. It commenced business in January, 1889, with a total capital of 100,000 yen and a paid-up capital of 60,000. A bank with a working capital of six thousand pounds sterling is a novelty. The reason assigned for suspension is that the organization of the Bank wants re-modelling. Very likely. The sooner these Lilliputian banks pass out of existence the better.

We observe with some surprise that among all the Tokyo newspapers the Nichi Nichi Shimbun alone publishes an article with reference to the Queen's Birthday and Her Majesty's attainment of her eightieth year. The Nichi Nichi takes for its theme "The English Queen-Empress' Eightieth Birthday;" speaks in glowing terms of the blessings that have attended Her Majesty's rule, as well as of the great prosperity enjoyed throughout her dominions, and prays for a prolonged continuance of her beneficent sway and for the constant increase of British greatness.

Prince Ranjitsinhji's wonderful prowess as a batsman has evidently given a great impetus to cricket in India. The Maharajah of Patiala engaged, some time ago, certain English professionals to teach the noble game to his people, and it is announced that a team from India will visit England next year. The team will include Dr. M. E. Pavri, who is expected to play for Kent this season; Mistri, who is said to be a better batsman than "Ranji;" and a formidable bowler, Rajagopalcharri. London journals are already beginning to speculate what name English crowds will give to this bowler. We imagine it will be "Go-it Paul."

It is stated that the autumn manoeuvres will take place this year in November, and that the place will be the Nasuno plains, near Utsunomiya. The troops engaged will be divided into two armies, the southern and the northern. The former is to consist of the Imperial Guards and the First Division—in other words, the garrison of Tokyo; the latter, of the Second Division (Sendai) and the Eighth Division (Awamori). Lient-General Hasegawa is expected to take command of the southern army, but the commander of the northern army is not yet nominated. The Emperor will be present, as usual.

A garden party has come to be the orthodox method of celebrating Her Majesty's Birthday at the British Legation in Tokyo, and there was no departure from the custom this year, except that the routine of amusements was varied by dancing on the sword. Not many people, however, showed much zest for that pastime. The great majority preferred to stroll about, or watch the juggling and tumbling performances of a troupe of Japanese experts. Exquisite weather favoured the occasion, and the presence of H.M.S. Victorious band contributed to the national character of the celebration. Refreshments were served in a large tent, sufficiently spacious to accommodate the whole of the guests without any inconvenience.

Public attention is beginning to be attracted to the subsidy paid to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha on account of navigation in domestic waters. The subsidy is 880,000 yen, a figure obtained originally by taking ten per cent. of the Company's capital, which is an unusual, but not irrational, method of calculation. The term of the subsidy expires on the 31st of next March, and for that reason people are beginning to talk about it. There is apparently some disposition to contend that instead of granting a lump sum, the allowance should be made with reference to each of the Company's services. Certainly that would be the more natural method, provided that the total be not reduced. Eighty-eight thousand pounds for carrying the mails to all the principal ports in Japan is assuredly not a large rate of compensation, and it is impossible for the country to have a good mercantile marine if ship-owners are unable to look forward with any certainty to a continuance of the terms on which their services were organised originally.

A curious episode has just occurred in the journalistic world of Tokyo. On the 24th instant, the Yomiuri Shimbun published an article discussing Russia's new project of a railway to Peking, and predicting that this railway was destined to become one of the factors of China's overthrow. In the course of the article the Emperor of Russia was described as musho muchi, that is to say, "without brains and without ability." On the following day, the Yomiuri made a very full apology for this rudeness to a foreign potentate, as it certainly was bound to do. But it added an explanation of a somewhat surprising character. It declared that the fault lay with the type-setters, who had substituted the ideograph mu (無) for sen (全), thus converting the writer's expression "fully endowed with brains and ability" into "without brains and without ability." Composers have been known to play strange tricks out of malice, and had the Yomiuri Shimbun's explanation stopped there, there would have been nothing very remarkable in the incident.

But it went on to say that the mistake had escaped the proof-reader also. Such an ensemble of accidents constitutes a most singular episode of newspaper history.

Our readers are aware that a member of the staff of the Nippon recently visited Count Okuma, and in the course of an interesting interview the Count referred to the present Representative of the United States in Tokyo as endorsing the view that the Chinese empire is "all right;" that it possesses capacities and characteristics which render its disruption impossible, and that no Western Powers could hope to establish control over the teeming millions of the vast district. This remarkable utterance, having been translated into the columns of the Japan Times, induced the Kokumin Shimbun to approach Mr. Buck, with the result that his Excellency expressed much surprise at the opinion attributed to him. He could give no explanation except the hypothesis that his words had been erroneously interpreted. So far from declaring China to be "all right" he had suggested rather that she was all wrong, and that her condition inspired much uneasiness. As a mere matter of theory, we are not entitled to accept the Kokumin's version in preference to the Nippon's, but the former certainly sounds more credible than the latter.

A SCANDAL.

The Yoroku Choho and the Chiao Shimbun publish a scandalous story of the grossest character, the principal actor in which is a former Cabinet Minister who is also a prominent member of the Diet and was once his country's representatives at a foreign Court. We refrain, of course, from giving the particulars of the affair or the name of the gentleman concerned, and, indeed, if the tale rested on the authority of the Yoroku alone, it would not receive much credence. But the added testimony of the Chiao is not without significance. It will be interesting to see what steps are taken by the ex-Minister. If he suffers such a tale to pass without refutation or denial, the public can not choose but condemn him—that is to say, the foreign public, for there seems to practically no limit to the licence that the Japanese public allows to the press.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.

Sinister predictions have recently been based by certain vernacular newspapers on the excess of imports over exports since March last. For example, comparing the March and April returns, it is found that the exports of the principal staples declined as follows:—

	March.	April.
	Yen	Yen
Raw Silk	2,120,000	1,490,000
Habutaya	1,240,000	720,000
Cotton Yarn	2,890,000	1,960,000
Copper	1,100,000	920,000

The Fiji Shimpō, however, points out with much truth that the export trade is always comparatively small during the first half of the year. Even in 1892, when the exports for the whole year exceeded the imports by 10,770,000 yen, the imports showed an excess during May. It may therefore be reasonably expected that the second half of the year will redress the balance to some extent at all events.

ARMAMENTS AND DIPLOMACY.

"Is something striking to be done in foreign politics, or are the country's armaments to be reduced? One or the other of these two courses must be taken. The ostensible reason assigned for expanding the armaments was the inception of an active foreign policy. It was pre-empted that the tame submission made to the three Powers in the matter of Liaotung had been necessitated by insufficiency of armaments. It was further alleged that the same cause must be held responsible for Japan's inaction in the face of China's partition by foreign States. But we can not tell how the conditions of Western countries will have changed before Japan's armaments are complete. * * * To go on keeping a great force of men with the Colours, as is done to-day can not be a wise course. Is the battle to be joined forthwith, or is a minatory attitude to be assumed? Whatever is done should be done quickly. Otherwise the national resources will be exhausted." Such is the Nippon's way of thinking. It is a fine example of statesmanship!

NEGISHI HOSPITAL.

The year just closing has been one of the best in the history of this hospital, which was opened nine years ago by the Fojia Jisenkai (Japanese Women's Benevolent Society) especially for the benefit of poor women and children. The report—abbreviated—is as follows:—

In patients: free, 66; paying, 47	113
Out patients: free, 64; paying, 620	684
Number of patients visited in homes	257
Financial Statement.
Expenses of Hospital	Yen. 1,195.24
Receipts:—	Yen.
Jisenkai Japanese Members	240 —
Jisenkai Foreign Members	56 —
Paying patients	473.38 —
Donation, Dr. Kelsey	425.86 —
	1,195.24 1,195.24

The hospital, though hampered by lack of funds and able to support but two beds for charity patients, is not in debt.

The Resident Physician, Miss Sudo, M.D., graduated two years ago from a Cincinnati Medical College. The Jisenkai were very fortunate in securing her for their hospital, and she has proven herself most worthy of their confidence. To her untiring efforts, and to the able and generous assistance of her associate, Miss Abe, M.D., and of Dr. Kelsey, the success of the past year, in spite of many difficulties and insufficient funds, is due.

Two false impressions have had to be corrected; one, that the hospital receives help from some Missionary Society. This it has not had from the very beginning, and has no expectation of receiving. The other wrong impression is that none but Christians could be admitted, which is, of course, utterly false, very few indeed of the whole number presenting themselves for treatment having any knowledge of Christianity.

Just now, six little sick children are to be added to the number of in-patients from Mr. Hongo's orphanage, where the children, owing to Mr. Hongo's serious illness, are so much in want of food and all necessities that some of them have fallen ill. These extra-charity patients will tax the Jisenkai resources, but it is a call of humanity that cannot be resisted.

In addition to this, the Jisenkai is doing all in its power to better the conditions of the children in the orphanage, who are not yet ill, but are in want of food, during Mr. Hongo's enforced absence.

FRENCH TRAPPISTS OF YEZO.

THERE have been reproduced in these columns from Japanese journals various paragraphs relating to religious communities settled in the neighbourhood of Hakodate. We learn now that these are French Trappist fathers and sisters, and that they have been established in Yezo for more than three years. A correspondent sends us the following information on the subject:—"The Trappist fathers and sisters of Yezo belong to the well-known order of Cistercians, or religionists of Cîteaux, founded in the 12th century in Normandy, and reformed in 1662 by the ABBÉ DE RANCÉ. They have been installed for nearly four years in the neighbourhood of Hakodate, with the cognisance and consent of the Japanese Authorities, who appreciate the excellent models they furnish and the good agricultural methods they teach to the people of the country. The monks and the sisters, whose monastery and convent are situated some miles apart, live in the same manner. They divide their time between prayer and farm work from which in accordance with their rules, they derive all their means of existence. Silence is imposed on them during several hours daily by the statutes of their order. The monks devote themselves to agriculture; the sisters occupy themselves with gardening operations, the cultivation of flowers, and dairy work. They make butter and cheese which will be appreciated by and by on Tokyo tables when the sisters have succeeded in obtaining a few more cows. The installation of these religionists in Japan has nothing mysterious about it, and the fables circulated about them prove the regrettable ignorance of the Japanese. It is to be desired that the foreign press should correct these absurdities, and above all that it should not echo them. There are to be found among the Trappist monks many men of birth and brilliant education, who formerly occupied a distinguished place in the world, and who remain distinguished under the white robe and the leather girdle they wear to-day. The Cistercians, like the Chartreux, have founded 'Trappes' throughout the whole world. They choose by preference the most insalubrious and least frequented lands—notably Algiers, the Campagna Romana, &c.—and by their efforts fertilise and transform them."

Our correspondent adds:—"Do you really think that the Roman Catholic Monasteries and Convents for men and women, which are spread all over the civilized and uncivilized world 'work iniquity which they will have to answer for by-and-by'? I must say I do not agree with you. In Yezo, where the Trappists have been established for several years (I wonder you did not know it) they have done and are doing a great deal of good. The French Minister visited them last autumn, and speaks of them in the highest terms." To this question we return an emphatically negative answer. We do not believe that the Roman Catholic monasteries and convents which are spread all over the civilized and uncivilized world work iniquity which they will have to answer for by-and-by. Very far from it indeed. We believe, and we have often said in these columns, that nothing nobler, more heroic, or better calculated to elevate the moral tone of the human race can be found in the world, civilized or uncivilized, than the work of the Roman Catholic fathers and sisters. When we spoke of "iniquity which must be answered for by and by," we alluded to the enrollment of girls who have not yet emerged from their teens in the Trappist ranks. We have read DE RANCÉ'S De la sainteté et des Devoirs de la Vie Monastique, and we have read MABILLON'S reply, Traité des Etudes Monastiques, and between the two authorities we never could see any room for hesitation. MABILLON, representing the Benedictines, advocates a course of life which pre-supposes something like delirious exaltation on the part of its pursuers, but DE RANCÉ asks men and women to obey rules which revolt human intelligence and which can not be reconciled with any conception of a beneficent Creator. The protracted fasts, the total abstinence from many common edibles and potables, the laborious manual occupations, the hard beds, the severe asceticism, the obligation of almost perpetual silence, the terrible greeting, memento mori, the monks' vesper digging of their own graves, and their couches on the straw of their own coffins—all these things are shockingly unnatural. We are unable to regard them as anything but a form of insanity. Would DE RANCÉ have conceived such rules had not his reason been affected by sorrow for the death of the Duchess of ROHAN-MONTBAZON, and is it possible to contend that a system suggested by the hysteria of grief is in accord with the will of a benevolent Providence? Among the many mansions of Christianity the Trappist house may be fitted for some inmates. We have no business to doubt that many of the men and women who retire into this strange dwelling, find there not only peace of mind elsewhere denied to them, but also a sphere of high usefulness. Not for one instant, however, can we reconcile ourselves to the notion of allowing girls in their teens to become Trappists. The poor children can not possibly know what they are doing. To permit them to cast their lot permanently with the victims of despairing melancholia or religious dementia, is, in our opinion, a shocking cruelty. The age of martyrdom is past. We may still "bend with reverence before the martyr's tomb," but we can not approve the proceedings of those that encourage martyrdom.

COUNT OKUMA ON CHINA.

COUNT OKUMA has just delivered himself of some of those large breezy opinions for which he is famous. His theme is China. He does not believe for a moment that the integrity of the ancient empire is threatened. On the contrary, he thinks that if any Western Power attempted to obtain a dominant position there, the effort would involve a sacrifice of hundreds of thousands of lives, for the roots of the the Chinese tree strike deeply and strongly, nor must it be supposed that because the fruit is sometimes rotten, the trunk lacks vitality. The granting of industrial and mining concessions does not impart any shock to the stability of the empire. Neither can it be treated as England treated India, for the Chinese, as a race, are far superior to the people of India. They are homogeneous; they have a common history; they obey the same ethical rules; they read the same literature. To the Count such a nation, enormous in numbers and almost inexhaustibly resourceful, seems incapable of being compelled to bend its neck to any foreign yoke. Circumstances of real national peril would certainly create the man to deal with them. In a word, his faith in the individual Chinaman is large, and he finds nothing wanting except moral caloric to form the units into a strong whole. Japan, he concludes, is in a position to supply that caloric and she should make it her task to do so.

In all this there is a huge hypothesis. Every one of us acknowledges the capacities of the individual Chinaman. Every one of us admits that if, as a member of a nation, he displayed the qualities which distinguish him as a unit of the human race, the Chinese empire would be a permanently formidable entity. But that "if" is the whole trouble. Something has happened to the Chinaman. Some part of his national mechanism has dropped out or become paralysed. Can it be reasonably inferred from his precedents that he will rise superior to a great emergency? What does Count OKUMA mean by saying that circumstances have always created the man to deal with them in China? Did circumstances create a man to drive back the Mongol invasion in the 13th century? Did circumstances create a man to drive back the Tartar invasion in the seventeenth century? On the contrary, did not China remain for 107 years with her head under the Mongol heel, and has she not now remained for 255 years in a similar position towards the Tartars? We can find nothing in her history to prove that her people care one straw by whom they are ruled provided that they are left to wrestle peacefully with the hard task of living. If that excellent creative potentiality of circumstances referred to by Count OKUMA is ever to assert itself, surely ample incentive has been furnished again and again during the past ten years. What are we to say of a nation that sat down tamely and resignedly after such a crushing defeat as China received from Japan in 1894-5? Are we still to believe in the virility of that nation? Are we still to believe that it can be roused to a mood of efficient self-defence? If Russia, France, and Germany had not interfered in 1895; if the Liaotung Peninsula and Southern Manchuria from the Gulf of Pechili to the bank of the Yalu had remained in Japan's possession, who doubts that the inhabitants of those broad regions would have peacefully submitted to her rule, and would have transferred their allegiance to her without a murmur? Why should not all Manchuria prove equally pliable in Russia's hands? Why should not Shantung acknowledge Germany's sway, or the Yangtze Valley England's? It is hard for any faith in China to survive such reflections as these. We have no doubt that Japan could re-vitalize her neighbour if her neighbour could be induced to submit to the process. But neither have we the smallest doubt that England, or Russia, could hold Chinese people in the hollow of her hand with very little exercise of those imperial thews that are the heritage of her race.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF JAPANESE CURRENT LITERATURE.

In the Taiyō, Dr. Katō Hiroyuki writes on family life and the bringing-up of children. He is of opinion that the Japanese home needs purifying. He says that it is quite useless to expect any change in the feelings of children as long as their parents set them such poor examples. There is a great deal of talk about home education, but very little is being done. Dr. Katō thinks that there is nothing to equal the quiet everyday influence of parents who are living moral lives and whose conversation is instructive. Without this the efforts of outsiders yield no good results. . . . Many of the books used in elementary schools, Dr. Katō thinks, are unsuitable. They err in the direction of over-minuteness. Some of them may be pronounced finical. The Mombushō seems to have adopted the policy of the Home Department in reference to the sale of medicines, which is to allow a medicine to be sold as long as it is not absolutely injurious. The only question the Department of Education has been wont to ask in reference to a proposed text book is, will it do harm? The result is the circulation of a large number of unsuitable books. The only harm that the book-examining bureau has had in contemplation has been moral harm. The idea of certain books being specially adapted to mental development among the pupils, and others consisting of a collection of facts that have no bearing on that development, or that are even calculated to retard it, seems to have never entered the heads of the men with whom rests the responsibility of deciding on text-books for Government schools. The things which are taught the children of the poor, who in a few years will be required to help their parents in manual work, are in many cases most unsuitable and have the effect of making the children conceited, says Dr. Katō. The school life and teaching should all have one practical aim in view, the preparation of children's minds, and the furnishing them with knowledge for the life that they will have to lead after leaving school. If this were kept in view, the elementary and middle schools might help the parents of children in various ways, but, as things now are, the knowledge obtained at school is of little use at home; and hence certain parents seem settling down to the conviction that the effect of education is to make their children conceited, unpractical, and unmanageable. . . . Dr. Katō thinks that female education in Japan is departing too much from practical lines and deprecates all such movements as the founding of a Female University. The improvement of existing female schools is all that is needed, says Dr. Katō.

Some interesting observations on literary subjects by Kōda Rohan are published in the Sekai-no-Nihon (No. 7.), which we give in an epitomised form. One of the leading characteristics of the fiction of the present age is the almost total absence of romances of any length and the large number of novelettes that appear week after week. Asked why I don't write a long novel, I reply, it is quite impossible. The present age is one of constant transition. Every phase of Japanese life is undergoing change from year to year. Rapid sketches of shifting scenes are all that can be attempted. It is quite impossible for a writer to be sufficiently deeply impressed with situations or features that he knows will give place to others to-morrow to allow of his describing them at any great length. So varied are the experiments being tried, so many-sided is the new life that is being lived, that no generalisation which would be understood and appreciated by everybody is possible. In order to be understood the novelist has to adopt the style of the historian and give dates and places in a prosy manner. Is it because we are islanders that we live in a daily bustle that leaves no time for reflection? Even if long works were forthcoming, few would have the patience and the leisure to peruse them. . . . But our novelists are a class by themselves, with no occupation except that of occasional scribbling for the newspapers, and no connection of an instructive kind with the great world around them. There is certainly among us as a class a lack of the steadiness of work and seriousness of purpose required for the accomplishment of great tasks. . . . A great deal of uncalled for fuss is made by newspaper and magazine writers about the decline of literary taste and the dearth of good books. But in what country of the world does literature keep up a high standard of excellence for any length of time? Literature has its ups and downs; its bright and dark days. If the whole of the Meiji era be considered, neither the sale nor the writing of books affords any cause for discouragement. As to the sales during any two or three years, this is of no importance whatever, and is affected by numerous accidental causes.

Since the death of Ichiyō (Higuchi) the number of women who have made a name for themselves in literature is not enough to be counted on the fingers of one hand.

In modern times there has been no lady writer to compare with Ichiyō. In many things she resembled a man. When a woman gets to use her pen with ease, she has a sphere of her own. Her writing has a lightness of touch, a charm, a smoothness and finish about it that is not often equalled by men. But the fiction of most of the female writers of the day is rightly called Gosha (月謝) Shōsetsu, "Monthly Fee Fiction." It is confined to school life or the family life of school girls. Ichiyō was quite exceptional. She penetrated depths of poverty and suffering that are seldom explored, and her pictures are true to life. She was schooled by suffering and wrote of what she knew. No girls trained as are the students at the Nobles' Female School will ever become authoresses of any power or influence.

Last year a certain Mr. Ono Yentarō made an interesting archæological discovery at a place called Fukiage, near Edogasaki, Hitachi, a report of which appears in No. 156 of the Tōkyō Jinrui Gakkai Zasshi (Anthropological Society's Magazine), from which we cull the following particulars. At Fukiage, a place 5 or 6 chō distant from the town of Edogasaki, built close to the former course of the river Ono, a large shell mound was discovered by Mr. Ono. Its length was about 9 feet. It was covered with earth about 2½ ft. thick. The thickness of the shells was from 1 ft. 2 in. to 2 ft. Inside the mound were found human remains and the bones of birds, fish, deer, and wild-boar and some primitive earthenware vessels. The human remains discovered consist of the left side of a leg-bone, and the right side of a skull. According to the measurements made by Professor Torii, the leg-bone certainly belonged to a man of larger build than any Aino or Japanese of modern times. Professor Torii is of opinion that the bones of animals found in the mound and the earthenware utensils were undoubtedly placed there with certain bones that belonged to the dead men. The general theory in reference to these human bones is that at the time when they were buried the inhabitants of these islands were cannibals, and that the bones of all sorts found are the remains of their meals. The Fukiage discovery confirms this theory in many ways. The bones found are all approximately of the same length. The portion of the human leg-bone is 106 millimetres, one bone of the deer is 98 millimetres; another, a shin bone, is 99 millimetres. Two bones belonging to a wild boar measure 81 and 86 millimetres respectively. It looks, says Professor Torii, as though the length of the bones had been determined by the capacity of the cauldron in which the flesh that once covered them was cooked. The evidence would seem to show that, like many African tribes, the ancestors of the present race of Japanese favoured a mixed meat diet, and that they cooked human flesh and the flesh of other animals in the same cauldron. The great interest attached to the Fukiage discovery is that it confirms the theory supported by leading Japanese and foreign archaeologists in reference to the contents of the Omori shell-mounds. Shell-mounds have been discovered in Ono, Higo; in Nishi-kaizuka, Tōtōmi; in Kōsaku, Kokubunji, Yasaku and Nitona, Shimōsa; in Kuhiri, Sagami, and other places, and they have all contained the remains of animals, but there have been no human remains; consequently they have thrown no light on the interesting inquiry as to the cannibalism of the early inhabitants of Japan.

The thorough examination of the mound and its contents has not yet been completed, but the discoveries already made are of great scientific value and are engaging the attention of experts.

The Gwaikō Jihō, in reviewing a "History of Modern Russia" by Mr. Urabe Hyakutarō, published by the Kaitakusha, Yazaemon-chō, Kyōbashi, Tōkyō, says that nothing is more important at the present time than the preparation of books bearing on foreign countries that describe things as they actually exist. The ignorance of foreign affairs manifested on every occasion is largely owing to the fact that the Japanese have no reliable sources of information to which to refer. Mr. Urabe's Kinsei Russia-shi is a book of the right kind, says the Gwaikō Jihō. It supplies the facts which it is important that we should know.

The Kaitakusha it is that issues the Sekai-no-Nihon. We are pleased to see that this office has drawn up for itself a publishing programme which includes a number of much-needed works. The subjects to be written up are thus given by the Sekai-no-Nihon. (1) "A History of Modern Russia" (already published). (2) "A History of Modern Thought." (3) "National Defence and Military Organisation." (4) "Economy in Japan." (5) "Reform of our Financial System." (6) "A History of the Government in the Meiji Era." (7) "Japanese Religion, Past and Present." (8) "Party Cabinets." (9) "Methods of Self-education." (10) "Education in a Constitutional Age." (11) "The Authority Bequeathed to man by Heaven." (12) Socialism."

The Sekai-taiseiron, by Mr. Watanabe Seihō, as its title indicates, deals with the prevailing spirit of the times. The author reaches some rather startling conclusions. He is evidently an ardent patriot, and is of opinion that all things point to the conspicuous part that Japan will play in the next century as the leader of nations. We are informed that Western civilisation is on the wane, that the white races are almost played out, that European nations have already shown signs of approaching disintegration and ruin. Japan is to be the saviour of the poor distressed world, and to win renown for the yellow races such as they have never hitherto had. This is Japan's glorious destiny, and Heaven has endowed her with all the qualities necessary to its fulfilment. A pleasant dream, no doubt!

Two important and highly valuable works have been published by Professor Tōdō Tōru, Public Procurator attached to the Supreme Court, on the laws of various countries bearing on religion and the connection of Church and State. The titles of the books are the Shūkyō Hōron, price 1 yen 25 sen, and the Seikyō Yōron (The leading principles connected with Government and Religion), price 1 yen 25 sen. The Nihon-hōritsugakkō issues both works. Dr. Tōdō has studied in Europe and has paid special attention to the methods of treating religion practised in Western countries. All practical men in Japan will certainly welcome treatises of this kind, which consist of a calm and lucid statement of existing facts connected with the attitude of the chief Governments of the world in reference to religious belief and practices.

The degree of Doctor (博士), Hakase or Hakushi, has lately been conferred by the Department of Education on no less than 101 persons. Among these, three passed the University examination that entitles them to the degree; seven received the degree on account of original essays contributed; 51 were recommended for the degree by the Imperial University Council, and 29 were recommended by the President of the Imperial University.

The Chūō Shimbun, a short time ago, celebrated the publication of its 5000th number by an entertainment at which Marquis Ito was present. On that occasion the Marquis is reported to have spoken somewhat as follows:—Dr. Toyama, whom I perceive is present to-day, is undoubtedly a great scholar, but his scholarship is apt to betray him into indiscretions. He is led away too much by theories which it is not possible to put into practice under present circumstances. Frequently new ideas occur to me also, but I never venture to try and carry them out without a good deal of consideration as to the general effect they are likely to produce. But neither do I abandon them. I ponder over them alone and study them in the light of books that have been written to elucidate them. There is too much impetuosity in all departments of present Japanese life, specially among statesmen, political parties, and business men. There is too much anxiety to rush into enterprises without any idea of the energy and the resources that will be required to carry them to a successful issue. Men only think of to-day and take no thought for the morrow. Not long ago 5 or 6 young men came to see me at Oiso and asked my advice as to the course they should follow. I quoted largely from the "Analects" of Confucius, pointing out to them that the majority of the would-be young politicians of the day are on the wrong tack. They think that because they can argue and talk they are qualified to become leaders of men. They consider themselves geniuses and wonder how it is that people do not follow them, though they have not the most essential quality in a leader, perfect self-control. Men have much more to fear from their strong points than from their weak ones. Consciousness of their defects makes them careful in situations where these defects are likely to make themselves felt. But when in circumstances where it seems to them that they can rely solely on the qualities in which they excel, they are off their guard and commit great blunders. Our merits often prove to be more harmful to us than our demerits. . . . Chinese sentences as a literary composition have a wonderful charm—concise, full of striking antithesis, not a word out of place, and not a word more than is required. But when the thought expressed is examined there seems to be a total lack of logical sequence. But with Western literature, however unpolished be the style, there is a connected argument throughout that everyone can perceive. It is most desirable that we should endeavour to embody in our Japanese writing the excellencies of both styles, the beauty and conciseness of the Chinese with the powerful logic of the West. Few young men of to-day have any conception of the difficulty I encountered as a youth in acquiring a knowledge of Dutch first and English afterwards. The dictionaries that we possessed at that time were for the most part useless. I first studied Dutch under Mr. Nobechi, the head of this Kōyōkan (the place where the meeting was held). Mr. Nobechi studied Dutch under Omura Masujiro.

Mr. Nobechi, who is over 70 years of age, was present on the occasion of the speech, and when subsequently reminded of the old days by the Marquis shed tears of joy.

There is no doubt much truth in the contention of the Teikoku Bungaku, in a recent article, that the old seat of literature has become the chief seat of commerce and industry, and that the northern capital, though behind the West in trade, has attracted to itself nearly all Japan's best writers. The industrial progress of Osaka during the past decade is, says the Teikoku Bungaku, quite remarkable. But neither in that city nor in Kyōto is there any native literary activity worthy of mention. The literary college of the Dōshisha failed years ago. Magazines have appeared in both cities at intervals, only to be discontinued after a few months or a few years. Literary men seem averse to settling in a region where the smoke of factory chimneys fills the air. The few stragglers that have found their way to western cities have not as a rule become permanent residents. Last year Messrs. Suiri and Riyō went to Kobe and started a magazine called the Shinkō Bungaku, which is doing well and is a first-class literary organ. But it is a case of one swallow not making a summer, and we are afraid, concludes the Teikoku Bungaku, that it is only too true that the west has settled down to the conviction that material progress is the chief desideratum of the present time.

In the columns of the Jiji Shimpo, in a long series of articles, Mr. Fukuzawa has been championing women's rights and showing the injustice of the treatment that Japanese women have received for centuries. The standard of morals known as the Onna Daigaku Mr. Fukuzawa has torn to shreds. To follow any such teaching as that book contains at the present time would, in Mr. Fukuzawa's opinion, be fatal to all social progress. The Onna Daigaku teaches that subjection to man on all occasions is the chief duty of women. In some 20 articles published in the Jiji, each subject connected with the old female educational system has been discussed. But Mr. Fukuzawa has not been content simply to play the rôle of a destructionist. He has projected a new system of female education, to which he gives the name of the Shin Onna Daigaku (The New Great Learning for Women). It seems that Mr. Fukuzawa was engaged on the final revision of these articles when overtaken by the illness that brought him to death's door last year. They are the result of long years of study, combined with a knowledge of women derived from his own family circle and relations. It is stated by Mr. Fukuzawa Ichitarō that the principles elaborated in the Shin Onna Daigaku, which will be shortly published in book form, have been acted on in his father's house for a very long time, his father being most particular as to the topics of conversation introduced, and the modes of behaviour adopted, by his children. It is considered by those who are best able to judge that this work of Mr. Fukuzawa's old age ranks high among his many numerous contributions to the cause of progress and reform.

At a general meeting of the Meiji Bijutsukai held last month it was stated that there are at present 318 members of the Society, 16 of whom are foreigners. There was an increase of 33 members last year. Among the speakers at the meeting was Mr. Koyama Shōtarō, the well-known artist, who is a most ardent advocate of the adoption of the European style of painting. He gave an interesting account of the study of western art in Japan, of which the following is a brief abstract: The history of our adoption of Western styles of painting may be conveniently traced back to four periods. (1) Between A.D. 1570 and 1590 a number of pictures on religious subjects were brought to Japan by the Portuguese. But the study of these pictures led to no results that we know of. (2) Between 1764 and 1788 the introduction of a number of foreign paintings by the Dutch led to the creation of new styles of art. There were no artists of any note in those days who did not owe much of their power to the study of western models. At that time artists were divided into two schools known as the 正傳派, Seiden-ha, and the 變成派, Hensei-ha, that is, those who favoured a strict transmission of foreign methods, and those who advocated modification of those methods. The study of foreign art during the latter part of the eighteenth century gave a wonderful impetus to Japanese art and inspired such men as Okyō, Bunchō, Kazan and Hokusai. (3) The next period worthy of special note was that between 1866 and 1863. At this time a large number of new works of art found their way to Japan, the result being the founding of two schools of painters known as the Gakuri-ha and the Jitchi-ha. The former advocated the study of the theory of foreign art, and were strongly represented in the Bakufu Kaisaiji; the latter contended that practice in painting in foreign style, under foreign instruction, if possible, was what was most needed; and this was found feasible in Yokohama, which became the centre of the practical school of artists. The last period dates from 1876, when the Kōbushō (Board of Works, abolished in 1885) established the Bijutsu Gakkō, in which foreign art was studied in a normal manner. From this time onward the term Bijutsu (Fine Art) came to be universally used and the interest in foreign painting increased year by year till, thanks to a movement set on foot by some self-interested Americans, there set in an anti-foreign current which for some time hindered the progress of the study of Western art. But as a school we have survived and are more prosperous to-day than ever.

At the end of the report read at the meeting a short account was given of the interesting address delivered by Mr. Felix Régamey on March 26th last at a meeting of the Chigaku Kyōkai, held at their office in Kōnya-chō, Kyōbashi, Tōkyō. M. Régamey came to Japan as a deputation from Paris for the purpose of studying the present condition of art in Japan. His subject on the occasion to which we refer was, "The History of Fine Art in France and a Review of its present condition." But in the course of his lecture the accomplished artist alluded to the manner in which at various stages of its history French art had been affected by Japanese and Chinese art. This was the case during the reign of Louis XIV., when France learnt from the Portuguese and the Dutch what were the leading features of Japanese art. The popularity of those non-symmetrical sketches that during the reign of Louis XV. found their way to every part of France is well-known. They were all imitations of Far Eastern art. Then the Impressionist school of art, which finds so much favour in certain quarters, possesses many features in common with Japanese art and is indebted to Japanese and Chinese art for some of its excellencies. In Japan there is Impressionism of the very highest class—Impressionism that is founded on minute analysis of the objects represented. The lecturer produced a sketch from the pen of Kawabata and further illustrated his meaning. He added, however, that many Japanese artists of the Impressionist school neglected analysis of objects altogether, and hence the ideas they intended to represent were more obscure than was desirable. In order to convey an impression of the appearance of a window, it was not necessary to show in the sketch every pane of glass and every piece of wood, but on the other hand the artist must so far study the window as to know which of its parts are essential to its character and suggest the object-intended to be portrayed and which part can be omitted without fear of causing the object to be mistaken for something else.

The Taiyō comments at some length on oratory in the Diet and comes to the conclusion that it is on the decline. The two best speakers in the Diet, according to this authority, are Mr. Shimada Saburō and Mr. Inoue Kakugorō. Neither of these gentlemen have of late delivered speeches of any length. As things are at present, Japan stands alone as regards the number of bills passed without being properly discussed, says the Taiyō. The chief reason for this the Taiyō thinks is the amount of work that has to be got through in a short session. We have not space to quote all its figures, but as a specimen of the kind of thing that occurs we give those which concern the 13th session, which extended over 46 days only. The bills presented by the Government numbered 176. Of these 172 were discussed to a greater or less extent, 1 was withdrawn, and 3 were not brought forward. Then there were 45 private bills, 33 of which were discussed, 6 withdrawn, and 6 not brought forward. In addition to these there were 49 memorials, 38 of which were discussed, 1 withdrawn, and 10 not brought forward. If the whole of the bills and memorials be compared with the time at the disposal of the Diet, at least 3 subjects per hour had to be disposed of. It must be remembered that during its first session the Diet sat on an average 4 hours a day, but during its thirteenth it only averaged 2 hours a day. Under these circumstances to find time to listen to long speeches was impossible. Hence the constant cry of "The Closure! The Closure!" The remedy proposed by the Taiyō for what it considers to be an evil is the exercise of greater care in the choice of chairmen of committees and the making it a practice for such members to make a lengthy report on the bill which has passed through committee.

Mr. Iwamoto Zenji has published a book of reminiscences of the late Count Katsu under the title of the 海舟餘瀝, *Kaishū-yoha which makes very interesting reading, containing as it does many comments on recent events which show extraordinary insight. The book impresses one with the feeling that the Count was one of the most remarkable men of his day. His manners were often so singular that he does not seem to have been understood by many. Some of the peculiarities of his character are revealed by Mr. Iwamoto's narrative. We have only space for a few extracts. A missionary informed the Count that he had been praying for him, and that he (Count Katsu) had no doubt reached old age owing to God's protection and care. This theory did not satisfy the Count, and he observed that the probable explanation of his not being killed was that he had always been averse to killing anybody. Though he had worn a sword, it had, on occasions when he might have been tempted to use it, been firmly tied to the sheath.

On one occasion he was asked by the Tokugawa Shōgun to devote himself to the task of averting the ruin that impended and was promised a handsome reward in return. He grew very angry at the proposal. But this did not prevent its being repeated. So, in order to put an end to the affair, he informed the messenger that the only condition of his doing anything would be the transference of the whole of the Tokugawa estate to him without delay. This had the desired effect.

When young he had a great aversion to books. His study of literature commenced when he was confined to his house by Government order for 4 years. From that time onward he grew fond of reading, and, in addition to perusing the standard works of his own country, studied Dutch.

Before starting for the seat of war in China, a military officer called on him and remarked:—"I have come to say goodbye, as I never expect to see you again. I do not intend to return alive." "Don't talk such nonsense!" replied the Count. "What's the use in dying? In modern warfare most of the soldiers manage to escape. Getting killed is the exception. Hence it is that people object to the fuss made about rewarding those who return alive."

When war was proclaimed the Count was greatly surprised, and predicted that Japan would not be the country to reap permanent benefit from the struggle. This forecast was embodied in a Chinese verse which to a large extent has been verified by recent events. The lines are worth preserving.

Thus it was plainly foreseen by Count Katsu that the chief outcome of the war would be the extension of European power in the Far East, and this is just what has happened.

SENDAI NEWS.

The even, and to some by no means unpleasant, monotony of country life has in the case of Sendai been broken into by several occurrences of local interest. On May 6th, the Baptist Girls' School gave a musical entertainment, at which the girls acquitted themselves well and furnished abundant proof of the careful training they have received from the indefatigable lady now in sole charge of the institution. On the 7th, the Second Higher School held its spring regatta near Shiogama. The rowing club connected with the school has many difficulties to contend with. The river Hirose, which is within a few hundred yards of the school buildings, is useless for boating. Consequently every time the members of the club wish to practise they have to go by train to Shiogama, which takes thirty minutes. It is only at certain times of the year that the water of the Matsushima gulf is calm enough to allow of practice for novices in the art of rowing. It not infrequently happens that a crew which sets out with the intention of getting a day's practice, arrives at Shiogama to find a heavy sea on in the centre of the gulf, and, after going to the expense of the railway journey, returns to Sendai disappointed. Owing to the treacherous nature of the water on which the boats have to race, the purchase of long narrow racing boats has been considered inadvisable. Safety was, naturally, deemed to be of greater importance than speed, and the result is the use of boats that are perfect tubs as regards shape and speed. In addition to these and other discouraging circumstances that could be mentioned, the weather on the 7th was very unpropitious. A small rain was falling in the early morning which hardly looked as if it would cease. It did cease, however, but the weather remained gloomy and chilly, which greatly reduced the number of spectators. With the exception of the teachers' race, the programme for the day was carried out amid such enthusiasm as the circumstances allowed.

On the evening of May 15th the other Protestant Mission School, the Miyagi Jogakko, gave a very interesting musical entertainment, which included quite a long operetta arranged for children's voices called "Laila." This was very tastefully rendered and reflected great credit on the foreign ladies who drilled the girls during the recitations which preceded the performance, and on the intelligence of the young actresses who thoroughly entered into the spirit of the piece.

An event of a very different kind is worthy of record. On the 17th, the birthday of Shaka Muni was celebrated in various parts of Japan. On that day, at the invitation of the Dôkôkai, a Buddhist Society connected with the Second author are described as the lesser movements of water whose big waves have already displayed their beauty and power to the public.

† In the Count's opinion Japan had really no casus belli. This use of the character 名 is common in the Chinese classics.—(WRITER OF THE SUMMARY.)

Higher School, the well-known veteran lecturer and scholar, Dr. Murakami, favoured Sendai with his presence, and before a select and an attentive audience, assembled in the Gôjôkan, made a speech which was characterised by verve, common sense, and appropriateness to the age to a degree that we venture to think is somewhat rare among Buddhist priests. A great deal is said nowadays about the pitiable state of Buddhism, about its impracticability, its ignorance of the conditions of success, its lack of a high ideal to hold up to a nation that is represented to be grovelling in the dust. After listening for a whole hour to Dr. Murakami's address, every sentence of which was intelligible, the present writer came away with the conviction that the Buddhists still have men in their ranks who for sublimity of ideas, steadfastness of purpose, insight into the hidden sources of human action, and all the various needs of the human soul are not surpassed by any of the leaders of other schools of thought. We can do no more than give a brief outline of the tenor of his address. To do justice to it even in the form of a summary would occupy more space than we have at our disposal. Dr. Murakami began by giving a very beautiful description of the life of Shaka Muni, specially laying stress on those particulars in which he differed from all other men. How the boy that was born to be an earthly king and was urged by his father to extend his sceptre over the whole of India, which at that time groaned under various forms of oppression, and anxiously looked for the appearance of an earthly deliverer, chose to turn his back on the world, to renounce all idea of establishing a temporal kingdom, and commenced to lay the foundations of an empire over men's souls that will continue to all time—is a story with which readers of "The Light of Asia" are quite familiar. Christ was born poor and lived poor all his days, but Shaka Muni was born rich and for the sake of humanity became poor. The most significant event of Shaka's life Dr. Murakami pronounced to be his fight with the Devil and the victory he obtained. We insert the word "Devil" as it was used by Dr. Murakami, but it is only right to mention that in a subsequent part of his speech Dr. Murakami sneered at the belief in a personal Devil, as Broad Churchmen and Congregationalists in England and America are apt to do in private conversation, if not in the pulpit. He said that the only evil one a man had to fear was the inferior half of his own personality. In each man there were two Souls, as it were, one inclined to good and the other to evil; that the second evil-loving Soul was one form of evil with which Shaka fought and with which all the best men in the world had never ceased to fight. The outer world doubtless was full of evil, even the brightest and best looking-things contained poisons that might work terrible havoc if not guarded against. But the heart evils were the subtlest and the most difficult to overcome. From moral subjects of this kind Dr. Murakami passed on to discuss ideals of life, and reached a plane which one could not but feel was the one occupied by the greatest men of all times. Among other things he pointed out to the numerous young men who were listening to him how mistaken is the notion that the men who have made great names in the world started in life with that intention. The greatest benefactors of the human race, said Dr. Murakami, have been men who were unconscious of their own greatness; who concerned themselves with the work that they set themselves to do and cared not a straw what men thought of that work. To have a fixed purpose in life, to carry out that purpose unwaveringly, never to ask and never to care whether any present or future reward will accrue from its execution—that is the true road to greatness. Dr. Murakami preached a number of wholesome doctrines to the young, showed young men how apt they are to become conceited and how essential to success is the humility that is based on consciousness of ignorance and deficiency. He condemned over eating and over-drinking—in fact, intemperance of all kinds.

Dr. Murakami is, we believe, over 60 years of age, and is very fragile in appearance, but is still full of energy and spirit and capable of getting through an enormous amount of work. While he was resting between the two discourses that he delivered, each lasting about an hour, Mr. Yamada Ikuji, who teaches German in the Second Higher School, made a speech, in which he declared himself to be a steadfast believer in Buddhism. He took for his text the words of Shaka, 天上天下唯我獨尊 Tenjo, Tenka iga Dokuson. "In the Heaven above and earth beneath I alone am worthy of honour"—a very difficult saying to justify, from whatever point of view regarded. Mr. Yamada, however, maintained that Shaka's life of abstinence and labour had abundantly established his right to consider himself as more worthy of honour than any other mortal man.

Next week Sendai is to celebrate by a festival of unprecedented grandeur, that is, according to Sendai notions of grandeur—the 300th anniversary of the founding of the place as the chief castle town of Date Masamune. According to our reckoning it was in the year 1600, two years after the death of Hideyoshi and the very year in which the great battle of Sekigahara was fought, and while in the prime of life, that Date determined to abandon Shirakawa and Yonezawa as seats of government and erect a castle on the heights that tower above the river Hirose. In those warlike times the step was a wise one. His castle became almost impregnable, and there grew up beneath it on the other side of the river a town which has since become one of the largest cities of the realm. It is said that some fifteen thousand yen is to be spent on the celebration, which commences on the 23rd and will last for three days. There is a talk of free tickets being given to press representatives and of special invitations being sent to great personages. The numerous dashi in course of preparation will absorb a good deal of the money that has been liberally subscribed towards the celebration. But in the matter of celebrations the Japanese are very conservative, and, while pronouncing the whole thing very tsukuramu, with a smile on the face and nonchalance in the heart, they put their hands into their pockets as often as required. What is said of truth is equally applicable to custom—"great is custom and she will prevail."

THE DRAMA.

"THE SIGN OF THE CROSS."

Messrs. Dallas and Musgrave's Company opened their season at the Public Hall, Yokohama, on May 20th, with a very excellent performance of Wilson Barrett's spectacular play, "The Sign of the Cross." The wretched rainy weather of Saturday, which culminated in a heavy shower just about the time when folks were thinking of leaving home for the theatre, doubtless deterred many from venturing, still for a first night in Yokohama the house was fairly well-filled and we feel confident that now the Company has demonstrated the excellence of the work they are prepared to place upon the local boards, the support of theatre-going Yokohama will be accorded in no stinted measure. And truly the enterprise shown in bringing such a large company of players to this out-of-the-way-corner of the Far East deserves recognition over and above that usually given here.

Many residents who have seen the play in London, with Wilson Barrett in the rôle of Marcus Superbus, were rather sceptical as to the result of bringing "The Sign of the Cross" within the narrow confines of the Public Hall stage. But most of these fears proved groundless. True the company looked rather cramped and cribbed in some of the acts, but throughout the evening masterly stage-management triumphed over limitations that would have daunted other men, and the result must be pronounced satisfactory in the extreme. The setting of the various scenes was very effective, the whole play being put on in a manner that disarmed the most exacting critics.

The story of "The Sign of the Cross" has become familiar to most readers of the English press and a synopsis of the various scenes would therefore be a work of supererogation. There can be no doubt, however, that the players are superior to the play. Much of the writing is very cheap rant, but of course those that interpret the piece are not responsible for the words they have to utter. Mr. Henry Dallas as Marcus Superbus, the Prefect of Rome who was won to Christianity through love of Mercia, satisfied—and that very thoroughly—the ideals of the character. Quickly arousing the sympathy of the house, he held it in the end, when, in the dungeons of the Coliseum he elects to leave his lofty station, with all its glittering ambitions and heart-enticing possibilities, to die with Mercia, who has brought him to the knowledge of Him who came to earth as the Saviour of the world. Mr. Kenyon Musgrave Tigellinus, the ferocious Conciliator to Nero, made an excellent foil in the central figure: loving the things of darkness because they were dark—a monster in every thought, fit companion for the beast who wore the Imperial purple. Nero was splendidly played by Mr. J. B. Ferrell. He has fully realized the possibilities of the character and with true artistic appreciation steers clear of over-emphasis, the fault of many who have essayed it. Nero, it is acknowledged by all historians, was a maniac; a maniac possessed of all the diabolical cunning we associate with homicidal mania in its worst phases; he was also a poltroon, cowardly, yet fiendishly vindictive towards all falling within the shadow of his suspicions; inordinately vain, possessing no accomplishments, yet imagining himself a singer, an actor, an athlete of the first quality; cursed by the most bestial instincts, yet deeming himself a god—all these varied characteristics found portrayal in the masterly study presented by Mr. Ferrell, and he deserves our thanks. The only other male character that rose above the rack was that of Gladius, the wine-bibbing patrician, played by Mr. D. Munro, a favourite of other days in Yokohama. His conception of the part was deliciously humorous and relieved very pleasantly the oppressive sombreness of the overshadowing tragedy. Miss Madge Grey made a very lovable Mercia, throwing into the character all the austerity, tempered with sweet maidenly humanity, that was necessary for the realization of the author's ideal. But the part that aroused our sympathy most was that of Berenis, taken by Miss Barbara Fenn. She deserved a better fate than to have her love rejected, nay scorned, by such a man as Marcus. Her playing was very natural and deserves recognition for its true womanhood. Miss Bertha Hunter made an impressive Poppa; Miss Rosie Blair was a capital Dacia; and the Stephanus of Miss Fanny Stanley was meritorious. One word of thanks is also due to all who took part in the play for their capital enunciation. Residents have long reconciled themselves to the many defects of the Public Hall, but last evening, owing to the ability of the players, not one word was missed—a triumph of no mean order.

E. R. T. writes:—Journalists and novelists are very fond of posing as wearied and blasé themselves, and of assuming that the mass of humanity is also convinced of the hollowness of all things. To this delusion we owe the troops of cynical heroes and neurotic heroines with which fiction and the drama have lately been cursed. Nothing could be more false. The great heart of the public is as green as ever it was, and as ready to laugh over the stalest of pantomime jokes or to blubber honest tears over the most maudlin sentiment. Every author and dramatist who has kept this clearly in view, and written intelligently with a true appreciation of what the middle classes want, has succeeded greatly, and generally in inverse ratio to his artistic merits. Mr. George R. Sims, for example. People may laugh at his melodramas, but do they not draw? And does it not say a good deal for the freshness of heart even of sedate business men when a piece of so little intrinsic merit as "The Sign of the Cross" can capture London by storm, and—what we think is quite as difficult—keep a Yokohama audience spell-bound for three hours? When we say little intrinsic merit we mean of course literary merit, for the piece is a triumph of stagecraft, written as it is by a man who knows the value of "situations," and can tell by instinct the exact proportions of horrors and comic business his audience will stand. But apart from its construction there is little in it. The sentiment is commonplace, and the dialogue, especially in the parts that are meant to be bright, is feeble in the extreme. In quoque is the ordinary form of retort. "Thou art mad, Marcus." "Nay, it is thou that art mad"—this is a typical specimen of the author's powers of repartee. But the piece is not an author's play. All depends on the actor, the scene painter, and the property man; and as Messrs Dallas and Musgrave's Company is an extremely strong one the success of the play was assured.

"THE HARBOUR LIGHTS."

Many years ago, so many, indeed, that the present critic hardly likes to give the full tally of them, a writer for one of the morning journals of London declared, after witnessing the initial performance of "The Harbour Lights" at the Adelphi, that "the great heart of England always and ever responds, in accents that will not be misunderstood, to the great ethical lessons laid down for its perusal by the author of this sterling play." Ah, well, the world has moved a little since those seemingly far-back days of the early eighties: the enthusiastic first-nighters who delighted to foregather at that home of "the legitimate" have sobered down a little bit in their estimates and realised that the great triumphs of their youth have a habit of assuming a different guise as the century totters to its close. For the moment the taste for strong yet tawdry melodrama of the Adelphi variety has apparently passed in England; the great middle classes have discovered that Mr. Henry Arthur Jones or Mr. Pinero, and eke the neurotic but exceedingly clever Oscar Wilde can delight them more, can satisfy their intellectual cravings—for even the most hardened have brains—better than the most melodramatic of the old "machinist" dramatists ever did. Yet there can be no gainsaying that such plays as "The Harbour Lights" still appeal to a very large portion of the play-going community. The cordial reception accorded to its revival at the Public Hall on Tuesday demonstrated that in Yokohama there reside a goodly number who delight in seeing Virtue triumph over Vice; Idyllic Love rise supreme over the machinations of Malignant Hate; and Virtuous Humanity, in the person of the light comedy man and his lass, succeed in obtaining the best of all possible good times in spite of the most unfavourable circumstances. The applause was loud and long at all the appropriate places—though occasionally a disconcerting laugh broke in where silence, or else a ringing cheer, had been anticipated by the playwright. Still, for all that, the house was well satisfied with the performance—and what more can possibly be desired?

Mr. Henry Dallas played the part of Lieut. David Kingsley, R.N., in a manner that even William Terriss would have found worthy of approval; Mr. Kenyon Musgrave as Nicholas Mortland was the Adelphi Villain to the life—with such a malignant set of the eyebrows he could not help but take the villain's rôle; Mr. D. Munro was a capital Tom Dossitor, well worthy of the sprightly Peggy Chudleigh (Miss Fanny Stanley); while it goes without saying that Capt. Hardy Mr. J. B. Ferrell, Lena Nelson (Miss Barbara Fenn), and Dora Vane (Miss Madge Grey) were perfect in all that they had to do and say.

"THE SILVER KING."

The Dallas and Musgrave Company are maintaining the reputation they made on their opening night. Wednesday's performance of "The Silver King" was very acceptable, and was received with satisfaction by a full house. All the principal players did well, and the little girl was especially taking.

"UNCLE TOM'S CABIN."

Why stage managers should still mount "Uncle Tom's Cabin" is a mystery. The events which gave interest to the play and the novel have lost all their vividness for the present generation. The book may have had literary merits entitling it to more than ephemeral existence. The dramatised version certainly never deserved a longer life than a May fly, for there is nothing in it at all above the commonplace of melodrama—hairbreadth escapes, rivers of floating ice, good prohibitionists and brutal slave owners, a dying child who dies most tediously, blood-bounds and revolvers, Yankee accent, slave sales, a comic lawyer, a knife fight, a flogging scene, death of an aged and religious negro of high respectability, &c. Of course Messrs. Dallas and Musgrave have brought the piece up (or down) in date. They have introduced quite a number of those musical efforts known as "coon songs" and "plantation solos," as the "Swanee River," "My old Kentucky Home," "I want yer, ma honey," and "The Cake Walk," which generally appear to have been written on the same principles as a Scotch dialect novel. The Kailyard sect has proved that humour merely consists in saying "Hoots, mon," calling "go" "gang," and speaking of "lads" and "lassies." The negro ditty writer has discovered that any song really too inane for consumption in English, or even in Cockney dialect, may yet do excellently well if translated into the supposed language of the plantation, and served up as the accompaniment of a "big boot dance." Messrs. Dallas and Musgrave's company did their best. Mr. Dallas was the extremely irritating man of peace, Phineas Fletcher, whose righteousness and good feeling pervades the play. Mr. D. Munro was a Legree as other Legrees, tall, truculent, and loud-voiced; Mr. T. Empson was Uncle Tom; Mr. Ferrell said at least 150 times "My name is Marks and I'm a lawyer," and, strange to say, made one laugh every time, which is a feat; Mr. Kenyon Musgrave was the runaway slave; Mr. Edwin Phillips St. Clair; Miss Rosie Blair an amusing Topsy, and Miss Musckett Eva. There was a large audience, who seemed to enjoy the sensations.

THE QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY.

There was no organised attempt in Yokohama to celebrate the Queen's Birthday, though the Settlement was pretty generally decorated with flags. Beyond the Yacht Club's sailing races and a cricket match at the Recreation Ground there were no public events.

SAILING RACES.

The Yokohama Yacht Club opened their season with races for 39 and 17 raters. The course for 39 raters was 10 miles, starting from an imaginary line between two flagboats opposite the French Hatoba, through the Harbour Entrance, around the Honmoku Lightship (S.), around the Honmoku Widow Buoy (S.), around the Honmoku Lightship (P.), and back through the Harbour Entrance. Finish across the starting line.

The start was at 2.45, the following taking part:—

	Rating.	Club Time.	Handicap.
		allows.	allows.
Mary	39
Haiden	39
		m.s.	m.s.
Maid Marion	36½	3 04	10 00
Tori	36	3 42	14 00
Spray	34	6 30	14 00
Wanderer	32½	8 46	18 00

The times at the start were as follows:—

	h.m.s.		h.m.s.
Mary	2 46 10	Tori	2 49 10
Haiden	2 47 00	Spray	2 53 10
Maid Marion	2 59 00	Wanderer	3 50 45

The Harbour was cleared at the following times:—

Wanderer	6:45.56	6:37.10	6:27.56

Maid Marion 1st prize and two record points. Mary 2nd prize and 1 record point.

The course for the 17 raters (6 miles) was as follows:—Start from an imaginary line between two flagboats opposite the French Hatuba, through the Harbour Entrance, around a flagboat off Mandarin Bluff (S.), around a flagboat off the middle of the Southern Breakwater (S.), around the flagboat off Mandarin Bluff (P.), back through the Harbour Entrance and finishing across the starting line.

The race resulted as follows:—

	Club Time	Rating, allowance.	Finish.	Corrected Club Time.
Coogee	17	—	5:19.33	5:19.33
Eclair	17	—	5:14.24	5:14.24
Wellings	17	—	5:26.13	5:26.13
Bonito	17	—	2:16.16	5:16.16
Devonia	16½	1.24	5:19.16	5:17.52

The first prize for the 39 raters was presented by Sir Ernest Satow, and was awarded on arbitrary handicap; the second was presented by the club, and was awarded on club time. The first prize for the 17 raters was presented by Sir Ernest Satow and the second by the club, both being awarded on club time.

There was scarcely any wind near the Harbour, and the times were therefore not good.

YOKOHAMA REGATTA.

The weather was unfortunately in its meanest mood on Saturday, and the Regatta suffered accordingly. It was a particularly exasperating day. An honest wet day, when it starts raining at 5 a.m. and continues with strict attention to business till the shades of eve, can be borne with philosophic calm—one knows exactly what to do. If one is lucky enough to possess clothes that any weather will spoil, he will not be beguiled into wearing them, but will slop cheerily along what are humorously called the roads of Yokohama in gales and a rain coat. And outdoor sports will be "off" if they possibly can be postponed. But a day like Saturday, opening fine, then indulging in a slight whimper as if out of temper with things in general, then clearing up, and finally closing in a dismal downpour, is enough to try the temper of the most urbane. There was rather a high sea, too, and in consequence the usual course had to be abandoned, and the races rowed inside the breakwater, the authorities having courteously given permission to that effect. The course was from opposite the light-house at the breakwater entrance to a spot east of the boathouse, and it was kept clear by dint of the efforts of the water police, whose good services in this direction were greatly appreciated. The racing was on the whole interesting, though the finishes were not as a rule close. On shore the performances of the Town Band added to the general enjoyment, and as a large number of ladies had braved the elements, the function was not, in spite of the weather, a failure in its social aspect. The officials, under whose management the Regatta was admirably carried out, were as follow:—Mr. H. C. Litchfield, President and Judge; Mr. F. J. Hall, Captain; Mr. W. Sutter, Starter and Umpire; Mr. R. Hay, Time-keeper; Dr. Wheeler, Messrs. James Walter, E. P. S. Bent, Rev. R. C. Irvine, H. W. Fraser, Geo. Philip, J. MacArthur, W. Goddard, H. Rose, H. E. Hayward; G. C. Alcock, Hon. Treas. Mr. Levedag, Hon. Sec.

The German crew had the inside berth. From the start the English crew, went away, Goddard setting a beautiful stroke. It was evident from the first which was the better crew, and with every stroke they crept away from the Germans, eventually winning by nearly 100 yards. The result was very popular, and the winning crew were given a frantic welcome on returning to the boathouse, the German crew receiving a smaller ovation on their making their appearance some minutes later.

The Mallard's crew were quite outclassed, and from the start the Widgeon led the way. Moss rowing a fine steady stroke, while the other boat rolled and laboured. By the time half the distance was finished the Widgeon was two or three of lengths ahead, and this had increased to six lengths by the finish.

Carst got the best of the start, and went away with the lead rowing 33 to the minute, Levedag adopting much the same stroke but the lighter men showed superior form. At half distance the Scoter was leading by three or four lengths, and though a little later the Scoter seemed to be making up leeway Levedag failed to permanently improve his position, the Scaup coming in with seven or eight lengths to spare. The race was rowed in the rain.

Poole got away, with Goddard close up, the latter, however, being replaced shortly after by Alcock. Kluss, No. 3 in the Pelican, broke his stretcher after the first few strokes, but in spite of this Hayward managed to pass Alcock and came on terms with Poole, eventually winning by half a length. Alcock's boat was close up as third. Goddard was quite out of it.

The Ladies Purse was presented by Miss Trippler, and the rest of the prizes by Mrs. Tegner.

THE ROBBERY AT MESSRS. HERB'S.

Yano Zensai was charged in the Chitose Saibansho the other day with stealing a number of curios from the sample room of Messrs. Herb & Co., No. 76, Settlement, some time ago, leaving a letter behind signed "Divine Fox Lad" in which he gave his reason for the theft. He was sentenced to 8 years' imprisonment with hard labour. Three others were sentenced to five and six years' imprisonment.

CRICKET.

PRESIDENT'S XI. v. CAPTAIN'S XXII.

Saturday was a miserable day for outdoor sports. Showers fell in the early morning and then the sky partially cleared; but as the day advanced the clouds again gathered and by half past three a heavy downpour set in that lasted well on into the late afternoon, to recommence again after sunset. The cricket match arranged between teams headed respectively by the President and Captain had consequently to be abandoned after an hour or so of play. The score was:—

M.M.S. "VICTORIOUS" VERSUS Y.C. AND A.C.

The third match of the season—the return for the Victorious—was played on Tuesday afternoon. The Captain of the home eleven had the usual difficulty in getting his men together, although a goodly number had promised to play: eventually seven came on the field and the usual visitors lent another man, Sergeant May, and the game proceeded. The Club, going in first, made 123 for seven wickets, and then the Victorious went to bat and knocked up 130, though, taking wicket for wicket, the Club has the better record. Score:

THE QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY MATCH.

This match—an almost immemorial fixture in Yokohama—came off on Wednesday, but, unlike the experience of former years, did not attract many people. Players were late arriving and consequently it was twenty minutes past 11 before Duff managed to get the first men out to the wicket. The sides were captained by Mr. Duff and Mr. Stewart respectively. Stewart's side went in first, H. W. Kilby and W. J. White facing the bowling of Clarke and Murdoch. There was not much resistance, however, and by half-past twelve the whole side were out for 53 runs.

An adjournment was then made for tiffin—capitally put on by the Club Hotel,—and for the first time for ten years Mr. J. P. Mollison, President of the Club, was absent from the chair—sickness = home preventing. To Mr. Duff, therefore, fell the honour of proposing "The Queen," which was most loyally received. Resuming, play was kept up till 5.05 p.m., when stumps were drawn.

CHINESE AFFAIRS.

The British barque Fortisist, Captain Gil-mour, 2,962 tons, which left New York on the 30th of October last, arrived at Woosung on May 18th with 129,000 cases, the largest quantity of oil ever brought in the Yangtze in one sailing-vessel. Another sailing-vessel and the steamer Palatina also arrived with oil, making a total amount of 344,000 cases in one day.

Summarising a recent Imperial Edict which has just been issued in China regarding the status of missionaries within that Empire, the N. C. Daily News says—"It is a very decided advance to see the Throne at Peking recognising the equality of the Bishops with Viceroys and Governors, Archdeacons with Provincial Treasurers, Judges, and Taotais, and what one correspondent, himself an English missionary, calls 'common or garden missionaries' with prefects, sub-prefects, and district magistrates; and authorising them to negotiate directly with these officials in cases of trouble." Continuing our contemporary says:—"China is a land of surprises, and it is a surprise to find the Empress Dowager and her advisers agreeing to the issue of such a decree as this. The object, no doubt, is to relieve Peking from, and throw on the shoulder of the provincial authorities, the settlement of the missionary disputes and troubles which occupy so much and so constantly the Diplomatic Body and the Tsungli Yamén. How far the provincial authorities will approve of the decree in practice remains to be seen. They have often chafed in the past at the claims to official rank and dignity made by the representatives of the Roman Catholic Church; it will be interesting to see how they will tolerate being made to recognise these claims as confirmed by the Throne. That the decree will cause more friction than it will allay unless it is applied with the greatest suavity and forbearance, seems almost certain.

Says a Shanghai paper:—"The new Japanese steamer Taiwan steers so badly that she had to drop her anchor 38 times between Hankow and Ichang, and her hawsepipes were nearly worn out by the time she reached Ichang.

A Tientsin dispatch, printed in the A. C. Daily News, reports a serious fight between Mahomedans and Manchus in the city of Pao-tsing on the 15th ultimo, the outcome of a feud last year arising out of a trivial dispute between a Mahomedan and a Manchu of that city. Some twenty odd lives were lost last year during the dispute, which was temporarily stopped by the local authorities in December last, after much trouble owing to the weakness of the mandarins. On the 15th ultimo, however, some dozen or so Mahomedans ran against a like number of Manchus in the public thoroughfares, and, as neither side would give way, they came to blows again, each side being gradually augmented as the fighting progressed, until, when a large force of disciplined cavalry appeared on the scene, the combined forces of the combatants amounted to nearly a thousand men. All were armed with revolvers and swords, with half-a-dozen jingals a side, so when the military appeared to stop the battle nearly thirty of the fighters had been killed or drowned, the latter in their attempt to escape arrest having thrown themselves into the stream which ran a short distance from the battlefield. The local mandarins, as usual, were powerless to stop the fight at its inception, and had to send several miles away to a brigade of horse and foot for help. Had this military force not appeared the victors in the fight would have had the opportunity of sacking the city of Pao-tsing.

A local rising has occurred in Feng-lu, Kwangtung; from 4,000 to 5,000 men, mostly Chowchow men, having revolted against the authorities. Several villages outside the district have been plundered, and the rebels are only held in check by the village volunteers. On the 8th instant a battalion of troops sent from Canton arrived at Shanmei. They will reinforce a battalion already stationed there, and will shortly advance upon the insurgents' stronghold.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The Prince Imperial is reported to have nearly recovered from his recent indisposition.

The American gunboat Bennington has gone into dock at Hongkong, having damaged herself somewhat by running on to a reef while chasing a filibustering vessel near Iloilo.

A case of cholera and one of dysentery are reported at Wakabacho, and at Todamachi, near Yokohama, respectively. The patients are receiving treatment in the Hospital for Contagious Diseases.

The case of the notorious Ochanomiden murderer Matsudaira was heard on the 16th in the 1st Section for Criminal Cases in the Court of Cassation. On the 19th, the Court delivered judgment. It found no ground for appeal, and upheld the sentence of penal servitude for life given in the Miyagi Appeal Court.

H.M.S. Brisk left Hongkong for Wei-hai-wei on May 10th. As this was the third time that the Brisk essayed the voyage it was hoped by the China Mail, that she might gain her destination without accident. Once she had to return in consequence of an accident to the Whiting; she went out a second time and returned next afternoon, having been in collision with a junk. The junk was afterwards blown up.

A Malay fisherman came by his death in a strange way at Tanjong-Tokong (Penang) the other day. He was fishing in a boat when a skipjack or spear-fish, a foot and a quarter long or thereabouts, came skimming along the surface and dashed its sharp snout on his chest, right over the heart, inflicting a wound about the size of a ten cent. piece. The poor man gave one yell and immediately fell back. Death from loss of blood followed within a few minutes.

A strange accident happened at a village near Leicester on 7th April during an entertainment which was being given in a Board-school. One of the scenes in a dramatic piece was a fight between British and Chinese. The guns employed were old muzzle-loading weapons, and it was of course intended that only caps should be used. One of the guns, however, proved to contain an old charge of powder and sparrow-shot, which went off, and seven persons were injured. One unfortunate lad subsequently died, and another will probably lose the sight of both eyes.

The number of Japanese and foreign ships which entered and left Yokohama during April was as follows: Entering:—Japanese steamers 125 (135,816 tons) with 1726 passengers; Japanese sailing ships 4 (1,513 tons). Foreign steamers 36 (83,546 tons); foreign sailing ships 7 (12,097 tons); foreign warships 4 (43,600 tons). Leaving:—Japanese steamers 120 (127,969 tons) with 911 passengers; Japanese sailing ships 3 (1,338 tons). Foreign steamers 35 (79,546 tons); foreign sailing ships 1 (1,399 tons); foreign warships 3 (33,100 tons).

The death of Lieut. F. Sisson, of the First Nebraska, at Manila and the finding of his fiancée's photograph near his heart where the fatal bullet entered, is the final chapter in a pretty romance. The photograph is a likeness of Miss Anna Taylor, one of the belles of Columbus, Nebraska. The young girl is inconsolable and her grief is pathetic to witness. When the sweethearts parted Lieut. Sisson carried a circular photograph of the girl hung by a ribbon from his neck. He wore it under his vest and laughingly remarked that he would wear the photograph on the left side and if a bullet took his life from that direction it must first pass through the likeness of the girl he loved best.

The Anti-Semite manifestations in Algiers would be funny if they were not likely at any moment to turn to massacre. M. Max Régis has been arrested for a more than usually outrageous speech, and was captured in the abode of some luminary of the café concert. A meeting of protest against his arrest was organised but forbidden by the Prefect, and the partisans had no other way of showing displeasure than to meet an unlucky member of the Senate, M. Géroente, just arrived from France, and escort him to his destination with boots and hisses; the booters being led by the Mayor's deputy and a municipal councillor. The Anti-Jews are nothing if not thorough. The town council had voted by way of honorific to present to M. Marchand a "panoply" of native armour. It turned out however that the "panoply" could only be procured from a certain merchant who was not indeed a Jew but had friends among the Jews: and so the council renounced the panoply and decided on a bronze which they could order from an Anti-Jew trader.

JAPANESE FINANCE.

(FROM "THE TIMES.")

Tokyo, February 11.

More than a year ago a full statement of the condition of Japanese finance was published in The Times. The figures indicated a sound state of affairs, and showed that, since her war with China, Japan had begun to take fuller advantage of her opportunities and develop her resources with greater vigour, the resulting increase of expenditure was in no sense excessive or injudicious. Two of her main sources of revenue still offered large margins—the tax imposed upon sake, which occupies in Japan much the same position as that held by beer in England, and the land tax. The former amounted to only 4½d. per gallon, and the latter produced a revenue of only 3½ million pounds sterling, whereas a hundred years ago the same impost gave to the State an income of fully 20 millions, measured by modern standards of value. Many other sources of revenue were capable of considerable development, and, further, the amount of taxation per head of population was remarkably small, so that, on the whole, Japanese financiers ought to have had a very simple task. But since the publication of that statement things have not marched smoothly, and an impression now seems to prevail in Europe and America that Japan's economic condition is unsound. It is not difficult to trace the origin of that impression. By way of preface, a brief outline of salient facts will be necessary.

Japan's economic history in modern times may be divided into three epochs—the epoch of fiat currency, which lasted from 1871 to 1885; the epoch subsequent to the resumption of specie payments but prior to the war with China—namely, from 1887 to 1895; and the post bellum epoch, from 1896 to 1905. The first epoch need not occupy us here. The second, chronologically speaking, ought to commence in 1886, but 1887 is taken as its initial year, because the effects of the drastic measures adopted in emerging from the fiat currency had only then ceased to be factors of economic disturbance. During the eight years covered by this ante-bellum epoch, the normal revenue of the State rose from 1½ millions sterling to 9 millions, and the ordinary expenditure fluctuated between 7½ and 8½ millions. The rule, practically invariable, was an excess of revenue, and the net result of the eight years' working showed a total surplus of 7½ million pounds. Those were the halcyon days of Japanese finance. A nation of 40 millions of people, developing its trade and resources at an extraordinary rate, equipping itself with all the appliances of Western civilization, and managing its affairs at a cost of only 4s. a head, presented a rare specimen of economic healthfulness. The Diet, which met for the first time in 1891, had not to vote fresh supplies; its chief trouble was how to deal with the surplus. That ought to have been a simple question, seeing that a substantial increase of the Navy was among the universally acknowledged needs of the time. But the members of the House of Representatives had two pledges to fulfil; a pledge to themselves that they would drive the "Clan Statesmen" out of power, and a pledge to the electors that they would reduce the land tax. The so-called "Clan Statesmen" had governed the country with conspicuous ability for a quarter of a century. There was no reason for their removal except that others wanted their places. The land tax was a mere fraction of what it had been in feudal times. There was no reason for its reduction except that the agricultural class expected some recompense from the men whom they had returned to Parliament. A struggle ensued which did much to impair the national credit. The Government asked the Lower House to devote a portion of the surplus to naval increment. The House refused on the plea that the duty of spending public money could not be entrusted to the "Clan Statesmen"; could not be entrusted to the men under whose skillful management the surplus had accrued. At the same time, the House set itself to effect reductions of the State expenditures, in order to provide means for lowering the land tax, and, as a matter of course, this project was supported by insistent declarations that the farmers groaned under imposts which in reality they scarcely felt. Intervention by the Emperor induced the House to vote a part of the surplus for shipbuilding, and the war with China disposed of the remainder. The war had also the effect of enlarging the nation's financial horizon, so that the Diet consented to engage in schemes of armaments expansion and productive development which not merely put an end to all hope of reducing the land tax, but even necessitated the finding of new sources of revenue.

This brings us to the third epoch, the post-bellum period. Again omitting a year—the year (1895-96) immediately following the war—we have to consider the decade from 1896-97 to 1895-06, and perhaps the easiest way of arriving at a clear idea is to set down at once the normal revenue and the normal expenditure for each year of that period, according to present estimates:—

(A.)
	Ordinary Revenue in Million Sterling.	Ordinary Expenditure in Millions Sterling.
1896-97.....	10 41	10 48
1897-98.....	12 14	11 05
1898-99.....	12 94	11 81
1899-1900.....	17 71	14 07
1900-01.....	19 09	13 81
1901-02.....	19 46	14 33
1902-03.....	19 95	14 55
1903-04.....	19 97	14 71
1904-05.....	19 98	14 73
1905-06.....	20 40	14 75
Total	172 95	134 29

This table shows surpluses aggregating 38 2-3 millions sterling in the decade. But it must be noted that the figures refer to ordinary incomes and outgoings only. In other words, they show the normal permanent financial incomes and outgoings, independently of the special and terminable enterprises upon which the State embarked after the war. Treating the latter similarly, we have this table:—

(B.)
	Extraordinary Revenue in Millions Sterling.	Extraordinary Expenditure in Millions Sterling.
1896-97.....	9 9	9 8
1897-98.....	13 8	13 9
1898-99.....	7 8	10 4
1899-1900.....	4 9	8 5
1900-01.....	3 3	6 3
1901-02.....	2 8	4 9
1902-03.....	1 5	3 0
1903-04.....	0 6	1 6
1904-05.....	0 3	1 5
1905-06.....	0 3	1 3
Total	45 2	61 2

Here we have excesses aggregating 16 millions on the side of expenditures, so that the net result of the two tables is a surplus income of 22 2-3 millions, and we are in a position to say that, as a mere matter of account, the programme is sound.

At this point two questions naturally present themselves—first, may we confidently assume that, so far as can be now seen, Japan will commence the fiscal year 1906-07 with an accumulated surplus of 22 2-3 millions sterling, and with an annual revenue some five millions greater than her expenditure, or are there some other sources of expenditure which, though not yet actually operative, must be anticipated; secondly, what are the extraordinary revenues and the extraordinary expenditures shown in the above table (B)? The simplest plan will be to answer the latter question first.

The extraordinary expenditures for the decennial period divide themselves into two general headings—outlays on account of armaments expansion, and outlays on account of works directly or indirectly productive. According to the Government's original programme, a sum of 21½ millions sterling was to have been spent on naval increase and a sum of eight millions on military expansion. It has been found, however, that owing to appreciation of the prices of labour and commodities the contemplated works of fortification, barrack building, &c., will involve larger outlays than the first estimates, and the same factor has more or less disturbed the calculations relating to other enterprises. A close approximation to the practical facts is furnished by the following table:—

ARMAMENTS EXPANSION. (In millions sterling.)
Navy	22
Army	10
—32—
EXPENDITURES DIRECTLY OR INDIRECTLY PRODUCTIVE.—(In millions sterling.)
Telephone expansion	1.5
Railway construction and improvement	12.0
Building and equipment of an iron foundry	2.0
Establishment of a system of tobacco monopoly	1.4
Riparian works	2.0
Harbour construction	0.8
Aids to banks	2.0
Educational works, surveys, various enterprises, &c.	7.5
—29.2—
61.2

We turn now to explain the sources of the extraordinary revenue, totalling 45.2 millions sterling, shown in Table B. These are:—

(D.)	Millions sterling.
Taken from the China indemnity ...	28.4
To be obtained by a domestic loan ...	13.5
Surplus revenue from ante-bellum period ...	1.3
Extraordinary annual revenue from various sources ...	2.1
	45.3

Reverting now to the first of the two questions propounded above—namely, whether expenditures other than those set down in the tables may be anticipated during the post-bellum period, the answer must be in the affirmative. One additional expenditure of half-a-million sterling annually will certainly be incurred from the year 1900-01 in connexion with the transfer of the provincial prisons to the control of the Central Government. At present the gaols, with few exceptions, are managed according to the system that prevailed in England prior to the Act of 1877. Their administration is in the hands of the local authorities, and the results are want of uniformity in carrying out legal penalties, and many serious defects in the buildings, and their equipment. The Government intends to introduce a project of law in the next session of the Diet for transferring prison charges from the local rates to the Exchequer; a reform which will add half a million annually to the latter's burdens. Another source of inevitable expenditure is Formosa. It was predicted in the last résumé of Japanese finance published by The Times that Formosa would probably cause a discrepancy in the Government's estimates of income and outlay for the post-bellum period, the expense of administering the island having been under-calculated. That forecast has proved correct. It is true that the finances of the new dominion are steadily improving. During the second year (1896-97) of its occupation the revenue collected was only £670,000, whereas it is expected to exceed £900,000 in 1899-1900. But that amount falls short of even the ordinary expenditures by £50,000, and when the military and naval outlays are added, as well as the cost of fortifications and of various necessary undertakings, the final result is that the expenditures exceed the revenue by £1,250,000. These figures will doubtless become more favourable by and by, but for the purpose of a financial estimate it seems safest to take them as they now present themselves. The Government is unwilling to tax Formosa in these early days on account of the troops, gendarmes, and ships stationed there, or the fortifications undertaken for Imperial purposes. The building of railways, the laying of roads, the construction of harbours, and so on will be separately treated. A loan of six million pounds is to be raised for those purposes, its expenditure being spread over years. But from 1900-01 there will be included in the burdens of the Exchequer a sum of 1½ million pounds on account of the island's regular yearly outlays. If we add to this sum the prison expenditures referred to above, as well as an annual appropriation of £50,000 which will be made from 1900-01 onwards to form a relief fund, the result is that the expenditures in tables A and B must be increased by 1.8 million pounds annually during the last six years of the post-bellum period, and thus the surplus of 22-2.3 millions there shown as accruing from the ten years' working is reduced to 11½ millions approximately.

Such is the Government's estimate. The project is to employ this surplus of 11½ million pounds for the purpose of repaying drafts made upon the China indemnity in connexion with the general accounts for the years 1896-97 to 1899-1900. The Government, in short, desires gradually to form an accumulation which shall be available in case of emergency.

May we then finally accept the above forecast, and look forward confidently to an accrued surplus of over 11 million pounds in 1906? Again the answer must be unfavourable. Two items of almost certain expenditure are still omitted from the official calculations. They are appropriations for the maintenance and repair of the navy and for the subsidizing of steamship services. Formosa, the maintenance of the navy, and grants in aid of navigation were all cited as probable factors of disturbance in the previous financial résumé published by The Times. Formosa has now been included in the accounts, but the other two items are still omitted. Allowing one million pounds for the navy and half a million for navigation subsidies, we have a total expenditure of 10½ millions on these accounts during the last six years of the post-bellum period, and our surplus of 11 millions practically disappears. To make these results quite clear it will be well to recapitulate them arithmetically:—

	Millions sterling.
Annual revenue at close of post-bellum period (Table A) ...	20
Annual expenditures at same time:—
Expenditure shown in Table A...
Formosa (1.25), prisons (0.5), relief fund (0.05) ...	1.8
Maintenance of the navy ...	1.2
Subsidies to navigation ...	0.5
	18.2
Excess of revenue over expenditure...	1.8

It appears, therefore, that although there will probably be no accrued surplus, or, at any rate, only an insignificant amount, at the end of the post-bellum period, there will be a considerable excess of revenue—18 million yen is a very substantial sum in Japanese accounts—and that, too, on the very extreme supposition that Formosa continues to be as great a burden as ever to the Exchequer. Of course, unforeseen events may disturb this estimate, but it appears sound enough within the limits of any visible contingencies.

Confronted by these figures, one is perplexed to understand why an idea should have gained currency in Europe that Japanese finance is unsound. There are various explanations. The first is that, simple as the statements made above may seem, they have been obtained by analysing a mass of statistics published in the Japanese language, and, therefore, inaccessible to outsiders in general. Japanese financiers behave as though they were quite careless of foreign opinion. They know that the country has not sufficient capital to work out its industrial and commercial destiny unaided, and that recourse must ultimately be had to Western money markets. Yet they trust that some chance investigator will enlighten the Western world as to their economic condition. A second reason is that the people's contributions to the Exchequer have grown greatly since the war with China. A State which paid its way handsomely with eight millions sterling in 1894 requires 14 millions in 1899 for the same purpose. That is, of course, a startling fact—an increase of 75 per cent. in a period of five years—and it becomes even more striking when stated in terms of income, for, whereas the revenue was nine millions in 1894, it will be 18 millions in 1900. Comparison of these figures suggests an apprehension that the country may be overstraining its resources and embarking upon unjustifiable enterprises. To test the justice of such a fear we must make a slightly detailed but simple analysis, commencing with the departmental outlays:—

ORDINARY EXPENDITURES.

(In millions sterling.)

	1894-95.	1899-1900
Civil List ...	0.3	0.3
Foreign Office ...	0.075	0.225

Education ...	0.10	0.325
Agriculture and Commerce ...	0.10	0.30
Communications ...	0.55	1.50
Total...	6.48	14.00

This table shows that the bulk of the increased expenditure appears in the sections of Finance, War, the Navy, and Communications, these four being responsible for 5.675 millions out of the total increment of 7.52 millions. In fact, the additional outlays on account of the other six departments of State amount to only 1.845 million pounds, which cannot be considered extravagant in a country so progressive as Japan. As to the increased expenditures of the Finance Department, they are easily understood when we observe that the service of the public debt now costs 3.13 millions annually, whereas it cost only two millions before the war, and that the department defrays all expenses in connexion with pensions and the collection of taxes. There are two points worth noticing in this context. The first is that Japan's total annual expenditure on account of pensions and rewards is only £413,000; the second, that the aggregate yearly cost of collecting all her taxes, including the Customs duties and the working of the tobacco monopoly, is only £379,000. It has to be noticed, also, that one million of the increase in the outlays of the Communications Department is for developing and improving the telegraphic service, a special and terminable expenditure which the Government has nevertheless thought fit to include in the ordinary outgoings of the department. With regard to the expenditures in the departments of War and the Navy, a large increment was, of course, inevitable in view of the expansion of the services. The two departments now cost 5½ million pounds annually, whereas they cost only 1½ million before the war. This explanation conveys a sufficiently accurate idea of the growth of the ordinary outlays; the extraordinary have already been considered.

The revenue remains to be examined. Pursuing the plan hitherto followed, we have these figures:—

REVENUE DERIVED FROM DIRECT TAXES.
(In millions sterling.)
	1894.	1899.
Land Tax ...	3.900	4.650
Sake and Soy Tax ...	1.775	5.225

It appears from the first of these two tables that the direct taxes have been virtually doubled during the past five years; a result which sounds formidable until we come to observe that more than 50 per cent. of the increase is borne by sake. The best judges are of opinion that the tax on sake is very little felt by the people, and that the rate might be greatly increased without inconvenience. It is now 7½d. per gallon. The land tax, it will be observed, has been increased from 3.99 millions to 4.65 millions, a difference of 0.75 millions pounds, or 7½ millions yen. This paltry addition of £750,000 is chiefly responsible for the discredit attaching to Japanese finance in the eyes of foreigners. It was shown in the last analysis published by The Times that the burden of the land tax is not even half of what it was 25 years ago, and that the revenue derived from it in feudal times, when the population was smaller, the area under cultivation less extensive, and the country not nearly so prosperous as it is to-day, quadrupled the revenue now obtained. That the tax might be greatly increased without entailing the least hardship is beyond all question. But there is the old romantic difficulty that the representatives of the rural districts, having entered Parliament under a pledge to their constituencies to insist on the reduction of this particular tax, cannot yet reconcile themselves to vote for its increase. The tax, if properly assessed, ought not to have the character of an agricultural impost. But its incidence at present is most unjust, urban lands being valued for the purposes of the levy at rates which are tactically small. Owing to this glaring defect, the land tax, instead of offering to Japanese financiers a unique opportunity to gradually establish the single-tax system, assumes the aspect of a burden imposed on the farming class alone to the exclusion of the mercantile and manufacturing community. It will easily be conjectured that political agitators have not failed to utilize these facts. Japanese parties have long been perplexed to find differentiating platforms, and the Progressives, under Count Okuma's astute leadership, snatched up this land-tax question eagerly and made it their principal plank so soon as their opponents, the Constitutionists, showed a disposition to abandon it. The Government's plan was to rely solely on sake and land for the necessary increments of revenue, a simple and sound programme. But the Constitutional party, though willing to vote for some increase of the land tax, felt bound to save its credit with the rural constituencies by cutting down the Government's proposals from one-and-a-half million to three-quarters of a million, and it consequently became necessary to find some minor sources of revenue by way of compensation for this reduction in the proposed yield of the land tax. The sum to be ultimately provided was a mere bagatelle—less than £600,000; but an apparently interminable dispute arose about the best means of obtaining it, and thus Japan presented to the world the spectacle of a country reduced to such financial straits that it could not make provision for an expenditure which in England would be covered twice over by an addition of a penny to the income-tax. The difficulty was, of course, purely political, not in any sense economical; but the effect on the national credit was equally bad, especially as the Government finally allowed itself to adopt the pernicious device of changing the halfpenny post into a three-farthings rate in order to obtain an additional income of £200,000. In truth the essentially defective feature of Japan's finance is that she imposes nine petty taxes which, though vexatious to the people and costly to collect, produce a gross revenue of only two-and-a-quarter millions sterling.

Of course the chief doubt entertained by many people with regard to Japanese finance is whether her expenditures on account of armaments under her present programme do not exceed her economic ability. Perhaps the best evidence on that point is furnished by comparing the ratios that her various outlays bore to her aggregate expenditure before she embarked upon her new programme, with the ratios that they will bear to it after the programme is completed:—

Fiscal year.	Army.	Navy.	Armament.	Debt.	Administration.	Total.
1890-91	19.03	8.82	27.85	28.65	43.50	100
1905-06	20.67	11.22	31.48	27.74	40.78	100

In 1890 the strength of the army on a peace footing was 68,000 of all arms, and on a war footing, 247,000; and the navy comprised 34 vessels of all classes with a total displacement of 58,000 tons. In 1905 the peace strength of the army will be 140,000, and its war footing 530,000, and the navy will comprise 67 ships—including four line-of-battle ships from 12,000 to 15,000 tons, and six first-class armoured cruisers of 9,200 tons—with an aggregate displacement of 258,000 tons, supplemented by 11 torpedo-catchers and 115 torpedo-boats. These large increments of strength do not seem to be dearly purchased at an additional appropriation of 3½ per cent. of the aggregate expenditures.

The national debt amounts at present to 42 million pounds, in round numbers, the whole of which is domestic, with the exception of four millions, representing a sale of war bonds made by the Treasury to a British syndicate in the spring of 1898. Amortization goes on steadily year by year, so that the debt, even when increased as the above programme indicates, will never exceed 53 millions. It will reach its maximum in 1902 and will be completely discharged in 1933, according to present estimates. Concerning the burden of this debt and of taxation in Japan as compared with other countries, a clear idea may be obtained from the following table, based on the figures of the fiscal year 1899-1900, in Japan's case, and on those for 1898 in the cases of the other countries referred to:—

BURDEN PER HEAD OF POPULATION IN YEN, ANNUALLY.

	Admini- strative Ex- pendi- ture.	National Debt.
England &.....	9.914	14.962
France	9.091	12.215
Germany	6.420	5.445
Russia	4.021	9.350
United States	2.675	7.831
Italy	4.127	9.902
Spain	3.606	6.149
Holland	6.429	10.919
Belgium	3.183	13.171
Japan	2.467	1.999

In connexion with this part of the subject an important explanation is necessary. It has already been stated that, to carry out her post-bellum programme, Japan must raise loans to the extent of 25½ millions, namely, 13½ millions in the form of public undertakings bonds and 12 millions in the form of railway bonds. The original idea was to obtain this money in the domestic market. But that is now clearly seen to be impossible. Japanese capitalists can easily find investments far more profitable than five per cent. bonds, especially since the latter have ceased to be appreciating securities and show a tendency to depreciate only. Between April, 1896, and April, 1899, a total sum of 11 million pounds, in round numbers, should have been raised under the above system of loans, and bonds to the extent of five millions were actually issued. But only 1½ million worth were taken by the public. The Treasury itself had to buy in the remainder, using a part of the Chinese indemnity for the purpose. Briefly speaking, the Government during the past three years has been making drafts upon the indemnity to defray outlays which should have been covered with the proceeds of domestic loans. The drain upon the indemnity has not, however, been so great as this bold statement suggests, for the post-bellum works have not been carried out with the speed originally contemplated. Instead of spending 15½ millions between April, 1896, and April, 1898—the accounts for the year ending March 31, 1899, are, of course, still incomplete—the total outlay was only 10½ millions. Many factors combined to cause delay, but chief among them was the impossibility of procuring labour, expert as well as ordinary, in the required quantity without seriously disturbing economic conditions. It is unnecessary, however, to enter into detailed explanations of these points. The broad facts are that the post-bellum undertakings have to be carried out, that money is not obtainable in the domestic market, as was originally planned, and that Japan has to go abroad for aid. So far as can be foreseen at present she will have to incur a foreign debt of about 24 million pounds during the next six years. In that interval conditions may change, and her bonds may once more find buyers at home, but no such prospect presents itself now. The Government has accordingly obtained the Diet's sanction to go abroad for money instead of seeking it at home, and has resolved to issue sterling bonds, with the conditions as to interest, redemption period, and so forth clearly printed on the face. The amount of the first issue is not yet fixed, but it ought to be about 10 millions in the programme is adhered to. The rate of interest is expected to be 4 per cent., and the Government will naturally try to obtain the loan in instalments so as to meet, without exceeding, the gradual requirements of the various works.

The question whether Japan has been betrayed into expenditures exceeding her economic capacity has been to some extent answered above, but a few words may be added. There are several other ways of looking at the problem. One of the first that suggests itself is to consider whether standards of value have not altered so as to call for some correction in the amount of the taxes now levied before comparing them with the taxes levied in former years. Thus, in the tables given above Japanese currency has been reduced to sterling uniformly at the present price of the yen, namely, 2s. approximately. But the yen was worth 3s. a few years ago, and unless its purchasing power in terms of commodities has remained unaltered it is plain that when the taxpayer is asked for a yen to-day the demand may seem much less formidable to him than it would have seemed ten years ago. Here are some figures which will help to elucidate that phase of the problem:—

Price of rice per koku in yen...	7.066	7.338	7.407	8.813
Average price of 49 staple commodities (excluding rice), taking 100 as the normal ...	100	106	108	117
Rate of interest	9.39	8.37	7.19	9.32
Price of 5 per cent. public securities (100 yen face value)	100.451	101.710	100.970	105.267

	1895.	1896.	1897.	1898.
Price of rice per koku in yen...	8.880	9.534	11.891	15.647
Average price of 49 staple commodities (excluding rice), taking 100 as the normal ...	126	136	152	163
Rate of interest	9.69	9.29	10.21	11.39
Price of 5 per cent. public securities (100 yen face value)	99.690	100.336	97.950	93.950

These figures show that the yen of 1899 represents to the taxpayer a very much smaller amount of commodities and labour than the yen of 1891 represented, and that the value of the coin for purposes of State expenditure also has greatly, though not equally, diminished—not equally, because, while the price of labour has increased from 60 to 70 per cent. in the past years, the salaries of administrative officials have remained unaltered. Instead of saying, therefore, that the direct taxes aggregated 6½ millions sterling in 1891, whereas they aggregate 12 millions to-day, it would probably be more correct to set down 10 and 12 as the figures for comparison. Then, again, discussing the principal sources of direct taxation, we may note that the rate on tobacco is only 2½d. per lb.; the rate on sake 7½d. per gallon; and the rate on the land about 0.66 per cent. of the gross produce, whereas it was from 40 to 50 per cent. in feudal times—figures which do not suggest onerous burdens or anything like exhaustion of the most legitimate sources of revenue. Yet another method of considering the question is to examine statistics of the countries' recent economical progress. For that purpose the most convincing figures are those that tell the story of the last three years, during two of which the increased taxes have been levied:—

	1895.	1896.
Number of banks...	1,019	1,789
Capital of banks ...	12½ mil.	25½ mil.
Number of commercial industrial, &c., companies.....	2,104	5,280
Capital of companies ...	10½ mil.	38½ mil.
Mileage of railways open to traffic ...	2,290	3,289
Value of foreign trade...	26½ mil.	44½ mil.
Number of post-offices...	3,076	4,288
Number of mail matters	448,071,687	550,918,484
Number of telegraph stations ...	784	1,256
Length of telegraph lines in miles ...	30,330	47,895
Deposits (by private individuals) in banks ...	19 mil.	31 mil.
Cleaning-house returns (Tokyo and Osaka)...	36½ "	101½ "
Insurance (life and fire) —number of policy-holders ...	157,000	510,000
Amount of policies ...	4½ mil.	12 mil.
Paper currency ...	18½ "	18½ "
Gold coins and subsidiary silver coins in circulation ...	6½ "	9½ "
Specie reserve in Bank of Japan ...	8 "	9 "
Securities reserve in Bank of Japan ...	6½ "	5½ "

These figures do not appear to call for any comment. They show remarkably rapid and substantial economic development. There can be no doubt that a very short rice crop in 1897, and the consequent necessity of paying four millions sterling in 1898 for supplies of grain from abroad, helped to accentuate sharply and rapidly the depression which, under any circumstances, must have succeeded to the period of feverish speculation and inflated prices immediately following the victorious war with China. Nature came to the rescue with a splendid harvest in 1898, and already a much easier feeling begins to prevail. But two things are certain. The first is that the Japanese people, and above all, their Parliamentary representatives, have not yet reconciled themselves to the expenditures demanded by the empire's new rôle on the world's stage. The preparations for the coup that brought military éclat and high international status to the country had been carried on so quietly and inexpensively that the public took no note of their magnitude and did not foresee the responsibilities consequent upon their successful employment. The Japanese are no longer a merely interesting nation, with artistic instincts, quaint traditions, and an island home pretty and pleasant in many ways but so remote from the centres of political influence as to be unworthy of statesmen's consideration. They have become the leading Power of the East, and simultaneously with the development of strength which gives them the casting vote in any dispute involving Oriental interests, the source of European friction has been transferred from Constantinople to Peking, so that they find themselves standing, arms in hand, on the very verge of the arena where a world-moving struggle seems destined to take place. Whichever side they espouse when they step into the lists can scarcely fail of victory. But they have not risen morally to the station won by them materially. They waste their energies and their time over infinitesimally petty domestic disputes, political and personal, and they wrangle for weeks inside and outside the Diet over a new expenditure or an additional impost of a few thousands of pounds, thus crippling the energies of their statesmen and conveying to the world a very false impression of the country's financial condition. The second point is that Japan has been working too long with her own capital only. The supply is practically exhausted, and money has become so dear that innumerable opportunities for the profitable employment of moderately cheap capital remain necessarily unutilized.

Commenting on the foregoing, The Times, in its leading columns, says:—

The exhaustive survey of Japanese finance which we publish in another column from our Tokyo Correspondent should recall attention to a factor in the Far Eastern problem of which the importance is perhaps apt to be overlooked for the simple reason that the forces which it represents work so silently and steadily. Ever since the Japanese sword pricked the bubble of China's "latent power" the eyes of the world have been fixed upon the struggle of international rivalries which, amidst the general disintegration of the Empire, has converted the Chinese capital into the cockpit of European diplomacy. From that struggle Japan has on the whole hitherto kept outwardly aloof, though there can be little doubt about the keen and vigilant interest with which she watches its vicissitudes. Disastrous as was the war to her immediate antagonist, Japan could hardly congratulate herself unreservedly upon its results. She was not only compelled to forego a considerable part of the fruits of her victories, but she has had the mortification of seeing them pass into the hands of a Power far more formidable than China. There is perhaps no more striking proof of the political maturity to which Japan has attained than the self-restraint she has exercised in circumstances so galling to the pride of a young and self-confident nation. In the very flush of victory she recognized the weak joints of her armour, and, instead of rashly taking up a challenge which, however unprovoked, she could not then afford to resent, she bowed to the inevitable, and, without wasting time on useless recriminations over the past, applied herself forthwith to the task of strengthening and completing her equipment. The future, she was resolved, should not again find her unequal to such emergencies as it might hold in reserve for her. It was no small task which her statesmen contemplated, but they had faith in the patriotism of the people. They prepared their plans without delay, but also without any feverish precipitancy, and then, equally without secrecy and without ostentation, they laid them before the Japanese Parliament. They told their fellow-countrymen frankly and fearlessly that, if Japan was to fulfil the part assigned to her, as every Japanese believes, by her traditions and position, it would be necessary for her not only to go on developing her natural resources, extending her trade, building up her industry, but also to place her naval and military forces on a level, and perhaps on more than a level, with those of other Powers claiming vital interests in the Far East. Heavy as were the sacrifices to which the Japanese Government asked the country to pledge itself, the burden was assumed without a murmur. There have been changes of Government since then and differences of opinion with regard to financial details, but no attempt has ever been made to modify the main features of the far-reaching programme to which Japan stands committed.

That programme, it will be seen from the careful and lucid array of figures in our Correspondent's article, was estimated to cost an "extraordinary expenditure" of over £61,000,000 for the ten years ending in 1906. It consisted of two parts—outlay on armaments and outlay on works directly or indirectly reproductive. The sum originally assigned to the first head was 29½ millions sterling, of which 21½ millions were allotted to the navy and eight millions to the army. Of the balance, 12 millions are for railways, two millions for riparian works, two millions for building an iron foundry, two millions for "aids to banks," and no less than 7½ millions for purposes comprehensively described as "educational works, surveys, various enterprises, &c." It was proposed to meet this extraordinary expenditure partly by taking a sum of over 28 millions from the China indemnity, partly by a domestic loan of 13 millions, and to a small extent from other "extraordinary" sources which were expected to bring up the total of the "extraordinary revenue" for the ten years to 45.2 millions sterling. The balance of 16 millions on the wrong side of the account was to be met out of the aggregate surpluses on the ordinary revenue and expenditure for the same period, which were estimated to reach 38 2/3 millions. The net result, therefore, of the two Budgets, ordinary and extraordinary, at the end of the ten years is an estimated surplus of 22 2/3 millions. Our Correspondent's figures do not show year by year how far the estimates of revenue and expenditure have been realized up to date. But they make it quite clear that the original figures will not be borne out by the results. The increased cost of labour and materials has already raised the estimated outlay on the Army from 8 to 10 millions, and it is obvious that this disturbing cause may continue to affect the calculations of the Japanese financiers in the future. Unexpected expenditure has become necessary in several directions. The Government are about to take over the prisons from the local authorities, at an estimated cost of £500,000 a year, and Formosa, as our Correspondent predicted, has proved a serious though decreasing drain, so that Ministers themselves do not seem now to talk of a balance of more than £11,000,000 in 1906. This sum they propose to devote to the formation of an emergency fund, which might presumably serve as a Kriegskasse, but our Correspondent gives some reasons for doubting whether it will be forthcoming. No adequate appropriations, it appears, have been made for the maintenance and repair of the Navy or for subsidizing the steamship services supported by the Government. These two items, in our Correspondent's opinion, will practically swallow up the whole of the accrued surplus. In 1906 Japan, he calculates, will enjoy an excess of revenue of 1.8 millions sterling, but, if she desires to lay up money, she must raise it by other means.

In the meantime, if Japan is to go on with her programme, she must borrow a sum of £25,000,000, and borrow it in the foreign market. The original desire and intention of the Japanese financiers was to rely on domestic loans only. These, however, are no longer possible. Out of the £13,000,000 which might have been issued between April, 1896, and April, 1899, only £5,000,000 has been, in fact, issued, and of this amount only £1,250,000 was taken up by the public, the balance being bought in by the Treasury out of the Chinese indemnity. At first sight this episode does not look encouraging to the foreign investor, and there are other incidents in the recent financial history of the country which are believed to have inspired him with some doubt as to the stability of Japanese finance. Our Correspondent, who certainly shows no desire to speak unjustifiably smooth things to the Japanese, has no hesitation in declaring such doubts to be without solid foundation. It is true that expenditure has risen from eight millions in 1894 to 14 millions in 1899. It is true that the army and the navy now cost 5½ millions, as against 1½ million before the war, and that the direct taxes have been practically doubled within five years. It is true that the Opposition have offered a vigorous resistance to an increase of the land tax. Nevertheless our Correspondent affirms that Japan is more than able to repay any loan she can possibly require. The real reason why the Government cannot get the money it wants at home is the rapid commercial expansion of the country. Native capitalists who can readily get a high return in native industries will not lend to the Government at 5 per cent. The expenditure, though absolutely large, is small in proportion to the resources of the country. The taxes on sahe and on land are low and might readily be increased, and, though the Opposition are troublesome on the subject of the latter impost, they well know that it is about a fourth of what it was in feudal times. The statistics quoted by our Correspondent show how great has been the commercial and industrial expansion of Japan within the last few years. There are, of course, special risks attached to loans of the kind projected, but the chief obstacles to the success of a Japanese application to the European money markets seem to be those mentioned by our Correspondent—the reticence of her financiers, which contrasts strangely with the attitude of M. de Witte—and the reluctance of the Opposition and of a section of the people to face the necessary burden of an increase in the land tax.

TELEGRAMS.

(TELEGRAMS RECEIVED AT THE LEGATION OF FRANCE IN TOKYO.)

LETTER CARRIERS' STRIKE.

Saigon, May 19.
The letter-carriers of Paris went on general strike this morning, in consequence of a vote of the Senate rejecting an appropriation voted by the Chamber of Deputies for improving their emoluments. It was decided that the letters should be distributed in the afternoon by soldiers requisitioned for the purpose.

Saigon, May 20.
The French Cabinet, questioned yesterday in the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, declared that it considered the strike of letter-carriers inadmissible. The Chamber and the Senate endorsed the Government's view. The letter-carriers resumed work during the morning. About thirty of them were dismissed or displaced.

LITERARY HONOURS.

M. Paul Dechanel, President of the Chamber of Deputies, has been elected a member of the French Academy.

PEACE.

The Disarmament Conference has been opened at the Hague. H.E. M. de Staal, Russian Ambassador, was chosen president by acclaim.

A CARNOT MEMORIAL.

Saigon, May 22.
The President of the French Republic has set out with the Prime Minister, M. Dupuy, the Minister of War, and the Minister of Commerce, for Dijon, where the monument erected to the memory of President Carnot is to be unveiled.

THE DREYFUS AFFAIR.

The Councillors of the Court of Cassation are convoked for the 29th instant, for the revision of the Dreyfus affair.

FRENCH COMMERCE.

Saigon, May 23.
The President of the French Republic, in a discourse pronounced by him at a banquet given by the Chamber of Commerce at Dijon, exhorted the French Chambers of Commerce to defend the export commerce against competition which is increasing from day to day. The President and the Ministers were much applauded.

BUBONIC PLAGUE IN EGYPT.

Saigon, May 24.
Some cases of bubonic plague have occurred at Alexandria, Ismailia, and at Zagazig. Drastic sanitary measures have been adopted.

A STRICKEN FRENCH COLONY.

Saigon, May 24.
Grand-Bassam has been evacuated in consequence of an epidemic of yellow fever which prevails there. It is probable that the place will cease to be the capital of the French Ivory Coast.

(FROM THE "JAPAN TIMES.")

PEACE CONFERENCE OPENED.

London, May 19.
The Peace Conference has assembled, and M. Georges de Staal, Russian Ambassador to England, has been elected President of the Conference. Various speeches were made, eulogising the magnanimous motives of the Czar and hoping that the generous scheme may be realized.

TRANSVAAL TREASON AFFAIR.

The Transvaal plot in exciting universal derision.

London, May 20.
The Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, Colonial Secretary, speaking in the House of Commons, stated that Sir Alfred Milner, with the British Government's approval, had accepted the meeting with President Krüger at Bloemfontein on the 31st inst., with the view of settling all the pending difficulties and satisfying the demands of Uitlanders.

NORTHERN GOLD STATION ON FIRE.

London, May 22.
Dawson City, Klondyke, has been almost destroyed by fire, and much gold has been lost.

AMERICAN UNIVERSITY ATHLETES TO VISIT ENGLAND.

The Harvard and Yale athletes are to visit England in July to compete with Oxford and Cambridge.

THE CZAR AND POLITICAL OFFENDERS.

The Czar has personally appointed a committee to consider the cessation of the transportation of political offenders to Siberia.

AUSTRALIAN CRICKETERS IN BETTER LUCK.

The Australians beat an All England Eleven by 172.

AMERICAN OFFER TO THE FILIPINOS.

London, May 23.
America has offered the Filipinos a government similar to that for the Cubans, having a military character, until the country gets settled.

THE "PARIS" IN TROUBLE.

At midnight, last Saturday, the American liner Paris struck the Manacles Rocks, the scene of the Mohegan disaster in October last. Marvellous discipline prevailed and every one of the 780 aboard were saved, and also the mails.

HER MAJESTY'S BIRTHDAY.

London, May 24.
The Queen's birthday was honoured throughout the world, the Colonial Governors observing the day with levees, banquets, and salutes.

President MacKinley cabled congratulations in the name of the American people. In the Transvaal, the Volksraad adjourned its sitting to show respect, and salutes were fired.

NEW JAPANESE LOAN.

A Japanese loan of ten million pounds sterling bearing four per cent. interest and at the price of 90, will be issued next week.

THE TRANSVAAL SITUATION.

The Volksraad has considered President Kruger's franchise reforms. Its tone is unfavourable towards the proposals, as being too liberal, whereas the Uitlanders regard them as absurdly inadequate.

A STEAMER ASHORE AND FLOATED.

London, May 25.
The Kaisow bound for China, which had got ashore near Lundy Island, has been floated and is now unloading at Barry (South Wales).

MAJOR MARCHAND.

Major Marchand and party have arrived at Suez aboard a French warship. The French delegation's welcome receptions have been countermanded.

CHINESE NEW WARSHIP.

The new Chinese cruiser Hai-pien has left Portsmouth for China.

(FROM MANILA PAPERS.)

ILLNESS OF PRESIDENT MCKINLEY.

Washington, May 9.
For some time past President McKinley has been suffering severely from rheumatism and recently has become so much worse that the doctors have become uneasy as to his condition and have ordered him to visit the thermal springs of Arkansas to undergo a special course of treatment. President McKinley accordingly left for Arkansas yesterday where he will remain for a month.

(FROM THE "ASABI SHIMBUN") ITALY AND CHINA.

Peking, May 24.
The Italian Minister will shortly be escorted to Tientsin by six warships. It is possible that he will demand mining rights and a railway concession instead of Samson Bay.

SHANHAIKWAN RAILWAY.

Peking, May 24.
The Shanhaikwan Railway not having paid the past two months' interest on its loan, will, it is stated, be confiscated by the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation. The matter will in all probability be compromised by the dismissal of Chang-yi from office.

MR. OMIWA.

S6ul, May 22.

The Korean Emperor has been pleased to confer upon Mr. Omiwa the decoration of the First Grade of the Second Rank. He is to start for home to-morrow.

NOTES.

A pretty way of announcing the resignation of a game has been adopted by one of Janowski's opponents in America, says an exchange. After concluding his match with Showalter, the French master entered upon an engagement to play a series of 14 games with the strongest players of the Manhattan Club. His first opponent was Professor Louis Schmidt, the celebrated violinist. After 25 moves the professor hummed the Dead March from "Saul"

This is a nice little chess story; but musicians might ask "who is Prof. Louis Schmidt?" we never heard of him.

Probably the longest game of chess ever known was that played between a man living in Australia and a friend in Newark, N. Y. Each move was made by letter, one player making use of the Europe and Suez canal route, and the other writing via the Pacific ocean and San Francisco. Five years elapsed before the game was drawn to a close.

A most valuable addition to Chess literature is "The Book of the Vienna International Tourney of 1898," published in German. It is a folio volume of 350 pages, edited by the editors of the Wiener Schachzeitung, F. R. Schach, Halpin, and Marco.

IMPORTS.

Business in dull for plain yarns this week, but in gassed yarns buyers are beginning to find out that they have to pay the equivalent of Manchester prices, and a fair business has taken place; shirtings are very dull, and there is very little doing in fancy cottons. Stocks of woollens are decreasing and in view of the short supplies from Australia dealers are beginning to come along.

EXPORTS.

RAW SILK.

During the past week nothing has been done, buyers waiting for the new crop. This is expected to be fully 20 per cent. above the out-turn of last year. The weather has been very favourable and hopes are high of an improvement in quality.

TEA.

Trade has been very brisk at a slight decline for lower grades. Producers declare that the crop will be smaller than large year; it certainly is not up to the standard of '98 quality, and prospects of business in the States are far from bright. The settlements have been about 70,003 piculs against 68,000 at corresponding date last year.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, MAY 20TH, 1899.

DEATH.

At 5 Hill, Kobe, on the 10th instant, Rev. HENRY HALCOMBE RHES, D.D., of Mount Holly, New Jersey, U.S.A., in his 71st year.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

THE spring regatta of the Y.A.R.C. takes place this afternoon.

THE Karagi Kan, built by Cramps and armoured by Armstrongs, arrived at Yokosuka on Tuesday.

THE concert originally arranged to be given by the Junken Choral and Orchestral Societies has been abandoned.

THE Government is stated to have at last decided on the venue of the 6th National Exhibition. It is to be held in Osaka.

THE cricket season opened in Yokohama on Wednesday with a match between the Club and a team from H.M.S. Victorious, the home side having the best of it.

MR. JAMES B. WHITEHEAD has arrived in Japan, and taken up the duties of Secretary at the British Legation in Tokyo.

MR. KANIKO KENTARO proceeds to America by the outgoing mail to receive the degree of LL.D. from Harvard University.

ON the 15th Marquis Ito arrived in Beppu, Oita Prefecture, and met with a cordial reception from both officials and the populace.

H.I.H. THE EMPRESS was pleased to contribute 47 yen to 47 patients at the Charity Hospital on the occasion of her visit on the 16th inst.

THE total number of cases of pest in Formosa from the beginning of this year up to the 14th inst. was 1,974, of which 1,479 proved fatal.

AN excursion train dashed into an express at Exeter, on the Philadelphia-Reading Railroad. In consequence, 34 were killed and 40 injured.

THE Fukushima Yonezawa mountain railway was opened with much clat on Monday in the presence of Viscount Yoshihara, Minister of Communications.

THE demolition of Christ Church and the parsonage at Yokohama began this week. The new Church will be built on the bluff, the land having been bought for yen 20,000.

ON Saturday evening, at the Public Hall, the well-known religious drama, "The Sign of the Cross," will be given for the first time in Japan by a large company of professional players.

THE Asama Kan, a sister ship to the Yoshino, arrived at Yokohama on Wednesday, 59 days from Newcastle, beating the previous record of a warship to the Far East by ten days.

THE high officials of the Department for Foreign Affairs met on Wednesday to consider various questions in connection with the abolition of foreign settlements and other matters.

THE eightieth birthday of Her Majesty Queen Victoria will be celebrated in Yokohama on Wednesday with a cricket match and two sailing races. In Tokyo the British Minister gives a garden party to his nationals.

THE Yokohama Yacht Club open their season on Her Majesty's eightieth birthday—Wednesday next—when the principal prizes will be two cups given by H.B.M.'s Minister for the 39 and 17 years.

H.I.M. THE EMPEROR and Empress have graciously contributed yen 1,000 towards the funds for the relief of the sufferers from the great fire at Shiraimachi, Kamada district, Miyagi prefecture, on the 14th inst.

A BARRISTER named Ishimaki and eight other men living in Nagoya were, a few days ago, arrested under a warrant issued by the Gifu Local Court on suspicion of embezzling money entrusted to them by a wealthy man.

ON the 14th, at 2 p.m., a fire broke out at Fukuura village, Hagi District, Ishikawa Prefecture, destroying upwards of 200 houses, including the village office, the Post and Telegraph Office, and two Buddhist temples.

KOBAYASHI UMEKICHI and others living at Kotobukichi, Yokohama, were arrested on Monday for stealing 1 lb. of salt of quinine (value 150 yen), while engaged in conveying goods to the German mail steamer Hohenzollern.

THE arrival of Major Marchand's mission in Paris is expected. Delegates of the Ministries of War, of the Navy, and of the Colonies are charged with the duty of receiving the mission at the station. Various receptions will follow.

AN assistant clerk named Sato Juso, aged 22, in the service of the Tokyo Post and Telegraph Office, was arrested on Sunday night. He fell in love with a woman in a house of ill-fame, and, being in want of money, had been stealing money-orders since December last.

A HORSE and an ox had a terrible combat on the road to Tennotani, Kobe, some days ago. They fought furiously for an hour; the ox's horns were broken, and the horse lost his hoofs. They were almost in a dying state when the owners separated them.

AN auditor named Takahashi Masayoshi (50), living in Kojimachi, committed suicide by stabbing himself with a knife near Kawasakimachi, Kanagawa Prefecture, a few days ago. He had recently been dismissed from his office in the Board of Audit.

ON the 16th, H.I.M. the Emperor received in audience the French Minister, M. Harmand, who presented a letter from the President of the French Republic, in which M. Loubet returned thanks for the Emperor's expression of kindness on the death of President Faure.

MR. ST. JOHN BRODRICK, Under Secretary to the Foreign Office, speaking in the House of Commons, stated that representations had been made to Russia relative to the refusal of the Russian Consul to recognize British land titles at Hankow, and that Russia had instructed its Consul to suspend any definite action.

A BUDDHIST living at Noda Village, Chiba Prefecture, dreamed the other night that he saw the spirit of Nichiren, who told him he could find old coins to the amount of 40,000 yen buried 12 feet below the ground near a certain temple. A number of neighbours who heard this are engaged in excavating nightly; but no money has been found as yet.

IN the Tokyo Marine Court judgment has been given on the effect that Messrs. John Francis Allen and P. Thomson, the Captain and chief officer of the N.Y.K. steamer Yamaguchi Maru, are exonerated from blame for the fire which occurred on board the Yamaguchi Maru a few months ago.

THE wife and child of Mr. Shiratschi, chief paymaster of the warship Isami Kan, were seriously injured on the railway at Ofuna at 9.15 p.m. on Thursday. They fell between the carriages, and the wheels passed over them. They were attended by a European doctor from Yokohama, who happened to be a passenger in the train.

THE steamer Fukushige Maru, which had left Hakodate for Yokohama on the 10th, was caught by a gale about 12 miles off Kujukurigahama on the 19th, and high waves compelled the crew to throw 447 horse-loads of hombu (edible seaweed) and 500 boxes of manganese overboard. The ship arrived on Monday evening at Yokohama. The goods lost were consigned from Hakodate to Iida, shipping agent at Motobamacho.

THE IMPERIAL VISIT.

We should, of course, take care to lay before our readers translations of all articles published by vernacular newspapers with regard to the Emperor's visit to the Settlement on the 9th inst. had any such articles appeared. But, although the Tokyo journals contain minute accounts of the affair, and although their descriptions of the decorations and of the reception in general show great appreciation, they make no editorial comments, the Kokumin Shimbu alone excepted. The Kokumin, as our readers doubtless remember, alluded to the project before it had yet become an accomplished fact, and strongly applauded the sentiment of the foreign community. It now adds the conclusion that the interval separating foreigners and Japanese has been largely reduced, and expresses a hope that the rapprochement will continue without interruption. A suggestion is also offered that attention should be paid to the reason why this proceeding on the part of foreigners is so greatly appreciated by the Japanese. That reason, we gather, is that the action of the community is interpreted as an evidence of their sympathy with the dominant feeling of the Japanese nation, veneration and love for the Sovereign, and the Kokumin points out that the same sympathetic attitude, were it assumed in other matters, not themselves important, though their influence may be considerable, would materially promote smooth relations. Of course the homily cuts both ways, of which fact the Kokumin is cognisant. It invites its own nationals to treat the European and American residents as friends, not strangers, and to aid in making it possible for them to live as pleasantly and profitably under the sway of the Emperor of Japan as though they were in their own countries.

On the 12th instant Messrs. R. D. Robison and W. F. Mitchell proceeded to Tokyo to convey the thanks of the Yokohama community for the Emperor's visit to the Settlement on the preceding Tuesday. They were received at the Imperial Household Department by Viscount Tanaka, the Minister, who undertook to acquaint His Majesty with their coming and with the message they carried.

We observe, with great satisfaction, that the Emperor has signified his intention of conferring on Mr. R. D. Robison the Third Class Order of the Sacred Treasure. Such an act on the part of His Majesty would be heartily welcomed by this community. Of course, in foreign countries a duty such as that entrusted by the public to Mr. R. D. Robison on the 9th instant, the duty of presenting an address to the Sovereign on a very special occasion, would certainly be the means of obtaining some distinction for the gentleman thus honoured. But Japan, very naturally and properly, has her own rules in such matters, and we can not remember that any precedent has yet been placed on record. It does seem, however, that the auspicious event of last Tuesday would be most gracefully and happily rounded off by His Majesty's recognition of it in that manner. The community would be sharers in the honour, and would appreciate not only His Majesty's gracious intention, but also the thoughtful tact of the present Minister of State for Foreign Affairs.

The Emperor has been pleased to transmit a pair of cloisonné enamel vases to Mr. J. C. Hall, Her Britannic Majesty's Consul in Kobe, and a pair of bronze vases to the French Consul, M. Lucy-Fossarieu. These gentlemen filled the posts of Chairman and Vice-Chairman, respectively, of the Committee appointed by the Kobe community last November to receive His Majesty on the occasion of the Imperial visit to the foreign Settlement. We take these facts from the Nippon.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN POLITICS.

It is pleasant to find a paper of the Nichi Nichi Shimbu's standing and acumen rebuking the wild writing that has recently appeared in certain vernacular journals on the subject of foreign policy. Reading between the lines of these sensational articles, it becomes quite apparent that they are penned for political purposes, and not under the impulse of any real concern for the empire's foreign affairs. Editors want to attack the Cabinet, and in the absence of any tangible material for constructing an indictment, they fall back upon the fact that the Foreign Office is not sending up any fire-works. It seems scarcely worth while to treat such complaints seriously. One can not suppose that any educated Japanese are sufficiently deficient of intelligence not to appreciate that the best evidence of successful foreign policy is the absence of all questions and complication. Therefore, when men grumble because nothing happens, they are evidently jesting about a serious subject, and had better be left to chuckle over their shallow wit to the top of their bent.

It is stated by Tokyo journals that the Szechow complication has been settled, the terms agreed to by the Chinese Government being, first, that those who aided and abetted the rioters should be punished with two months' confinement; secondly, that the ringleaders should have 500 blows of the bamboo and two months' rigorous imprisonment, as a minimum; thirdly, that the Taotai should issue a stringent proclamation enjoining the necessity of respecting the persons and property of foreigners, and fourthly that compensation to the extent of 368 yen should be paid to the Arai Company. This settlement is at all events conspicuous for the moderation of the pecuniary claim.

Our readers have doubtless noticed with thankfulness that a blessed calm reigns in the world of Japanese politics. It is a perplexing world, and anyone seeking to trace the actions and interactions of parties, and the dissolution and organization of factions, must have a clear insight and vast patience. Most of the political leaders are now touring the provinces, a wholesome proceeding, not dictated, however, solely by a desire of educating the constituencies, but partly prompted by the prospect of the elections which will take place next July and August for the Prefectural and City Assemblies. These elections will be a test of the relative popularity of the parties. The general opinion seems to be that the Progressists are under a cloud, and that they will remain so for a considerable time. There would be nothing either remarkable or regrettable in that.

The Progressists will have their day in due season, but unless the beaten party remains for a reasonable period below the surface, there can be no such thing as fairly stable Cabinets. Meanwhile it is to be observed that the Progressists have not such a dark prospect, after all. They have embraced a cause immemorably popular, the cause of reduced taxation, and the people's hearts will go out to them sooner or later. The really interesting question of the time, as we think, is the fate of the new party now in process of formation. Neither the Liberals nor the Progressists have a working majority in the House of Representatives. Hence a third party may become the arbiter of the situation by holding the balance of power. Of course it is for that reason that the projectors of the Kokken-to have entered the field.

FUKUSHIMA-YONEZAWA RAILWAY.

The railway from Fukushima to Yonezawa was opened on the 15th inst. The Minister of Agriculture and Commerce was present at the ceremony, and as a large number of guests had been invited, the train was a very long one, requiring two engines to draw it. There are no less than nineteen tunnels on the line. Everything passed off satisfactorily. Fukushima is a town connected with Tokyo—from which it is 166 miles distant—by the Japan Railway Company's line, and Yonezawa lies 31 miles westward of Fukushima. The distance between the two places is thus inconsiderable, but the difficulties of railway construction are very great. It is a mountainous district, and the road, which is a fine example of engineering skill, climbs to a height of 3,000 feet, is cut out of the sheer cliff at one place, and passes through three tunnels, the longest of them measuring 1,000 yards. Yonezawa is an important silk-producing centre. It is now brought within 12h. 26m. of Tokyo by rail, which includes a wait of 1½ hours at Fukushima. The return journey occupies only 11h. 32m., the delay at Fukushima being reduced to 33 minutes.

FRANCHISE IN JAPAN.

We find in the Mainichi Shimbu an interesting table compiled for the purpose of showing the proportion of franchise-holders that voted and of those that refrained from voting at general elections in Japan since the introduction of constitutional government. It is now nearly ten years since the first election and there have been six general elections in all. The figures stand thus:—

Date of Election.	Percentage of persons that voted.	Percentage of persons that refrained from voting.
July 1890.....	92 78	7 22
February 1892	91 56	8 44
March 1894.....	89 06	10 94
September 1894	85 20	14 80
March 1897.....	87 39	12 61
August 1897	79 35	20 65

Our contemporary infers that the franchise is not valued in Japan, and that men are consequently willing to sell their votes for a small consideration. We should be disposed to think, however, that, if the traffic in votes was at all considerable, very few electors would be found to stand aloof.

THE LATE VISCOUNT KAWAKAMI.

General Viscount Kawakami expired at 6.15 p.m. on the 11th instant. He had been apparently progressing favourably up to the 10th instant, but on the afternoon of that day he was again attacked by spasms, which recurred several times within the next 24 hours, and finally ended fatally. The loss of this highly talented officer will be a severe blow to the Japanese nation. He was in the prime of life and, under ordinary circumstances, should have been able to serve his country for many years longer. His great abilities found an unique opportunity in the War of 1894-5, and it was a common saying at that time that the campaigns in Korea, Manchuria, Liaotung, and Shantung were all mapped out by him in Tokyo, every detail being provided for with the prescience of genius. Yet, despite his possession of these high qualities, Viscount Kawakami was a conspicuously unassuming man. His friends in every rank of society were numerous.

The late Viscount Kawakami was only in his fifty-second year at the time of his death. Up to the fall of 1897, no suspicion existed that his heart was unsound, but certain symptoms which then presented themselves induced him to seek medical advice, and he learned that his tenure of life would probably be brief. According to the rules that govern ordinary careers, he should have been still a student when the great drama of the Restoration was acted. But already in 1864, when a lad of only 17, he had attained such scholastic distinction as to be appointed a school teacher, and in the following year he adopted the profession of arms. Promotion discovered merit very quickly in those days. At 27 Kawakami was in command of a battalion, and at 38 he attained the rank of Major-General and the post of Vice-Chief of the General Staff. Twice he visited Germany, not as a young student, but as an officer of matured judgment who knew how to profit by the useful lessons that country could teach, and had all the intelligence necessary to appreciate its extraordinary military mechanism. He returned to Japan a thorough believer in German tactics and strategy, and, what was more important, with such an insight into their principles as enabled him subsequently to apply them with unerring judgment. Curiously enough, he completed his preparatory education, if we may use the term, by a careful inspection of Korea, Southern Manchuria and Northern China in the very year before the war of 1894-5 broke out. Whether that tour of examination was suggested by prescience of coming events—a hypothesis not difficult to entertain when we remember the constant strain to which the relations between China and Japan were subjected at that epoch on account of Korean affairs—or whether he undertook the trip incidentally to his general acquisition of knowledge, there can be no doubt that the topographical information he acquired must have proved immensely valuable in his subsequent conduct of the war. For it was he that conducted the war in so far as concerned the planning of the campaigns, the organization of the forces destined to take part in them, and the collection and despatch of the necessary material. He devised and supervised that great work without leaving Hiroshima until the Head-Quarters were advanced to Port Arthur, an event which immediately preceded the final surrender of the Chinese at Wei-hai-wei and the conclusion of an armistice. It goes without saying that his brilliant services were fully rewarded. He received a Viscount's patent of nobility, was promoted to be full General, and obtained the appointment of Chief of the General Staff, honours which he was destined to enjoy for a very brief period only. A quiet, self-contained man, his general demeanour did not suggest the luminous judgment and invincible resolution that marked his direction of great operations, and to any one associating with him outside the range of his duties, he conveyed the impression of a modest, gentle and perfectly unaffected character. The loss of such a military genius is almost irreparable, and the question now on every one's lips is, who shall succeed him. We can not offer any conjecture. Before the occasion revealed General Kawakami, the public knew nothing of his great capacities. Possibly Japan has a worthy successor equally unsuspected.

It is scarcely necessary to say that the funeral of General Viscount Kawakami was a most imposing affair. It was attended by representatives of the Emperor, the Empress, the Prince Imperial, and the Imperial Princes; by all the military officers in Tokyo, and by many of the leading residents. In the van and in rear of the procession marched battalions of the Imperial Guards, and large bodies of troops were marshalled at intervals along the route from the residence of the deceased in Bancho to the Aoyama cemetery, a distance of about four miles. Nothing could exceed the perfection of the arrangements. Every conceivable detail seemed to have been thought out before-hand. The huge cortège, which required no little organization, began to move exactly at the appointed hour, and from that moment until the last volley was fired over the grave, not a semblance of disorder or of unforeseen delay was discernible. The military authorities have already given ample proofs of their organizing ability, yet it must be confessed that this funeral enhanced their credit. There was, of course, a magnificent display of floral tributes, but this and other details may be summed up in the statement that Tokyo has never seen a more impressive funeral during the Meiji era.

THE CRIMINAL CLASS.

"In February of 1898, the total number of persons confined in the jails throughout Japan was 74,000. In February of the present year, it was 72,000. Thus there has been a diminution of 2,000. The reasons of the decrease are these:—First, the procedure of the Courts was expedited, so that cases were disposed of more quickly; secondly, first offences of a minor character were dealt with by reprimands only; thirdly, prices having declined, the difficulty of obtaining a living became less acute. Such are said to have been the causes operative in the various prefectures." We translate these remarks from the Kokumin Shimbu. The third reason assigned by our contemporary surprises us somewhat. We should not ourselves have been disposed to say that any sensible depreciation of prices took place between February, 1898, and February, 1899, except in the case of rice.

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN CHINA AND KOREA.

The special correspondent of the Tokyo Asahi, writing from Seoul under date of the 6th instant, says:—"The Chinese and Korean Plenipotentiaries had a conference on the 5th instant. The Chinese Plenipotentiary assumed an obdurate attitude towards the Korean's proposal that Chinese merchants should withdraw from Seoul, and showed no sign of consenting. He also changed, to some extent, the conciliatory tone hitherto adopted by him, and advanced an embarrassing proposition with regard to the payment of customs dues, to the great perplexity of his Korean colleague. He said that Korea had no fixed monetary standard, and that, her only current coins being the new nickel and bronze pieces and the old cash, they had undergone acute depreciation, so that at present they were quoted at a discount of from 20 to 25 per cent. for exchange against Japanese gold coins. He therefore asked that, in paying customs dues, Chinese merchants should be entitled to use Korean coins. The Korean Plenipotentiary had the assurance to reply that his country had already adopted the gold standard publicly, but was without the means of striking gold coins. If the proposal made by China were accepted, other countries would claim the same privilege, and heavy loss would result to Korea. Hitherto the customs dues had been received in Japanese gold coins or in silver coins, and it was impossible to endorse the change now suggested by the Chinese Plenipotentiary." The Asahi's correspondent adds that the Chinese Plenipotentiary adhered to his proposition, and that the discussion of this point is not likely to be speedily terminated.

CHINA BEGINNING TO AWAKE.

According to the Official Gazette, China has done the first wide-awake thing that stands to her credit for many a day. She has declared Sam-shao open to foreign trade. Sam-shao is the place towards which Germany was supposed to have turned longing eyes before she resolved to fix her gaze on Kiao-chow. It offers excellent facilities for a naval port and has other advantages of a distinctive character. Germany's intentions may have been entirely misinterpreted by a suspicious public, but Sam-shao is undoubtedly one of the tid-bits that would be likely to fall into the rapacious maw of the Occident if China attempted to guard it by her own strength alone. As an open port it is safe, provided that any traders see their account in going there—a proviso not particularly disquieting so long as there are British merchants in the world. It really seems as though China's only hope of retaining a semblance of imperial integrity lies in throwing open to foreign commerce her whole country, or, at least, all the important coastwise places. That would be a practical and efficient method of forcing the world to adopt the open-door policy. We are curious to know whether the Peking Government has acted by advice or by its own initiative in this matter of Sam-shao. If the latter, the thing is an evidence of most unexpected alertness. If the former, whence did the wholesome counsel emanate, Downing-street or Nagata-cho?

ADULTERATED WINE.

There has been much talk of late about the adulteration of Japanese sweet wine (Kammi budoshu). It was stated that an analysis made by the Authorities had shown deleterious adulteration in the case of six brands, but since the statement did not take an exhaustive form, the public were left in doubt as to whether the wines not mentioned were safe, the result being, of course, that sales were totally suspended, to the no small inconvenience and loss of manufacturers and middle-men. The Department of Home Affairs now publishes, in the Official Gazette, a report of further analyses made by the Sanitary Bureau, from which we learn that, in addition to the 6 varieties already denounced as deleteriously adulterated, 11 are found to be spurious (ganso). By the term "spurious" we understand that the juice of the grape has not been used in the manufacture of these liquors, but that they are compounded of various chemicals and coloured with aniline dyes. It is very singular, however, that the Sanitary Bureau, or perhaps we should say the Home Department, does not publish the exact particulars of the analyses. There is an air of lordly officialdom about this curt statement that "the following sweet wines, having been examined, are found to be spurious." One would imagine that the Bureau, or the Department, regarded the public as a collection of little children, unable to comprehend any technical explanation, and quite content to receive a word of instruction from autocratic and omniscient officialdom. Besides, although 17 brands of sweet wine have now been condemned, nothing is said about the remaining kinds—for we presume that there are still some others remaining. At all events, if the list of marks published by the Sanitary Bureau be exhaustive, so far as the wines now on sale are concerned, it may be taken for granted that wines with different marks will soon be in the market. It is scarcely likely that any of our readers indulge in these Kammi Budoshu. If they have done so hitherto, they will doubtless see the wisdom of refraining altogether in future. The brands now denounced are the Yebisu, the Momotaro, the Queen, the Lion, the Hotel, the Pheasant, the Flying Dragon, the Stork, the Rose, the Stork and Rising Sun, and the Kintoki. There will be a panic among the manufacturers of wines in Japan.

It appears there are no less than 70 different brands of Japanese sweet-wine. Out of these the Sanitary Bureau has examined 40, and found 17 adulterated. The brewers, however, are by no means satisfied with that result. It would be strange if they were, indeed, for those whose wines have not been examined must feel that, unless they obtain some official declaration as to the wholesomeness of their manufacture, they will suffer almost equally with the sellers of the deleterious stuff. It is to be presumed that they will take steps to have their manufactures analysed without delay, and that, in common with those whose wines have already successfully endured the tests employed by the Bureau, they will advertise the fact widely. But we gather that they have another source of dissatisfaction also. It is understood that, according to the Home Department's definition of the adulterated wines, they all belong to the class of "old wines," and consequently the non-adulterated must be included in the category of "newly manufactured" wines. On the other hand, these latter have been classed with "mixed sake" for purposes of taxation. The brewers declare that such a classification is unjust. They have been holding meetings and engaging counsel, and we shall not be surprised to find that, in default of any genuine source of excitement, this affair is gradually exaggerated to sensational dimensions.

TEA.

There appears to be pretty keen competition among the various shipping companies to secure the carriage of the tea now coming forward for transport to the States. On the 15th and 16th instant, the Nippon Yusen Kaisha and the Northern Pacific Companies reduced their rate of freight to 1 sen per lb., but the Oriental stepped in with 0.75 sen. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun says that the refined tea, now in the hands of foreign exporters, aggregates 1½ million lbs., so that large shipments must take place by the next steamers.

"A general feeling of depression existed recently in the tea market and prices fell by as much as from 5 to 7 yen a picul. Sellers consequently became very anxious, seeing that unless they met the market they would find themselves in an embarrassing position, advices having been received of the pending arrival of additional stocks from the country. On the other hand, the foreign firms having opened their firing godowns, were anxious to avoid any unnecessary delay, and began to buy briskly at reasonable prices. No. 22, a firm which habitually holds back (hikaye gachi naru) purchased 68,600 catties at from 22 to 28 yen; No. 3 (American) laid in 40,500 catties at prices ranging from 28 to 35; the Seicha Kaisha took 21,500 catties at 26 to 27 yen; and No. 211 bought 34,100 catties. These and other purchases brought the transactions on the forenoon of the 11th to a total of 217,500 catties. In the afternoon, No. 221 bought a parcel of 98,100 catties, some as cheap as 24 yen and some as dear as 40 yen; No. 143 took 22,000 catties; No. 210 bought 20,700 catties, and so on, the lowest price being 24 yen, and the highest, for first-class quality, 67 yen. The sales for the day (?) aggregated 430,100 catties, the largest record hitherto made for new tea. The heavy rain on the 12th entailed a suspension of business" (Tokyo Asahi).

"This year, owing perhaps to insufficiency of fertilizers, there has been a great deal of inferior tea grown. In the Yenshu districts picking is said to have been abandoned as there was no prospect of doing anything satisfactory with the bad leaf. An examination of the tea recently sent to Yokohama shows that the buds were defective, and the leaves have consequently curled badly, many of them remaining flat, so that the appearance is unsatisfactory. Moreover, the leaves are so deficient in oil that they go to dust if strongly manipulated. Satisfactory manufacture is thus impossible. Tea-growers from the country districts say, further, that there is a shortage of from 15 to 20 per cent. This year must therefore be considered a bad season for tea." (Ibid).

HERMIT FOREIGN COMMUNITY AT SHIRIBETSU.

Some time ago, vernacular journals of Tokyo published brief reference to a small community of foreigners said to be living at a place called Shiribetsu, opposite to Hakodate. It was conjectured that they were convicts escaped from Saghalien, and no one felt any particular interest in the matter. But investigation has shown, according to the Asahi Shimbun, that, so far from being convicts, they are religionists, who have chosen that remote spot as a hermitage. There are seven Frenchmen, four Dutchmen, one Italian, and one Canadian, thirteen in all. It appears that they live in the most frugal and industrious style. They have 4 horses and 6 oxen, but they never eat meat, their diet being purely vegetable. These animals serve for agricultural purposes only. Farming, indeed, is the chief pursuit of the colonists, and they have brought a large area of land under cultivation. They rise at 2 a.m.—so the statement runs—and employ themselves in whatever tasks their leader directs, obeying him implicitly. The Bible is their sole literature, with the exception of school books which they use for the education of 30 children, whom they teach in strict accordance with the curriculum prescribed by the Department of Education. At rare intervals two of their number visit Hakodate to make purchases or sales in connexion with their daily sustenance, and their lives are in all respects regulated by a code of the strictest discipline. They are said to have been residing at Shiribetsu for several years, but, if so, it is strange that the public hears of them now for the first time.

JAPANESE SETTLEMENT AT AMOY.

From time to time items of intelligence have been published about the delimitation of a site for a special Japanese settlement at Amoy. It was understood that the Peking Government had consented to the proposal, but owing to some unexplained cause, considerable delay occurred in giving effect to the agreement. It would now appear, from statements contained in Tokyo journals, that the procrastination has been due to the Taotai of Amoy, who pretended that the Consuls of Great Britain and the United States were opposed to the granting of a separate settlement. Inquiries having shown, however, that not the slightest objection of any kind had been raised by the Consuls, the Japanese Government instructed its Representative in Peking to approach the Tsung-li Yamén again on the subject, and it is stated that this remonstrance led to the despatch of stringent instructions, on the 12th instant, to the local authorities at Amoy in the sense of immediate compliance with Japan's wishes. The allotment of a site may therefore be regarded as an affair of the immediate future. But will the land be utilized? We have not heard that any practical advantage has been taken of the ports newly opened under the Shimonoseki Treaty, Shashih, Suchow and Hangchow—or, at all events, any advantage approximately commensurate with the expectations originally founded on these concessions.

NEW CHIEF OF STAFF.

Conjecture was very busy, of course, about the probable successor of the late Viscount Kawakami as Chief of Staff. Some journals were disposed to make political capital out of the question, and even to impart to it a sensational aspect. They said that the post of Chief of Staff is the most important office in the Administration, and they reach that conclusion by the following course of reasoning:—first, the influence of the military party is paramount in modern Japan, so that no Cabinet can be formed with any hope of lasting unless the leaders of that party, as Marquis Yamagata, Marquis Saigo, Viscount Katsura, and so on, give their approval and co-operation; secondly, the Chief of Staff is not only the head of the military party, but also an imperium in imperio, since he is virtually in a position to lay down the law to the Cabinet on all problems of armament; thirdly, for the latter reason it used formerly to be a rigid rule that only Princes of the Blood, who stand wholly aloof from politics, shall be appointed to the headship of staff; fourthly, since this great prize has been thrown open to persons who are not princes, it is keenly coveted by both the Satsuma and the Choshu men; and fifthly, the competition for it is not unlikely to dislocate the union of the elements now forming the Ministry. We quote these statements for the sake of the insight they afford into the trend of non-responsible opinion, but it is our own belief that the day has long passed when rivalry between Satsuma and Choshu constitutes a factor of probable disturbance in any circle. There is no difficulty in conceiving that a Chief of Staff who was also a keen politician might produce inconvenient complications. One of Viscount Kawakami's recommendations was that he took no part whatever in politics. But Japan, we imagine, has many non-political soldiers.

Field-Marshal Marquis Oyama succeeds the late General Viscount Kawakami as Chief of the General Staff. This appointment will probably involve a change of Assistant Chief also, Lieut.-General Terauchi replacing the present occupant of the post, Lieut.-General Baron Oseko. Lieut.-General Terauchi is now Inspector-General of Military Education.

FORMOSA AFFAIRS.

The winding up of the Formosa Railway Company's affairs appears to be causing some trouble. It can not be denied that the promoters of the Company made a persistent struggle to obtain funds, or that the Formosan Authorities gave them every facility. The term fixed for the commencement of operations was prolonged no less than five times. Apparently no probability of failure suggested itself at the outset, for a considerable sum was expended by the promoters—over three hundred thousand yen—on preliminary purchases and outlays which could have been avoided had the project looked at all problematical. The question now is, how is this outlay to be recouped? We read in the Nippon that the Company proposed to the Formosan Authorities to sell to them the various properties in the island which had been handed over to the Company without charge in consideration of its undertaking the work. It is scarcely possible to believe that such a proposal was seriously made. At all events, if made it has not been entertained, and the only point now under consideration is whether the Formosa Government will take over en bloc all the articles purchased by the Company, or whether it will merely make selections. As to the source from which the Formosa Government itself is to derive the 35 million yen sanctioned by the Diet last session for railways, public works, harbour construction, and so forth, there is still considerable uncertainty, but a portion of the amount, at all events, will be furnished by the new Bank of Formosa.

The issue of shares of the new Bank of Formosa has been attended with unexpected results. Fifty thousand shares representing a face-value of five million yen make the whole of the Bank's scrip, but as ten thousand are taken by the Treasury and ten thousand by the Imperial Household Department, there were only thirty thousand to place upon the open market. The subscription period ended on the evening of the 13th instant, when it was found that the applications from Tokyo aggregated over fifty thousand shares, and the applications from Osaka, forty thousand. Reports are not yet to hand from Kiushiu, Shikoku, the Tohoku districts, and Formosa itself, but it is expected that the total will be about a hundred and forty thousand shares, or four and a half times the number offered for sale. Some surprise is expressed by vernacular journals that in the present depressed state of the money market such a keen demand for bank shares should arise, but we do not find the incident particularly remarkable. All Japanese banks enjoying a measure of State aid have hitherto proved very flourishing concerns, their shares rising, in a short time, to a high premium. The Formosan Bank will doubtless have a similar experience. Folks fortunate enough to obtain shares may confidently look forward to making a fine profit.

CRITICISM OF AMATEURS.

It seems advisable to say a word editorially about a letter signed "Amateur" which appears in our correspondence columns to-day. The writer refers, we understand, not to criticisms published by the Japan Mail in the regular routine of its journalistic functions, but to remarks made, in the case of the Yokohama stage, by a correspondent who objected to the character of the piece and the language put in the mouths of some of the actors by the playwright; and, in the case of Tokyo, by a contributor calling himself a "non-professional critic." Frankly speaking, the canons of criticism where amateurs are concerned—especially amateurs playing for charity—are among the most perplexing questions that present themselves for an editor's consideration. No where does the old adage apply more aptly than that "one man's meat is another man's poison." There are plenty of amateurs who want to be treated, not like tender flowers liable to be ruffled by the slightest breath of rough comment, but as persons of common sense and robust intelligence, who, when they consent to play in public for the sake of amusing the public, have an unequivocal wish to be told exactly how far they have succeeded. Such amateurs are usually gifted with more than average histrionic abilities. They also understand perfectly well that whatever a newspaper may say, the audience will think its own thoughts and give currency to them in its own manner, and what they hope is that some journal will convey to them a fairly accurate reflection of the sentiment of the audience, instead of constructing its criticisms in rigid accord with polite conventionalisms which permit only praise and interdict all blame. There are others, however, who would be satisfied with our correspondent's rule, namely, praise where praise is possible; otherwise silence or some pleasant comment. It is a matter of opinion. After all, it seems to us a shallow and puny conception that any community should shut itself up in a tiny world of its own, and discuss the doings of its units with bated breath lest some over-tense nerves should be set vibrating too violently. Speaking as journalists, we confess that experience has taught us the value of discretion in these matters. We are conscious of some pusillanimity, but it would seem that the greatest happiness of the greatest number is secured by back-stroking and purring remarks, and within the limits of truth we endeavour to obey that principle. When, however, complaints are addressed to us with regard to the ethical tone of a piece chosen for representation, or when an evidently observant critic sends us a more or less frank statement of the impression produced on his mind by a certain performance, we conclude that the former has a right to be heard, and that the latter will be heard with pleasure by some at least of our readers. For the rest, we are unable to see that the limits of legitimate and courteous criticism—even where amateurs are concerned—were exceeded in the smallest degree by our recent contributor's review of the Tokyo performance, and we believe that were those who kindly took parts in the piece invited to state their opinions frankly, they would say that the publication of his comments had given them satisfaction rather than pain, and that they prefer discriminating criticism to banal panegyrics.

SUPPLY OF IRON IN JAPAN.

Now that it has been definitely decided to obtain from Hanyang in China the major part of the iron required at the new foundry in Chikuzen, the question of carriage assumes much importance. It is evident that had the ore of Iwate Prefecture been used, the vessels carrying it to Chikuzen must have made the return voyage in ballast, as a general rule, for there is no trade with Iwate that could supply cargoes. A slightly better prospect presents itself in the case of Hanyang, since the steamers that carry the ore to Chikuzen may possibly fill up with coal for Shanghai, or may find some other goods for Yangtze ports. Japanese papers speak of 25 voyages a year, and say that although the freight by foreign steamers would undoubtedly be cheap, it might be very difficult to induce them to work uniformly, and as the foundry must be kept supplied, the best plan will be to make arrangements for a regular service of vessels. There is talk of the Mitsui Company's undertaking the work.

BUDDHISTS & PUBLIC RECOGNITION.

The Buddhists of Japan are agitating for official recognition. On the 8th instant, many prominent representatives of the creed met at the Chion-in in Kyoto to celebrate the birthday of Shaka. It was not an assembly solely of religionists. Politicians also were present, among them being Messrs. Sasa Tomofusa and Hayakawa Riyosuke, well known members of the National Unionist Party. There was another famous coadjutor also, Mr. Okamoto Riunosuke. So far as we can remember, it was in the year 1880 that Mr.—then Major—Okamoto claimed a large share of public attention in the Takebashi affair. He headed a mutiny of the Artillery of the Guard, and one of the mutineers' escapades was to fire into the residence of Count—then Mr.—Okuma, who held the portfolio of Finance. Matters would have gone very ill with Major Okamoto had not a convenient access of lunacy interfered with the natural course of legal procedure. He became a gentleman at large instead of an inmate of a convict prison—we do not pretend to understand the exact process—and when the public next heard of him it was in connexion with the cruel assassination of the Queen of Korea. He acted a prominent part in that terrible drama, but nothing could be proved against him. If the Buddhists hope to benefit by his coöperation, they have peculiar views of men and things. However, they discussed the question of official recognition at their meeting, and finally formed an association calling itself the Kōnin-kyō Kisei dōmei-kai, or union to bring about official recognition for the faith. In other words, they want to have Buddhism made the State religion of Japan. We can not suppose that these agitators are secret enemies of the creed they profess, but surely their conduct is thoroughly inimical to its best interests.

IODINE.

There is quite a long story in Tokyo journals about the trade in iodine. The gist of the tale is this:—Owing to the fact that the imported article rose in price from 3.25 yen to 4.25 yen per lb. last year, the Japanese product obtained command of the home market. A combination was then formed by two Japanese dealers, Messrs. Okuwa and Torii, with a foreign firm in Yokohama, No. 89, and by offering special terms, this union soon succeeded in directing all the domestic custom to Yokohama. The dealers who were thus left out in the cold bore their discomfiture for a time, but ultimately held a meeting in Tokyo, and decided, not only to compete with the combination even though iodine had to be sold at a loss of 60 or 70 sen per lb., but also to boycott all dealers doing business with the Yokohama union. There is nothing very remarkable in the incident. We admire the enterprise of Messrs. Okuwa, Torii, and No. 89, but we do not equally admire the methods of their Tokyo rivals. The moral is—not a new moral by any means—that Japan ought to be a great country for "trusts." The people show a tendency to combine and a degree of vim in combination that might be turned to very profitable account at the expense of the general public. We hope it will not.

GARDEN PARTY IN TOKYO.

A very delightful garden party was given in the Naito-Shinjuku park, Tokyo, on the 13th instant. The invitations were issued in the names of Mr. Sonoda Kokichii, the well-known banker, Professor Kikuchi, President of the Imperial University, Baron Sannomiya, Marquis Nabeshima and Marquis Hachisuka; but it was understood that the affair had been undertaken conjointly by the Japanese members of the London Japan Society, and by some other Japanese who had either been educated or resided in England, and that the occasion of the réunion was the presence in Tokyo of Mr. A. Diosy, Honorary Secretary and one of the most active promoters of that Society. Many of our readers are doubtless familiar with the Shinjuku Park, commonly known as the Shinjuku Botanical Gardens, but for the benefit of those who do not know, we may say that the place is the former yashiki of the Naito family; that it covers an area of over 200 acres; that it includes all kinds of scenery, from the lake-and-shrubbery style of the Japanese garden proper, to rustic landscapes and flower pastures; that it is furnished with extensive hot-houses where a variety of rare exotics are cultivated; and that it contains a sericultural establishment which enjoys the direct patronage of Her Majesty the Empress. Saturday was perfect as to weather, and the park looked most attractive in all the lustiness of spring foliage. About two hundred guests were present, the foreign element consisting entirely of Anglo-Saxons. The Imperial Band played an excellent selection of music, and refreshments were served in the large Japanese pavilion which stands in the eastern section of the grounds.

MR. RALPH PAGET.

Mr. R. Paget, Second Secretary of the British Legation, left Tokyo by the 6.20 train on Monday morning for Kobe, where he took steamer for his new post in Cairo. Owing to the very early hour, only a few people assembled at the station to bid him farewell, but he bears with him the very best wishes of many fast friends whom he made during his six years' service in the Japanese capital. Mr. Paget found himself in charge of the British Legation at a very difficult time—the war between China and Japan—and there can be no second opinion that upon all with whom he had to do during that period, he produced an impression of excellent judgment and wise tact. His success in the Service ought to be assured, and, if Tokyo should again become the scene of his duties, he may count on a warm welcome from all nationalities there.

YOKOHAMA CUSTOM HOUSE.

It is stated that the Authorities have it in contemplation to greatly enlarge the accommodation at the Yokohama Customs, and also to connect the premises by rail with the station on the Tokyo-Kyoto line. For the latter purpose, a considerable reclamation of the foreshore will be necessary, the intention being to carry the connecting line over the reclaimed land so as not to interfere with existing street arrangements. The total cost of the projected works is said to be 6½ million yen, and the expenditure will be spread over a period of 5 years.

DOG POISONING.

With reference to a letter which we publish elsewhere over the signature of a "Tsukiji Resident," the following paragraph from the Yomiuri Shimbun is worth translating:—"We have already related that several dogs died suddenly in the Foreign Settlement in Tsukiji. We now learn that the dogs belonged to the Spanish Minister. His Excellency is very fond of dogs, and does not grudge a thousand yen for a good one. He keeps a number, and on the night of 13-14th ten of them died suddenly. The Minister, much astonished, caused inquiries to be made, and, having discovered clear proof that a certain foreigner had poisoned the dogs, His Excellency forwarded a complaint to the Kyobashi Police, who had the bodies of the dogs examined by a veterinary surgeon. The latter declared that, beyond all doubt, death had been caused by poison, but, as to the nature of the poison employed, further tests will have to be applied.

It would appear from this account, that the Spanish Minister keeps quite a pack of dogs, since ten constitute only a part of his kennel. We presume that M. de la Barrera has had the misfortune to lose a dog, and perhaps the Yomiuri's quaint story will at least afford him the consolation of a laugh. Concerning the general question of using poison, however, there is much to be said. Our own experience of Tokyo residents is that many of them recognise no responsibility whatever with regard to their dogs. They allow them to roam about day and night at will. We know gardens that are invaded every night by from six to a dozen galloping, yelping, growling hounds, often rendering sleep impossible, and always doing great injury. What redress has a man against such an intolerable nuisance? If he is a moderately good neighbour, he will not think of laying poison in his grounds. But has he not a right to expect that his neighbours in turn will consider his comfort and his property a little? Doubtless the Tsukiji resident who has been the author of this recent trouble, put down the poison in his own garden having been driven almost to desperation by nocturnal visitors. We imagine that he would be allowed to do so by English law, though the police regulations of Tokyo do not, it is said, permit anything of the kind. There ought undoubtedly to be a rule—a strictly enforced rule—compelling every one that keeps a dog in a city to tie it up, or otherwise confine it, at night.

The dog-poisoning affair at Tsukiji continues to be the talk of the town. Quite a number of dogs were destroyed, seven or eight we believe, and almost without exception they were pets which their owners valued highly. Such a wholesale act of brutality is singular. No excuse can be offered on the score of accident, for, if seven or eight dogs were poisoned, it is obvious that proportionately large quantities of poison must have been used. The rational supposition is that some individual with highly strung nerves, finding his rest broken night after night by canine excursions and alarms, became vindictively angry, and set about the work of destruction with determination to make it as thorough as possible. If he had any idea of the kind of animals he was about to kill, he must be a most heartless person, and social ostracism is the smallest punishment that should be meted out to him. There is talk of a betto's having absconded since the affair, but that is a mere rumour. People ought not to allow their dogs to roam about at night. That is certain. Last night, for example, a pet mallard in a garden in Nagatacho was nearly worried to death by a stray dog. A few incidents of that kind would justify serious retaliation, but arrangement on such a scale as to kill half a score of dogs which are known to be pets, exceed any reasonable limits of self-defence.

WHITE BREECHES.

Three centuries ago, when tobacco began to be smoked in Japan, the members of a band of roistering blades who called themselves the "Leather Breeches," gave some trouble by using the monster pipes of that era as weapons of offence. Certain students in Tokyo appear to be adopting that ancient precedent. They wear white hakama, a habit which has obtained for them the name of Biyakko-tai (white trousers), and they have obtained considerable notoriety by their unruly pranks. They belong to a school called the Kogyoku-sha—i.e., "jewel-polishing institution"—(Japanese terms are nothing if not picturesque)—a place where lads are prepared for naval cadetships. Apparently the "white trousers" are the day-scholars, and there exists between them and the boarders an enmity which is apparently inevitable under such circumstances. On the 9th instant the two parties had a war of words, and the "White Trousers," having been worsted in the argument, retired in high dudgeon, and subsequently challenged the boarders to settle the matter by an appeal to muscles. Such are the broad facts: we omit details. About 40 of the lads came together that night in Shiba Park, and had it out. The "White Trousers" fled defeated, and some of them took refuge with the police, so, of course, the event found its way into the press and has evoked some solemn writing. We should say that the boys who sought the protection of the police had better abandon their idea of studying for the Navy. That is not their proper calling.

TOKYO AND ITS MEN OF GOTHAM.

The eminently sapient members of the Tokyo City Assembly have voted for the second reading of a bill which provides that a sum of 28,000 yen shall be appropriated to defray the expenses of three "inspectors," who are to visit the 23 principal cities of Europe and America for the purpose of ascertaining the best features of Occidental Municipal Government in matters of sanitation, drainage, lighting, policing, sewerage, water supply, communications, and administration and so forth, the whole tour from start to finish being compressed within a space of eight months. Allowing three months for travelling, these lightning inspectors will have an average of 6½ days in each city. Unless they already possessed an uniquely profound knowledge of municipal affairs and all the problems connected with them, the trip would be a monstrous absurdity, and if they do possess such qualifications, there is not the smallest occasion for them to go junketting round the world in search of information.

PATENTS, DESIGNS, AND TRADE MARKS.

The Official Gazette of the 15th instant contains an Imperial Ordinance relating to the fees payable in connection with applications for the registration of patents, designs, and trade marks. As the subject has practical interest for foreign merchants, we append a translation:—

IMPERIAL ORDINANCE No. 105.

Art. I.—With reference to Patents, Designs, or Trade-Marks, persons presenting any of the following documents will be required to pay the fees hereunder set forth:—

1. Application for a Patent 5 yen per copy.
 2. Supplementary Application for a Patent 3 do
 3. Application for altering a Specification of a Patent 5 do
 4. Application for dividing a Specification of a Patent 5 do
 5. Application for registering a Design 1 do
 6. Application for registering a Trade-Mark 3 do
 7. Application for registering a Label 3 do
 8. Application for registering succession to a Trade-Mark 2 do
 9. Application for renewed examination 3 do
 10. Application for a reprint 12 do
 11. Application for a copy of a document 10 sen per page of 13 lines with 25 characters to a line—parts of a page being charged as a whole page.
- In the case of documents in an European language, the charge will be 10 sen per page of 100 words, any fraction of 100 words being counted as a full page.
12. Application for copying a drawing. Charge to be fixed by the Chief of the Patents Bureau, at not less than 30 sen and not more than 30 yen per picture.
 13. Application for leave to inspect the Register 10 sen per application.
 14. Report relating to articles sent to an exhibition or associated show 10 sen per copy.

Art. II.—Fees should be paid with revenue stamps.

The above Ordinance shall become operative from the 1st of the 7th month of the 32nd year of Meiji (July 1st, 1899.)

MR. KANEKO KENTARO.

It appears that the Faculty of Harvard University expressed their intention, more than two years ago, of conferring on Mr. Kaneko Kentaro the degree of LL.D. Owing, however, to the pressure of his official duties, first as Vice-Minister and afterwards as Minister of State, Mr. Kaneko was unable to proceed to the States to receive the honour. Finding himself now comparatively at leisure, he is about to make the voyage—starting on the 26th instant—and will afterwards proceed to Europe for the purpose of conducting some investigations in connexion with his present duties as director of the Tokyo Stock Exchange.

MASONIC.

At the regular monthly meeting of the Yokohama Lodge, No. 1092, E.C., held at the Masonic Temple on Wednesday evening, Wor. Bro. Edward Flint Kilby was inducted into the office of Deputy District Grand Master of Japan (English Constitution). The oath was administered by Wor. Bro. V. R. Bowden, D.G. Reg., and afterwards congratulations were extended, on behalf of various Masonic bodies in Japan, by Wor. Bro. V. R. Bowden, Wor. Bro. A. Bellamy Brown, Wor. Bro. E. C. Fox, Wor. Bro. H. W. Lea, Wor. Bro. Rev. E. C. Irwine, Bro. J. Buiss, etc.

MILITARY EXPANSION.

Viscount Miura has published, over his own signature, a long article, denouncing the post-bellum scheme of military expansion as excessive. He claims that the plan was based on German and French precedents, which are quite inapplicable to Japan's case, France and Germany being governed in these matters by special considerations which have no validity for Japan. It is sometimes contended that when the Siberian Railway is finished, Russia will be in a position to place a large force in Eastern Asia, for which conjuncture Japan must be prepared. Viscount Miura denies the correctness of the forecast. Thirty or forty thousand men appear to him to be the largest army that Russia can look forward to employing in this quarter of the globe. Thus he fails to see what use Japan can hope to make of the huge establishment she is now preparing. Six divisions are ample in his opinion; twelve are more than twice too many. Further, he has long been in favour of reducing the time of service with the colours. It is now three years. He thinks it might safely be reduced to two, or even one, if the whole time were devoted to military training. A great part of it is now wasted on matters which are of no use to a soldier. Among such matters the Viscount dwells particularly on the menial duties that have to be performed by men serving as officers' body servants. We refer to these arguments because of the source from which they emanate, but it is not likely that competent military authorities will endorse the Viscount's idea of reducing the time of service with the colours.

IMPERIAL PALACE IN SHIZUOKA.

There is to be another detached Palace. The site is Shizuoka. The town assembly of that place recently appointed a committee to make the necessary investigations, and the Committee's report is said to have been sent in on the 8th instant, reaching the Imperial Household Department on the 9th. The price of a site and the cost of removing the houses that now stand on it, are estimated at 45,514 yen. Preparations to vacate the land are already being made by those residing there. The principal buildings that now stand on the site belong to the journal Mingyū Shimbun of Shizuoka, and the work of removing them has commenced. The people expressed their desire to move their residences without any expense to the Household Department, but their proposition was not entertained. There appears to be evident need for some kind of palace in Shizuoka, as the Emperor often stops there en route for the south.

THE CHINESE IN YOKOHAMA.

A measure of interest attaches to statistics published by the Kokumin Shimbun, showing that out of 2,143 Chinese residents of Yokohama—1,666 men and 477 women—the contingent from Kwangtung numbers 1,690; that from Chekiang, 253; that from Kiangsu, 105, and that from Fukkien, 61. Thus 2,109 out of the 2,143 are Southern Chinese. The Kokumin justly remarks that these figures explain the community's partiality for Kang Yu-wei and his cause.

A LADIES' PEACE CONGRESS.

The Yomiuri Shimbun has discovered another stick wherewith to beat Viscount Aoki. It says that, on the 12th instant, at a garden party given by Prince and Princess Mori at their Takanawa residence, the Minister of Foreign Affairs was surrounded and vehemently attacked by a number of ladies. The reason of the fair assailants' onset was this:—When it became known that the Czar's proposal for a peace conference would certainly mature, the ladies of England, Germany, America, France, Holland, and 13 other countries, conceived the idea of forming an association under the presidency of the Queen of the Netherlands for the purpose of promoting the objects of the conference. The ladies of Japan were asked to join, or resolved of their own initiative to join, making one of the Imperial Princesses their President. They addressed themselves to the Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, but His Excellency treated their request very coolly, the result being that they seized the occasion of his presence at the garden party to call him over the coals. Unfortunate Viscount Aoki! If he incurs the wrath of the fair sex his career will be troublous.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.

The accidents on Japanese railways during the year ended March 31st 1897, are tabulated as follows in recently published Reports, collated by the Yoroku Choko:—

Government Lines,
	killed.	wounded.
Tokaido	136	87
Shin-Yetsu	8	3
Osaka	1	0
Hokuriku	3	4
Totals	148	94
Private Railways,
	killed.	wounded.
Nippon	115	68
Sanyo	66	66
Kobe	5	1
Kinshu	18	30
Totals	204	165

Comparing these figures with the mileage of the lines, we obtain the following results:—

Government lines, 660 miles—
148 killed; 94 wounded; namely, 22 killed and 14 wounded per 100 miles.

Private lines, 1,340 miles—
204 killed; 165 wounded; namely, 15 killed and 12 wounded per 100 miles.

It would appear from these figures that the advantage is on the side of the private lines in respect of management and control.

DOCKING OF VESSELS.

The following Notification has been published by the Naval Department:—

In consideration of the fact that docking facilities did not fully exist in private hands, it has hitherto been the custom at the Naval Dock yard to undertake the repairs of vessels not belonging to the Navy. But as docks and slips have now been provided in sufficient quantity by private enterprise, it is considered that no necessity exists any longer for opening the official dock-yards to outside vessels. Hereafter, therefore, only ships belonging to the Imperial Navy will be docked or repaired at the Naval yards. Provided that this rule shall not apply in case of maritime disaster, or temporary peril, or to cases which can not be dealt with at private establishments.

FEMALE RECLUSSES.

The story of the colony of religionists at Ishibetsu is capped by one of a community of female recluses at a place called Yunakawa, about 7 miles from Hakodate and 17 from the site occupied by the Ishibetsu people. The women are said to number about twenty. They occupy a large wooden building, painted white and closely resembling the edifice at Shiribeshi. A matron of some fifty years presides, and her instructions are implicitly obeyed. The women are all young, ranging from 16 to 27, and some of them are described as very beautiful by a correspondent of the Fiji Shimpō, who has had an opportunity of seeing them. The building stands in a farm of some 250 acres, which is registered in the name of a Mr. Asaka. But the women do not engage in any agricultural work. They spend most of their time indoors, reading the Bible, and they appear to observe the same strict rule of silence as that followed by the Ishibetsu colonists. It is strange to read of such things at the close of the nineteenth century. We wonder who the matron of fifty is, or who the people are that have connived with her to work this iniquity. They will have to answer for it by and by.

JAPANESE IN AUSTRALIA.

A number of instances of Japanese immigrants being prevented from landing are reported from Australia. At Thursday Island sixteen who had gone thither in the Futami Maru were turned back on the 17th of April. The passports described them as "commercial emigrants," but the local authorities concluded that they were ordinary labourers. A similar fate subsequently befel thirty-nine who arrived by the Yazata Maru, and, out of fifteen who attempted to land at Brisbane, thirteen were turned back. Incidents of this nature have long been foreseen, but they are not the less unpleasant. It is evident that if the Australians are determined to adopt an illiberal policy, the wisest course for the Japanese Authorities is to exercise such supervision as shall save unfortunate labourers from the expense and disappointment of making a fruitless journey.

MR. YATES'S PICTURES.

Mr. Fred. Yates, the portrait painter, who was in Japan last year, and who did some admirable likenesses of various prominent residents in Tokyo and Yokohama, is evidently not a man of one talent. His exhibition of oil colours and crayon studies at Kell's Building proves that he has great, if not equal, powers as a landscape artist. There are a large number of oil paintings, and several very handsome studies in black and white, the latter being perhaps the most pleasing of all the exhibits. They are really beautiful. The oil colours chiefly depict scenery and life in Japan; there are a few Chinese sketches, and one or two of California and Hawaii. The Japanese pictures are extremely good, and will form pleasant reminders of charming spots and pretty nooks in different parts of Holiday Japan—Chuzenji, Kamakura, Nikko, &c. Mr. Yates has well caught the characteristic spirit and the special atmosphere of Japanese scenery, and in his smallest sketches the work of a true artist can be recognized.

PROGRESS IN HAKONE.

Tourists in the Hakone district know well the strait and narrow way which leads from Miyanoshita to Hakone. It is called, by a bold stretch of imagination, a road, but a road in the ordinary and civilised sense it certainly is not. In fine weather it is a mixture of huge stones and loose sand; in wet weather it is an alternation of slippery rocks and treacherous quagmire. Jinrikisha are out of the question; and when it is not rainy most sensible people prefer to walk. When it is wet, the only means of locomotion is a kago, and a kago, to a European of ordinary length of leg, is one of the most uncomfortable contrivances conceivable. In order to obviate this inconvenience the proprietors of the Mikaway Hotel, Kowakidani, the Matsuzakaya Hotel, Ashinoyu, and other establishments contemplate the construction of a proper road which will permit of jirishika traffic. The route has been surveyed by the Kanagawa authorities, and the promoters are appealing for subscriptions to Japanese and foreign visitors. The names of subscribers will be inscribed on boards to be put up at the entrances of the hotels—not, we suppose, without the permission of the donors, for many persons of average modesty will hardly appreciate such publicity. Provided nothing is done to mar the picturesqueness of the scenery between Miyanoshita and the heights above, the scheme appears worthy of encouragement.

ANARCTIC RESEARCH.

Sir Clements Markham had a pleasant surprise for the members of the Royal Geographical Society at their meeting recently. The munificent gift of £25,000 which he announced as having been made by Mr. L. W. Longstaff puts an end to anxiety as to the cost of the proposed British Antarctic Expedition. The scheme had not hitherto been supported as liberally as the promoters had anticipated, and there was some little reason to fear that funds might not be forthcoming in sufficient amount. Mr. Longstaff's example can hardly fail, however, to give an impetus to further donations, and the President of the Royal Geographical Society looks forward with confidence to the success of the undertaking. It would have been matter for much regret had it been otherwise. England cannot willingly allow herself to be anticipated by Germany in the exploration of the Southern Polar regions, as she might have been but for Mr. Longstaff's public spirit and generosity. The projected undertaking is one which peculiarly appeals to the adventurous instincts of our race. There are laurels to be won in the field of Antarctic discovery which would be sought in vain in the now familiar regions of the Far North. It is a common-place to remark that little is known of the South Pole and its surrounding waters and lands, but few have realised how absolute is our ignorance. A well-directed and well equipped expedition is certain not only to add to our knowledge of geography, but to bring to light new facts of interest in natural science. There may, for anything we know, be new varieties of the human race to be discovered, but whether that be so or not, it may be safely assumed that new species of animals and plants remain to be studied and described. We shall probably also learn something fresh about ocean currents and magnetic phenomena. In any event science has much to hope for from the investigations of the competent observers who will be attached to the expedition. That prospect is a sufficient justification for the expense and labour, and even the personal risk which will be incurred. One thing to be remembered is that the Antarctic Continent is as big as the Continent of Europe, and may have many secrets in store for us.—The Globe.

RUSSIA IN THE FAR EAST.

THERE is not much comment as yet in vernacular newspapers about the intelligence that Russia has asked the Chinese Government for a concession to build a railway from Manchuria to Peking, or about the singular addendum that the line is to start from Newchwang, and thus come into direct competition with the Newchwang-Shanhaikwan road for which a concession has already been obtained by a British syndicate. Few persons will be disposed to credit the latter part of the programme, for Russia, in her recent Convention with England, is understood to have pledged herself not to interfere with the Newchwang-Shanhaikwan line, and the building of a directly competing road would be interference of a most unequivocal character. That is quite improbable. For the rest, there is no valid reason why Russia should not extend her Manchurian railway system to Peking. Of course, we all know what it means. There is not the faintest probability that Russia will relinquish her grip of any territory through which she has constructed railways. Manchuria is already hers, and if she stretches out an iron arm to Peking, the future of the Chinese capital can be foretold with certainty. A nation never breaks away from precedents until the hour of its downfall arrives. The precedent of permanent retreat does not yet exist in Russia's history. She has occasionally been compelled by force majeure to step back for a moment, but the lost ground has invariably been recovered. Who is going to make her step back from Manchuria, even temporarily?

We may refer in this context to a long series of articles written by Mr. SHIMADA SABURO in the Mainichi Shimbun with the object of showing that there is no essential clashing of Japanese and Russian interests; that the Japanese have been looking at Russia through British spectacles, and that they ought to lay aside their prejudice and strike their hands into those of the Great Northern Power. Mr. Shimada is an eminent publicist. His opinions always command and deserve attention. They are the opinions of a practising, not merely a professing Christian. Unfortunately there never has been a time in the world's history when Christianity was at such a discount in the intercourse of nations as it is at present. It would be very delightful if Mr. SHIMADA's utopian principles could be generally adopted as rules of conduct; if statesmen would found their policies on righteousness, take the maintenance of peace for guiding star, and make commercial and industrial development their aim. Is Russia a conspicuous disciple of that creed? Did she think of righteousness when she tore up the Treaty of Paris, or when she drove Japan out of Liaotung in order to occupy it herself? Did she set her heart on the maintenance of peace when she began to mass troops and build fortifications at Port Arthur? Did she take commercial expansion for her aim when she declined to open Tientsin to foreign trade? Russia fulfils her destiny. We do not blame her. But Mr. SHIMADA SABURO's estimate of her attitude towards Japan is impossible to endorse. He believes that there is no reason why Japan should regard Russia's expansion with uneasiness, and he thinks it much more likely that there will be commercial competition and grave clashing of interests between Japan and England, or America, or France, or Germany than between Japan and Russia. We confine ourselves to Great Britain, and as between Japan and Great Britain and Japan and Russia, we entirely endorse Mr. SHIMADA's view. There will be no trade rivalry between Japan and Russia in the Far East for the very simple reason that Russia will not allow it. Does Mr. SHIMADA imagine that Japan will have free access to the markets of Manchuria when the Manchus are Russian subjects? Does he think that Japanese cottons, for example, will be allowed to compete on even terms with Russian in Manchuria when the Russian spinning mills now in contemplation shall have been established there? Wherever England rules, there freedom of trade will be found, but no one can say the same of Russia. Does Mr. SHIMADA imagine, also, that the Korean peninsula is to be permanently excluded from Russia's Manchurian possessions? Perhaps he would be content to see Japan thrust out of Korea. Indeed we infer as much from his assertion that Japan's sphere of action lies in southern, rather than in northern, districts. He will not get his countrymen to follow him in that view. To us it appears that he hopes to stay the vast tide of Russian aggression with a mop of worn-out platitudes.

SUCCESSION TO LANDED ESTATE IN THE FOREIGN SETTLEMENT.

WE are sorry to find ourselves charged with having penned "a paragraph of reckless statements and gratuitous abuse" because we quoted certain provisions of Japanese law which proved that the Japan Herald was mistaken in its allegations about succession to landed estate in the Foreign Settlements. It need scarcely be observed that, in noticing our contemporary's assertions, we had no controversial intention whatever, our sole purpose being to prevent the spread of impressions which seemed calculated to create needless uneasiness in the minds of foreigners. For that reason also we now recur to the subject.

The propositions originally formulated by our contemporary were embodied in these words:—

Very possibly, one round-about effect of the Law of Succession is that the succession in land even in the Settlements will be governed by Japanese law, so that such land can not be freely disposed of by will, and so that wills affecting it must be executed with a minute observance of all the requisites specified in the Civil Code."

There are several points here suggested. The first is that the Japanese law of succession will apply to land in the Foreign Settlements. The second is that, in consequence of the application of Japanese laws, such land can not be freely disposed of by will. The third is that the provisions of the Japanese Code as to wills are intricate and troublesome.

Concerning the first of these points, we quoted an Article of Japanese Law which declares that "the existence and the effect of a will are governed by the law of the nationality to which the testator belongs at the time of making the will." It is therefore absolutely certain, as a general rule, that the Japanese law of succession will not apply to lands in the Foreign Settlements. The Japan Herald declines, however, to be satisfied. It quotes the following provision:—

When the law of the nationality of the person concerned is to govern, and according to its provisions the Japanese law is to govern, the latter governs.

That is to say, where British law, for example, delegates certain functions to Japanese law, Japanese law agrees to discharge them. That is what the Japan Herald calls "a round-about effect of the Japanese Law of Succession." We can not suppose that such a contention is advanced seriously. Japanese law lays down for Japanese law courts this rule that, with respect to a will made by a foreigner, they shall interpret it and give effect to it in accordance with the law of the testator's nationality, unless the latter law provides that Japanese Codes must be applied. Thereupon the Japan Herald wants to know "whether it is not the law of every country that all rights in relation to land abroad are determined by the law of the country where the land is situate." This, it says, "removes the question entirely out of the plane on which the Mail has been travelling." Certainly it does. We were travelling in the plane defined by our contemporary's explicit assertion that it was discussing "one round-about effect of the Japanese Law of Succession." It now shifts its ground to the effect of foreign laws of succession, and then complacently accuses us of having been travelling in the wrong plane! Among the laws of the numerous countries of the world, there may be some that declare themselves inapplicable to the disposal of property owned by their nationals in a foreign country. We are not acquainted with any such laws. But if they exist, then the complaint of the Japan Herald lies at their door, not at the door of the Japanese Code.

We come now to the second point, namely, that, in consequence of the application of Japanese laws, the land held by foreigners in the Settlements can not be freely disposed of. To that we replied, first, that the right of freely disposing of such land is secured by treaty, since the Conventional form of title deed conveys the land to the foreign holder, "his heirs and assigns"; secondly, that the law of Japan, as already explained, does not apply; and thirdly, that even if it did apply, it would not in any way interfere with a testator's freedom of disposition. To this the Japan Herald replies by quoting an article of Japanese law which says that "a testator may dispose of the whole or a part of his property by a universal or singular title, provided that he must not contravene the provisions of law relating to legal portions." On these words which it italicizes the Japan Herald bases its rejoinder that "as the law of legal portions determines the succession of one-third to one-half of the estate it can hardly be said that the testator is free to do as he likes with his property." Now the law of legal portions is a part of the family law of Japan. Does the Japan Herald really imagine that Japanese family law has any relation to foreigners living in Japan as foreigners? It can not possibly entertain such a silly supposition.

Finally, we come to the suggestion that the provisions of the Japanese Civil Code as to wills are intricate and troublesome. Our contemporary now declares that it never intended to suggest anything of the kind. We need not, then, discuss the matter further than to say that when an apparent complaint is made about the probable necessity of having to execute a document "with a minute observance of all requisites specified" in a Code, ordinary minds can not avoid the inference that an intricate and troublesome process is referred to.

We now observe that the Japan Herald disclaims any "business to interpret the laws of Japan;" that it denies having "ventured any opinion of its own on the subject of land succession," and that it explains that it merely gave currency to something which "had been mentioned as a possibility." It appears then that the whole basis of our contemporary's original article was a passing rumour which it neither endorsed nor denied. Very frequently the retailer of a canard clings to it with much greater tenacity than the original manufacturer. That appears to be the case in this instance.

THE "ASAMA."

The first-class cruiser Asama reached Yokosuka at 8.30 a.m. on the 17th instant. The displacement of the Asama is 9,906 tons, and her speed is 21½ knots. She was ordered in England in July, 1897, so that her construction and voyage out have occupied 22½ months. The Asama is one of a group of four sister ships included in the post bellum programme, the others being the Yakumo, the Asuma, and the Tokiyama.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE BEST HOTEL FOR TALL MEN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—I am informed by an advertisement on the cover of the "Kobe Directory," that the Oriental Hotel, of that city, makes "Special Arrangements for Lengthened Visitors"; and I write to ask if the hotels in Tokyo, Yokohama and Nagasaki are not lacking in enterprise for not making similar arrangements for that particular class of guest. If similar accommodations for travellers of that kind can not be found elsewhere, my friends and myself will certainly spend all our time in Kobe, and the other places will lose the benefit of our extended and extensive custom. This seems to be another instance in which Kobe has gotten ahead of Yokohama; but you may yet be able to stir up sufficient local pride to supply this great lack in the accommodation of even the "Grand."

Most respectfully yours, GOLIATH.

THE RISE OF PRICES IN JAPAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—Observing that in your issue of Friday last, you have endorsed the remarks of an evening contemporary by quoting a paragraph from the North China Daily News on the increase of prices in Japan acting detrimentally on the influx of summer tourists from China and elsewhere, kindly allow me space to point out that it is hardly fair to throw the whole blame of the altered state of hotel charges and other rises in price upon the Japanese inn-keepers. The journal in question, when quoting the paragraph above-named, remarks, "the short sighted and grasping policy of Japanese inn-keepers in bringing its own punishment," and again "the inn-keepers of that simple paradise (Japan) have banded themselves together to fleece the visitors," etc.

Without making myself the champion of "Japanese inn-keepers" as a class, permit me to point out that they have only moved with the tide that has been steadily rising in Japan for the last five years.

When the writer came to Japan 10 years ago, the charge for a room and meals per day at the Grand Hotel was $4 and by special arrangement $3.50 per single person. The Club Hotel was something lower. I heard of people getting accommodation as low as even $2.50 for a term. Now I believe the Grand Hotel charges are from $7 to $10 per day, and all other hotels in proportion, but they are not accused of having "banded together to fleece the visitor," because all sensible people are aware that such an increase in price is unavoidable owing to the great political and commercial changes that have materially altered the cost of living. Then why blame the Japanese inn-keepers for following suit, and throw all the blame on them?

Another point to which I would draw your attention is, that it is a comparatively small section of visitors from China, Singapore, and the Straits Settlements, who, purposing to summer in Japan, avail themselves of the houses of Japanese innkeepers, with the exception of the Fuji-ya Hotel at Miyashita, which being run on the lines of the Grand Hotel, cannot be said to fall under the category of Japanese inns. The visitors alluded to by yourself and your evening contemporary, either stay at one of the three hotels on the Bund, or, if having their families with them, either rent a furnished house on the Bluff from the proprietor who vacates it for his own or his hired country house, or else go into the country and rent a Japanese house for themselves—or if they do not, they have the choice of all these three alternatives to save them from the necessity of falling into the "grasping hands" of the "Japanese inn-keeper"—and the latter can be left to fight out the question of increased prices with customers of his own nationality.

I am Sir, yours,

CRITICISM OF AMATEURS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—The function of the critic of amateur theatrical entertainments,—so it seems to me,—is praise where praise can be given, and, otherwise, only some pleasant comment or silence. The ladies and gentlemen who take part in amateur performances, as a rule, do so only after urgent request. Many of them have no ambition to make such public appearances; most of them have but little self-conceit, and nearly all of them play their parts for "the sake of sweet charity" and to add some little pleasure to the life of their immediate communities. In an isolated foreign community like that of Yokohama or Tokyo these facts are especially true. I hold it to be not fair, consequently, that public criticism of our different amateur actors should either invidiously discriminate or condemn. Particularly, I think that some criticisms that have been made in the columns of the Mail concerning both the recent amateur dramatic representations, given in Yokohama and in Tokyo, were altogether out of place. And if amateur work is to be treated here as though it were the paid services of professionals, it will not be long before our ladies and gentlemen will refuse to subject themselves to the unwelcome notoriety. Their self-sacrificing work, continued over weeks of preparation, is not "business," nor is it proper material for exacting judgment before the public.

Then as to plays chosen for presentation. The array of plays ranged between the insipid "parlour farces" and "the standard drama" is comparatively small. The former are too trivial for our stages, and the amateur's relation to his or her character is too personal to allow of action in most of the latter, in which, too often, crime, passion and other uncongenial motives dominate. We may not be over-exacting to the choice made. Surely, all things considered, On 'Change was a good play. At least so thinks one who took no part in either of the plays last given, but who has a quick sympathy for every one who is an AMATEUR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—Judging by what has appeared in your paper since the remarks of "An unprofessional critic" on our humble efforts to make "On 'Change'" at least pleasing to our audience, it would seem that some kind friends have been saying something on my behalf, re his remarks regarding myself, as I am the only one whom he ruthlessly cuts to pieces without extenuating circumstances. Whilst feeling grateful for these unasked-for kindnesses, let me assure them that I do "not feel offended" at any of the remarks made; on the contrary, rather flattered, as, though undoubtedly my study of the part was wrong, yet Herr von Moser's De Haas still appears to me exactly the individual our critic was so offended with, as the treatment meted out to him, De Haas, could never have been intended for the drawing-room as which is apparently more to the critic's taste. After all, to quote your editorial, "the audience will think its own thoughts and give currency to them in its own manner," and if we may hope that your journal conveyed a fairly accurate reflection of their sentiments, we ought all to be more than satisfied and console ourselves with the thought that, after all, our unprofessional critic is but one individual.

Yours,

A. R. PATTISON.

A DOG EPIDEMIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—In to-day's issue of the Japan Times there is a report of "strange cases of a dog epidemic." As one of the many Taukiji residents whose valuable dogs have met with an untimely death, I beg to call your attention, and that of the public and authorities, through the columns of your paper, to the fact that there can be no doubt that the deaths of the numerous dogs on the nights of the 12th and 13th inst., were due to poisoning and not to an epidemic. There is no epidemic which kills a healthy dog in 3 minutes, and the opinion of an expert who witnessed the death of one animal is that the symptoms were those of strychnine poisoning. As the promiscuous scattering of poison is not only dangerous in exposing people to the risk of half poisoned dogs running about, but is a direct violation of the rights and property of other people, it is to be hoped that the police will take more active steps by investigating the drug-shops in the vicinity of Tsukiji, to discover the person or persons who have lately bought poison to so large an extent, and make them answerable for their uncalled for and arbitrary acts.

I remain yours, etc.,

A TSUKIJI RESIDENT.

Tokyo, 17th May, 1899.

THE LATE PROF. K. MORITA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—In the Monthly Summary of the Religious Press that appeared in the Japan Weekly Mail for May 6th I notice the following statement about the late Professor K. Morita. "He returned to the Dōshisha as a teacher in the Divinity College, but later severed his connection with that college, and devoted himself to teaching literature and philosophy and laboured to establish a special Literary and Philosophical Department connected with the Institution to which he had given his best days. He was engaged in making arrangements for the carrying out of this scheme when he was overtaken by the illness which carried him off at the early age of 42." Someone made a mistake, or was misinformed, upon three points in the above quoted statement. First, Prof. Morita did not resign his connection with the Theological School but was one of its professors up to his death. Second, he did not engage in any scheme to establish a special Literary and Philosophical Department, but was merely the Dean of the College as distinguished from the Middle School. Third, he did not devote himself to teaching literature in any of the Departments of the Dōshisha, but found his hands full with classes in his special studies of Philosophy, Psychology, Ethics, and Logic till he was obliged to give up all teaching on account of illness.

Respectfully yours, C. M. CADY.

LAKE KAWAGUCHI.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL"

SIR,—On account of absence from Japan proper, it was only to-day that I read your issue of April 24th, and found my attention drawn to a paragraph headed "Lakes and Forests," treating of a proposal to drain Lake Kawaguchi.

I wish to indorse every word of your correspondent's communication protesting against this. To drain that most beautiful lake would be an act of vandalism as great as to drain Loch Katrine or Loch Lomond, for should a Walter Scott ever arise in Japan, it will be made known to the world that the whole district at the base of Fuji-san, directly on the opposite side from Hakone, is the Trossachs of Japan.

Besides this I believe, as your correspondent indicates, that the inhabitants are more likely to suffer than to gain, and not only this, but the whole Koshu plain is likely to suffer, for I believe that a great part of their irrigation water reaches there by being forced through a porous stratum under the pressure head of Kawaguchi Lake. The Kōfu people should most strongly protest. Again, I believe that your correspondent is right in stating that the sole benefit will come to a few speculators should the work be carried out, though I certainly do not have any idea as to whether the sum may be two thousand yen, or what it may be. Unless this disgraceful project can be stopped, my only consolation will be a pretty strong opinion that the speculators will find the work they undertake a good deal more arduous than they think, and that they may even fail altogether.

It is also most true that "the deforestation that goes on in the Government woods is woful." I have written in your columns of this before. It is a case of stealing done in the most open and barefaced way, and, even as stealing, done with what would look like malice aforethought. It has been almost enough to make me weep to see the villagers in the district cutting down some one particular tree that has been to me for years a feature of the landscape—a tree that I have used in taking a photograph, just because it completed the composition of a landscape, perhaps beautiful even without it. To see the whole scenery change visibly from year to year is more than sad. If this sort of thing goes on, the photographs of Mr. Ogawa, Mr. Kajima, and myself will soon be almost all that is left of the "Lake District" of Japan. The last time I was at Shōji, I could not even find the places from which I had taken photographs some years before, so completely was the landscape changed.

It is most curious, in the case of such lovers of the beautiful in nature as the Japanese, that there should be found a district where the sense is so totally wanting as it is in that referred to.

It being pointed out to some of the inhabitants that the cutting down of a great pine tree over-hanging the water from the top of a high rock would spoil a splendid landscape, the people did not seem in the least capable of grasping the idea. To them it was only that the tree would fall into the water and could easily be floated over to the village.

Kindly insert this and believe me,

Yours, &c.,

W. K. BURTON.

THE NAGOYA YOROIN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—I enclose a paper which may be of considerable interest to Foreign Residents in Japan, and may do something towards reassuring them in regard to the spirit in which the laws will be interpreted.

This Yoro-in at Nagoya was one of the fruits of the earthquake of 1891, and the Rev. J. Cooper Robinson, still resident in Nagoya, collected the money for it and has administered the Institution ever since.

A couple of years ago, he found a man looking round the premises and apparently appraising them, and on enquiry it proved that he was a creditor of one of the two Japanese in whose names the property stood. The question therefore, to the trial of which we have all, I suppose, been looking forward, viz: "Is property, held in a Japanese name for a foreigner, a part of the estate of the Japanese, if he become insolvent," was raised in its simplest form. The Court of First Instance and now the Court of Appeal also have decided the question on principles of equity, and the man who endeavoured to take the property for the payment of his own debts is not only cast in his suit with costs, but is disfranchised, if not in prison. An appeal to the Japanese Court in Tokyo is possible, but the time for making it has almost expired.

The Judgment of the Nagoya Court of Appeal, of which I enclose a copy, will explain itself, but one or two further remarks on the case may be of interest.

1. This case has little bearing on instances in which foreigners may, perhaps, be holding property in Japanese names for their own private benefit, but it is important to Institutions and Trusts.

2. Nagoya has the reputation of being a peculiarly anti-foreign and anti-Christian place, but the feeling of indignation at a Japanese trying to divert to his own purposes foreign money contributed for the benefit of Japanese sufferers was very strong, and one of the leading lawyers of the city gave his services gratuitously to the defence of the Institution.

3. The judgment is of all the greater value because it seems clear that the documents in the case had not those clauses in them which are now usual, making clear the nature of the purpose for which the money was contributed. The Court relied upon evidence that the Japanese "owner" paid no interest on the money he had nominally borrowed for the purchase of the land, and for building; that he was not required to insure it as security for repayment; that the building had been from the first and is still used for a Yoro-in, according to what was known from the first to be the expressed intention of those who provided the money.

The Court appears thus to have recognized that this must in equity be regarded as what we should call a trust, though trusts as such are not acknowledged by Japanese law, and though in this case the character of the trust seems not to have been stated in the documents. It is clear that such a decision is very much on the line of those decisions in favour of "trusts" and "uses" out of which "equitable" jurisdiction grew up in England 500 or 600 years ago.

Perhaps, I may be allowed to add that, though costs were given, the Rev. J. Cooper Robinson would find himself from $150 to $200 out of pocket by the case which he has won for all who are interested in Charitable Institutions held on such tenures. As he has also had all the worry and trouble, others as well as myself will probably wish to take a share in relieving him from pecuniary loss. He does not know that I am writing this, but even without his leave I would venture to receive and transmit anything sent to me on this account, and to acknowledge it in your columns.

TRANSLATION OF THE DOCUMENT REFERRED TO ABOVE.

Judgment has been given in the Nagoya Appeal Court in the case of Uyeda Fusanju, a heimin domiciled at No. 36a, Kami Mayetsu-cho, Nagoya, Aichi Prefecture, appellant, and Yamazaki Tomokichi, a heimin temporarily lodging at No. 141, Koku-cho, Nagoya, Aichi Prefecture; Kakeya Jinsaku, a shisoku temporarily lodging at No. 15, Yoko Daikwan-cho, Nagoya, Aichi Prefecture; Yamazaki Kotaro, No. 163, Takejima-cho, of the same city and prefecture; and Hamashima Tabei, No. 77, Kami Nagoya, Kinjo village, West Kasugai district, Aichi Prefecture, respondents. Mr. Miyuki Junzo was for the appellants and Messrs. Minobe Teiryō and Arai Takichi for the respondents.

The appeal was from the judgment of the Nagoya District Court with regard to the recognition of co-ownership of immovable property by the parties involved, and an application for the alteration of the names of owners registered. The judgment of the Appeal Court is as follows:—

The appeal is rejected and the costs of proceeding shall be borne by the appellants.

The representative of the appellant insists that the original judgment should be rejected in its entirety, and that a fresh judgment should be given against the respondent, whereas the representative of the latter urges the rejection of the appeal on the ground that it is in no way justifiable, and requests a judgment throwing the costs of proceedings on the appellants. The facts stated by both parties are precisely the same as in the original case.

The case makes it necessary to ascertain whether the property in dispute should be recognised as the joint property of the appellants as registered in their name, or as the property of the members of a corporation called the Yoro-in (Asylum for the Aged.) Witness Hashimoto Takachi, at the first trial, stated that when he sold the lot No. 2 (the land in dispute) at Yokedaikwancho to Ito Sukeaki and Uyeda Tsunagoro (appellants) on the 28th July in the 25th year of Meiji, he was informed of the land being used for the support of aged persons, and that the "Asylum for the Aged" actually stood on the land in question. Another witness, Ono Tatsukichi, deposed that when he contracted for the buildings (now the subject of litigation) constructed on a portion of lot No. 2 at Yoko Daikwancho, he was required to erect a convenience adjoining the ground floor, as aged men were to be kept in the buildings. According to the statements of sub-witness (sankō-jin) Ito Sukeaki, although lot No. 2 at Yoko Daikwancho and the buildings thereon were retained as a property owned by himself and Uyeda Tsunagoro (appellants), the same in reality belonged to the Yoro-in, and in order to prevent the registered owners from being tempted to any dishonest schemes in future, the whole property was, by way of precaution, held under the guise of being mortgaged to Iwasaki and others. Iwasaki himself made the same depositions as the sub-witness above referred to. These statements are not only perfectly free from doubt, but are also confirmed by Exhibits Nos. 3, 4, and 5 presented by the representative of the appellants to show the original circumstances connected with the matter in dispute. Exhibit 3 represents a document concerning the purchase of the land which now forms the subject of dispute; Exhibit 4 is a mortgage in which the land in question was pledged, and finally Exhibit 5 is a copy of another document for obtaining a loan on the security of the buildings in dispute. The most striking features of these documents are (1) the uniformity as to amount of purchase price as indicated in Exhibits 3 and the mortgage; (2) the exemption of interest on loans specified in Exhibits 4 and 5; and (3) the repudiation of liability to pay the debts mentioned in the respective documents, in the event of the properties under security being destroyed by fire or natural calamity. These special forms of contract are seldom to be found in the case of ordinary loans, and as the statements made by witnesses and sub-witnesses are consistent with them the statements in question are all the more worthy of credence. Moreover, if the properties in dispute had really been held as properties co-owned by the appellants, the document specified in Exhibit 3 should have remained in the hands of the appellants, whereas it was actually and in fact held by the respondents. Although the representative of the appellants has alleged that one of the co-owners, in conspiracy with the respondents, delivered the document to the latter, there is no evidence whatever to bear out that statement, and there is no alternative but to recognise the respondents as the legitimate owners. Therefore, with reference to the statements and the documents presented by the appellants, as well as the facts bearing upon the question at issue, the properties in dispute are to be recognised as belonging conjointly to the members of the association called the Yoroin.

In determining whether the respondents are really the members of the said association or not, it is to be remarked that, although the representative of the appellants insists that the respondents are not to be included in the membership, yet as the allegation is only supported by pointing to the names of the original promoters of the institution, it does not furnish data for ascertaining who are the actual members of the association.

Taking into consideration depositions made by sub-witness Ito Sukeaki at the first trial as to the five respondents being the actual members of the aforesaid institution, and also the fact of the document (Exhibit 3 A) being actually held by the five defendants and presented by them to the Appeal Court, there is sufficient evidence to recognise them as members of the Yoroin, and a decision is hereby given in the sense of the judgment above pronounced.

THE BOOKSHELF.

A Practical Introduction to the Study of Japanese Writing, by BASIL HALL CHAMBERLAIN, Emeritus Professor of Japanese and Philology in the Imperial University of Tokyo. London: SAMSON LOW, MARSTON, & Co., Ltd. Yokohama: KELLY & WALSH, Limited.

This public is already indebted to Mr. Chamberlain for an enormous amount of scholarly work. His grammars, his "Things Japanese," his translation of the Kojiki, and other contributions to the Asiatic Society of Japan, to say nothing of the share he has taken in the compilation of Murray's Guide, are too well known and too highly valued to need mention in these columns. In possession of that learned leisure and that freedom from the multifarious distractions which harass many other sinologists, he has been able to undertake and to carry to a successful issue a work of great difficulty and requiring the most delicate handling. The Bunji no Shirube, the Japanese title of Mr. Chamberlain's "Introduction to the Study of Japanese Writing," exceeds all our expectations. We knew that anything coming from Mr. Chamberlain's pen would be scholarly and highly valuable to the student of the Japanese language, but we did not expect such a combination of art and thorough scholarship as we possess in the large, handsome volume that lies before us. So tastefully is the book got up that we shall not be at all surprised to hear of its being purchased for its artistic beauty alone by persons who have no intention of studying Japanese modes of writing. The pages of exquisitely printed Chinese characters, each occupying its own square, cannot but prove a feast to the eye of the artist wherever the volume may find its way. The printing of the whole work reflects high credit on the Shueisha, and will doubtless prove to them the best possible form of advertisement.

The Bunji no Shirube is divided into twelve sections, the titles of which are as follow:— "Sect. I. Introductory Remarks. Sect. II. On Some Grammatical Peculiarities of the Written Language. Sect. III. Preliminary Exercises in the Hiragana Syllabary. Sect. IV. Four Hundred of the Commonest Chinese Characters arranged as Writing Lessons with Reading Exercises attached. Sect. V. On the Structure of the Chinese Characters. Sect. VI. A Tale of the Good Old Days. Sect. VII. More about the Kana. Sect. VIII. Proper Names. Sect. IX. Advertisements and Newspaper Clippings. Sect. X. Easy Pieces by Contemporary Authors. Sect. XI. Odds and Ends. Sect. XII. The Epistolary Style. There is a Postscript, an Index of Chinese Characters, arranged under their radicals, and an Appendix, the whole work covering 482 quarto pages. To give some idea of the quality of the paper used, en passant, we may state that with a comparatively light cover the Bunji no Shirube weighs 5½ lbs.

In his introductory chapter Mr. Chamberlain dismisses as quite untenable the notion that the reign of the Chinese ideographs is near its close. He sees no sign whatever of any change in the method of writing followed by the nation. The adoption of Roman is out of the question and even the substitution of Kana for the Chinese characters, though advocated by a few writers, is regarded as undesirable by the bulk of the people. The Chinese character holds its own, despite all other changes. "Not only every popular book, every important newspaper, every official notification, but every private receipt, every estimate, every letter, even every post-card sent by your cook or boy to his people at home, every written document of every kind connected with the life and work of the whole people of Japan, individually and collectively, has the Chinese character as its basis." Writing on the same subject in the Postscript, Mr. Chamberlain says:—"Herein, too, we may perceive the underlying reason of the apparent paradox that the Europeanisation of Japan has so flooded the language with Chinese terms that, whereas forty years ago most official proclamations were fairly intelligible even to illiterate peasants, those of the present day can scarcely be understood save by persons well-versed in Chinese. We have here no instance of foolish affectation or pomposity; it is simply the effect of a natural preference for clear terms wherewith to express manifold and delicately shaded thought, such as a complicated social state inevitably produces. And this it is that rivets the Chinese written character on the Japanese nation,—the Chinese character being, under those local circumstances which history has produced, the only available instrument for the expression of exact thought. Therefore we may conclude that future efforts to abolish its use will prove as fruitless as similar efforts in the past. A nation does not give up exact thinking to please Utopian 'reformers.' If, per impossibile, we can imagine the Chinese character discarded even for a day, we must imagine at the same time a sudden stoppage of the wheels of government, law, business, mental activity of every sort; for the Chinese character is the Japanese language for all purposes demanding exactness. 'True 'tis pity; pity 'tis true.' This view is, it seems to us quite incontrovertible. After a quarter of a century's study of the ideographs we have come to the conclusion that there is no language equal to Chinese in the power of expressing multum in parvo. Certain Western philologists have recognised this. Max Muller, for instance, says of Chinese:—"Every shade of thought that finds expression in the highly-finished and nicely balanced system of Greek tenses, moods, and particles can be expressed, and has been expressed, in that infant language by words that have neither prefix nor suffix, no terminations to indicate number, case, tense, mood, or person." (Essay on the Stratification of Language.) For nomenclature what language is to be compared to Chinese? The names given to things, institutions, processes, and corporations in this country are at once the delight and the despair of the translator. In numerous instances he puzzles his brains in vain to find a powerful equivalent in another language. Some people maintain that it is the wonderful adaptability of the Chinese for nomenclature that is responsible for the extreme, and, to us, unnecessary, minuteness with which everything in the country is denominated. Many names as names seem to us to be quite untranslatable. We can give their meaning, but can find no equivalents in a European tongue. In some cases of course the things referred to do not exist with us. But it far more frequently happens that though the things exist we have never thought of giving them names, our languages not lending themselves to the formation of striking nomenclature in the way the Chinese does. To take only one instance among hundreds. Supposing a Cricket Club is represented by a cricket team, and after the said team has played in a match the Club decides to entertain the team at dinner. If the team won the match the dinner might be called "A congratulatory dinner," or something of the sort, and perhaps in case of defeat it might be called "A consolation dinner," but the Japanese possess a term for such an entertainment in which, with perfect taste, the question of success or failure is alike excluded. The 慰勞會, irokai is an entertainment held for the purpose of acknowledging services rendered. It would, we think, be quite impossible to find any English term that would equal the Chinese in terseness and expressiveness in this case, as in so many others. We must not pursue the subject further. We endorse every word of what Mr. Chamberlain says about the accuracy of the Chinese language, and we believe that this accuracy of expression is a training for the youthful mind that is highly valuable. Every separate shade of thought has its written symbol and is not easily confused with other shades.

But we must hasten on and give a sketch of the method pursued by Mr. Chamberlain in his interesting work. In order to determine which characters occur most frequently in Japanese literature Mr. Chamberlain made minute inquiries at Tōkyō printing offices. We will state the results of his inquiry in his own words:—"Enquiry at Tōkyō printing-offices showed the maximum number of characters employed in this country to be 9,500; but of these, over 3,000 are extremely rare, serving the needs of such writers only as affect archaic and poetic diction. The number kept on hand in all the usual varieties of size and 'face' is 6,100; but this again must be regarded as a maximum, an abundantly liberal limit stretched so far only by precaution. . . . Scholars carry over 4,000 characters in their heads, the general public about 3,000. One thousand characters, which the experience of forty years has proved to recur with special frequency, are kept by the type foundries in larger quantities than the rest; but a few additional hundreds on the boundary line run them hard in the race, and some 800 or 900 more form a useful acquisition. This gives a reduced total of about 2,350 common characters with which students must familiarise themselves. . . . Just these 2,350 indispensable characters are here brought before their notice, with explanations thrown in occasionally to ease the drudgery of memorising."

Each new character is numbered, and after being explained fully is given in large black type as a part of the writing lesson which follows the reading lesson. Notwithstanding the expense and trouble involved, Mr. Chamberlain has printed words or half-words derived from the Chinese and purely Japanese words in different type throughout the whole volume. The native Japanese is printed in italics, the Chinese in small capitals; thus ichi two hiite, ju two shiru.

After a careful perusal of the whole work we have come to the conclusion that the author has carried out his purpose with great fidelity and that the practical objects of the book have never been lost sight of. The signs which meet the eye of every passer-by in all parts of Japan Mr. Chamberlain has transcribed and explained. The notices to be seen in Post Offices, Railway Stations and Police Stations; the commonest forms of advertisement appearing in the daily papers; funeral notices, invitations, and the like are all presented to the eye in their strictly native form without a single alteration or omission of any kind beyond being printed in clearer type and on better paper than one is accustomed to see. His Chapter on Proper Names, one of the most useful in the book, deals with names that occur in the newspapers and elsewhere every day. The "Newspaper Clippings" were extracted from last year's daily newspapers and the topics discussed in these quotations are of considerable interest. The Epistolary forms given are those which are most familiar to students of the language. Thus the idea of supplying the information which is indispensable to any one who aims at obtaining a fair acquaintance with the written language has been kept in view in every chapter.

But in addition to this a large number of purely theoretical questions are discussed in a scholarly manner. Whether the reader agrees with the theories defended by Mr. Chamberlain or not, he cannot but admire the careful manner in which he has gone into these theories and the clearness with which he states his own views. There are parts of the book where the author may seem to some readers to be hypercritical, where Mr. Chamberlain does not quite carry out the advice he gives the student on p. 375:—"Time will be saved and the speediest progress made by simply accepting the various readings each in its context. Above all, nothing can be gained by argument:—The language is highly irregular and arbitrary, and must be accepted as such."

There is one part of the book in which it seems to us comment is carried altogether beyond proper limits, and Mr. Chamberlain passes from the region of scholarship and enters the thorny ground of theology and psychology. As a rule Mr. Chamberlain does not think it worth his while to draw any attention to the nature of the views expressed by the writers whom he quotes, allowing even the boastful words of Mr. Taguchi Ukichi on p. 303 ("whether it be in medicine, in architecture, in shipbuilding, in railways, in mining, in telegraphy, in manufactures of every sort, our country possesses scholars and engineers capable of excelling those of Europe and America") to pass unnoticed. This is as it should be. For the object of the book is not to give the author's views as to what opinions are right or wrong, but to help the student to understand the language by means of which the opinions are expressed. But after quoting Mr. Fukuzawa and Dr. Katō Hiroyuki, Mr. Chamberlain thinks it necessary to warn his readers against the pernicious tendency of their opinions, somewhat in the style of a minister of the Gospel; and, in the former case, adds comments on the darkness of the Meiji age, which, we venture to think, are altogether out of place in a Chinese Reader. Of Mr. Fukuzawa, Mr. Chamberlain says:—"His thought is shallow, his philosophy a crude materialism with a veneer of utilitarian morality and amiable optimism. The essay here fairly typifies his views." This is then made the text of a little sermon as follows:—"But—and this is a consideration worth pondering—it typifies the views of the overwhelming majority of educated Japanese at the present day. If such be the doctrines of the leaders, what will be the practice of the led when these doctrines shall have filtered down to the base of the social edifice, and shall have washed away what small fragments remain of the old Confucian ethics? The present Japanese epoch styles itself, Meiji, 'enlightened peacefulness.' But if the light that is in it be darkness, how great is that darkness!" Why were these remarks inserted? Whether the closing sentences of the passage do or do not answer that question we leave readers to determine. "Nevertheless, if we view the matter properly, these considerations in no way unfit such books for the use of European students. On the contrary, and even assuming that most of those employing the present work will be missionaries,* surely it must be advantageous to them to make acquaintance at once with the genuine mental attitude of the people among whom their life is spent." Of Dr. Katō, Mr. Chamberlain says, "Though he is a highly cultured and most amiable man, all his work (so far as least as we are acquainted with it) has a profoundly demoralising tendency. It is materialistic to the core."—The materialism quite naively expressed, as in the Japanese way.

As we passed from the scholarly pages of the earlier part of the work to the perusal of such outbursts as these it seemed to us though the author must have changed. But at this juncture the Japanese saying 異心同體 (ishin-dōtai) came to our rescue. "Different in soul, though the same in body." Commenting on this saying on p. 317, Mr. Chamberlain says, "Though each man has but one body, which of us but does not feel in himself two souls? Sometimes they pull in different directions; sometimes, as here, one persuades the other." These comments, then, were the work of the "second soul." We don't agree with the "second soul's" conclusions in reference to Messrs. Fukuzawa and Katō and the tendency of their writings. After twenty years of study of both writers we have no hesitation in saying that they are grossly misrepresented by Mr. Chamberlain. But it would be quite out of place to go into details on the subject here. The two gentlemen referred to are agnostics, but not materialists. An English Member of Parliament, writing in the Spectator on March 11th last, says, "Vast numbers—in my belief, the great majority—both of men of action and of men of thought are agnostics." So that the crime of Messrs. Katō and Fukuzawa is committed by millions of highly cultured men in Europe. The terrible darkness of the Japanese Meiji era depicted by Mr. Chamberlain has been voluntarily entered by leading minds in the very centres of the world's highest civilisation!

It is with no wish to pick a hole in a really splendid work or to lessen its influence in any way, that we have penned the above. We consider it a duty, as one of the most ardent admirers of Mr. Chamberlain's methods, thoroughness, and usual impartiality, to draw attention to what all unprejudiced minds must consider to be a defect in a very small portion of a lengthy and highly technical work.

In conclusion, we would say that in our opinion the main difficulties of the Japanese written language may be conquered by means of Mr. Chamberlain's new method of study in half the time required hitherto, when each learner has dabbled here and there as fancy dictated and has ended by learning a number of almost useless characters and failed to memorise ideographs needed every day. We consider it one of the cheapest books on the Japanese language that has been published. It is at once a Reader, a Grammar, and a Small Dictionary. As a lexicon it is superior to those in ordinary use, as the explanations given are fuller. Minute comments on the translations given would occupy more space than we have at our disposal. Suffice it to say that the Moji no Shirube is thoroughly reliable throughout and a perfect god-send to all those who essay the task of mastering one of the most difficult languages of the world. If, as some maintain, genius consists in the power of taking infinite pains, Mr. Chamberlain has certainly earned the right to the title.

Anerostes, the Gaul, by EDGAR MAURICE SMITH; London, Unwin's Colonial Library.

THIS is one of the successes of last autumn's publishing season. It is rightly described as a fragment of the second Punic War, and it deals with the first few days that Hannibal spent on the soil of Italy after his famous passage of the Alps. The book is dedicated to Sir William Dawson, whom the author addresses as a distinguished scholar and scientist, and we think there can be little doubt that the patron was as pleased with the story as is the present reviewer. Replete with antiquarian detail, the story yet moves along brightly and at times becomes intensely, nay breathlessly, interesting in its vivid descriptions of hand-to-hand fighting and gladiatorial combats. Of course the silver thread of love is soon woven into the narrative, adding to the charm, but the reader we fancy will be disappointed at the abruptness of the close. Perhaps Mr. Smith has a sequel; if so we will look forward to its appearance with eager anticipation.

Off the High Road, the Story of a Summer, by ELEANOR C. PRICE; London, MacMillan & Co.; Yokohama, Messrs. Kelly & Walsh.

A HEALTHY story in every way, though the motif be a trifle fantastic, Off the High Road is a book that many persons will read with a good deal of pleasure. The author has built up the fabric of her tale in tolerably good English and reproduces the charms of country life in many passages of pleasing distinction. She quickly arouses sympathy for her heroine and her heroine's friends, and thus realises the chief aim of the novelist. But the critic must not be too exacting, for taking as the book undoubtedly is, it has some faults that temporarily disappoint.

The River of Pearls, by René de Pont-Jest; London, Macqueen's Colonial Library; Yokohama, Messrs. Kelly and Walsh, Ltd. M. René de Pont-Jest was evidently writing for the delectation of the boulevard when he sat down and composed the River of Pearls, or the Red Spider, a Chinese romance. The story deals with Canton, the Pearl River, Whampoa, and Hongkong, and mainly concerns the love affairs of an atrocious villain, Tchou, the Red Spider, and the vengeance he wreaked on an unhappy damsel Lion Siou, or, as the French author prefers to call her, Saule Brodé (Embroidered Willow). Incidentally there are introduced many interesting details of pirate life on the waters of the Pearl River, of the pirate refuges at Lintin and other islands near Macao, and above all some truly blood-curdling descriptions of Chinese torturers, their practices, and the judicial methods adopted for extracting confessions. But, as we said above, this story is meant for home consumption, and the local colour has, we suppose, be of the most lurid hue that the literary palette can produce.

It is curious, however, considering the faithfulness of some parts of the narrative, to observe that the author invariably speaks of pinstrea as being the current coin of the trading communities in the Far East; that the lingua franca of the same district is known as Macastre; that, in regard to Hongkong, "if it were not for the wretched fishermen and for some native officials whose palanquins are to be seen on the course among the correctest turn-outs, Hongkong might well be taken for the Isle of Wight. There is the same comfortable and elegant mode of life; the same expense upon horses brought out from home at a high price; the same sort of club life—that is to say, the same races and the same bets; the rich European merchants of Canton have almost all country houses in Hongkong." But then we must remember that the author leads us to infer that the date of the story is fixed somewhere in the early decades of the Colony's existence—in the days of the opium clippers and the Lintin pirates. After wading through the sanguinary chapters of the book we re-echo with the author the philosophic sentiment he uses as a postscript: "By what mysterious Cause did a drop of water, that was meant to give birth to flowers, make rivers of blood to flow? It was Fate that ordered it."

There are some capital illustrations by M. Félix Regamey, which reproduce more faithfully than the narrative the actualities of Chinese life.

AFFAIRS IN CHINA.

It is reported from Peking, says a Shanghai contemporary, that the four Army Corps under Generals Sung Ch'ing, Nieh Sze-ch'eng, Yuan Shih-k'ai, and Tung Fu-shiang have received orders from their Generalissimo, the Grand Secretary Jung Lu, to be ready to assemble at the Southern Hunting Park by the 20th of May, for combined military drills and a grand inspection by the Empress Dowager and the Emperor.

The N.-C. Daily News has been favoured with the following notes regarding the Tientsin-Chinkiang Railway:—It appears that the Tsung-li Yamén obtained the permission of the Empress Dowager on the 6th of January last to give the construction of that railway to a British syndicate, and Sir Claude Macdonald was accordingly notified to that effect. A telegram was then sent by Sir Claude to an Englishman (said to be a Lord) named Charles (? Sir Charles Ross), and this person, representing the British Syndicate, arrived at Shanghai from England on the 19th of March last, and went up at once to Peking, where he still remains. The Tsung-li Yamén then proposed to appoint Chang Yen-mao to be the Chinese Co-President of the Railway, but this was objected to by Sir Claude, and Dr. Yung Wing was appointed instead. Dr. Yung Wing was at once sent for by H.E. Wang Wen-shao, Director General of the Bureau of Mines and Railways, to go to Peking, and he (Yung Wing) is there now. The same paper's informant strenuously insists that Germany will have absolutely no control over any portion of the railway. The Hongkong and Shanghai Bank will finance the road.

Mr. R. D. Denness, of the Chinese Eastern Railway Company's steamer Ningooie, has evidently met with a watery grave while on a voyage from Moji to Shanghai. He joined the vessel, we learn from a Shanghai journal, at Port Arthur on the 27th ult., and on the 3rd inst. went off duty and took to his cabin. The steamer left Moji on the 5th, and deceased was seen the following evening on deck by both the Chief Officer and the steward. On the Sunday morning, about breakfast time, his absence was noticed and on the same being reported to Capt. Freeman a diligent search was immediately instituted and every part of the vessel was visited, but no signs of the missing man were discovered. The Captain then took charge of the man's effects, and on arriving in Shanghai reported the case to the English and Russian Consulates. Deceased was over 55 years of age, and was a well-known marine engineer on the China coast.

The arrival at Shanghai of the steamer Trigonia with a cargo of petroleum fuel, causes the N.-C. Daily News to remark that it will probably prove of the utmost importance to that already smoke-laden city. This fuel has been tried there with great success already; when its benefits are more fully appreciated there will be doubtless an enormous demand for it. Its principal merit is that, properly consumed, it is smokeless; that weight for weight it is about the same price as the best Japanese coal at present prices, and gives two-thirds more heat. Its other advantages are that it is more easily handled, requires fewer hands at the furnaces, and leaves no residue. The Cotton Mill and Silk Filature Companies have evidently taken the subject in hand, for the Soochow Cotton Mill has already one of its boilers fitted with oil-using furnaces and will soon have the remainder similarly adjusted; and a number of others likewise interested are making arrangements for the conversion of their plant. Messrs. S. C. Farham and Co. are building a steam launch for the Agents (Messrs. Arnhold, Karberg & Co.) which is also designed for oil consumption.

Says the China Gazette:—The Shanghai public will learn with regret that a telegram has been received from Taku containing the sad intelligence that Mr. R. Lawrie-Smith, the well known furniture dealer of this port, had been drowned at Taku. Only a few hours before his wife received a telegram from him saying he was returning to Shanghai by the Hsinfung from a highly successful business trip to Tientsin, Weihaiwei, and Peking. No particulars are given of how the fatality occurred, and it is assumed that he fell into the river while going aboard in the dark and was carried under in the strong current. The body has been recovered, and we believe an inquest will be held, when we shall doubtless get full particulars. The greatest sympathy is felt with his widow and child in their sad bereavement.

It is currently reported in Shanghai that Mr. Justice Wilkinson, who at present presides over H.M.'s Court in Japan, will be allowed to remain here until all outstanding litigation in which British subjects are concerned is closed. Judge Wilkinson will then, in all probability, go home on leave, and on his return to the East will relieve Sir N. J. Hannen, as Chief Justice of H.B.M.'s Supreme Court for China, Sir Nicholas being very anxious to retire from active service.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Sub-Lieut. Charles Edward Lloyd Thomas has been promoted to the rank of Lieutenant in Her Majesty's Navy, to date from April 1st, 1899.

Charles Emil Leopold, convicted of fraud last December, left Yokohama for Hongkong in charge of jailer Roberts, by the P. & O. steamer Rosella on Wednesday morning. He will serve the rest of his term at Victoria Gaol.

Vice-Admiral Alexieff, who from 1894 to 1897 was Admiral of H.I.R.M. Pacific Squadron, has been appointed Supreme Governor of Kuan-lung Peninsula and Commander-in-Chief of all the Oriental Ports under H.I.R.M. survey.

The eightieth birthday of Her Majesty the Queen will be celebrated on the calendar anniversary of Her Majesty's birth—May 24th. More than ordinary importance is attached to this year's anniversary, which marks the completion of four-score years, and some special celebration is contemplated.

The local agent of the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, & China writes:—It is with extreme regret that we have to inform you that we have received a telegram from London advising the death on the 12th instant of the Chief Manager of our Bank, Mr. Thomas Forrest.

The carpenter of the ship Hahnemann, named J. C. Hudson, died suddenly on Tuesday night. The doctor who was summoned declined to give a medical certificate, and the body was lauded early on Wednesday afternoon for a post-mortem examination to decide whether an inquest is necessary or not.

On Tuesday morning a young woman named Wakabayashi Tatsu (21), daughter of a pawn-broker, of Honmoku, near Yokohama, attempted self destruction by drinking a quantity of poison. Her numerous love affairs have been a source of trouble to her parents, and she determined on death on account of being unable to live with her last lover, named Sugiura Kyozauro, a blacksmith.

Sir Cecil Clementi Smith, G.C.M.G., was elected president of the China Association at the annual general meeting of members held on 5th April. Mr. W. Keewick, M.P., was elected chairman, and Sir Alfred Dent, vice-chairman of the committee, and Mr. R. S. Gundry honorary secretary for the ensuing year.

On Sunday morning a Chinese gentleman who had just come down Camp Hill lost control of his bicycle while rounding the corner near the French Consulate, and dashed into the chains which fence the roadway from the sea. Both bicycle and rider were thrown into the Creek, but the man was not much damaged, though the bicycle was.

The 2nd class cruiser Kasagi, built at Philadelphia, which left Singapore on the 7th, arrived at Yokosuka at 10 a.m. on the 16th. The warship went to England to be fitted with guns and machinery, and sustained damages on the Tyne by coming in contact with a bridge. Her displacement is 4,980 tons her speed, 22½ knots, her length 400 feet, and her beam 48 feet 9 inches. She is a sister ship of the Chitose.

Mr. J. L. Mayers died in Hongkong on Sunday, May 7th, from the effects of the wounds inflicted on him by the fall of the Charleston's whale boat as he was passing under it on his launch. He was acting as agent of Pabst Beer in Hongkong at the time and had gone alongside the cruiser in a launch to collect some bills. He leaves a widow who is well known in Yokohama and San Francisco.

On Monday morning, while some bricklayers were working on a scaffolding at the new Club building, the scaffold collapsed, and the men, with a pile of bricks, fell to the ground. One man was picked up insensible, another was severely cut about the face, and the third was also injured. They were sent to hospital at Noge-yama. The scaffold was only secured by straw ropes.

On Saturday, at the Yokohama Chihō Saibanho, a verdict of acquittal was given in the case brought against the coolies, Yoshida Kintaro and Kobayashi Ushitaro, charged with stealing 8 tons of English coal belonging to R. Isaacs and Bro., 195 Settlement, Yokohama, while engaged in conveying it to the English warship Barfleur. Hayashi Matsutaro, charged with buying the stolen coal from them, was also acquitted. The Court found the evidence insufficient to establish guilt.

The Vienna Politische Correspondenz refers, "in guarded language," to reports about a secret alliance between Japan and China against all the European Powers. "As a consequence of this understanding, all European instructors will shortly be dismissed from the Chinese Army. It is well known that Li Hsueh-chang supports the plan of an alliance with Japan, and that a strong party in the latter country advocates an alliance with China with the object of excluding all Europeans from Eastern Asia." What extraordinary ideas enter the heads of Continental journalists.

Mr. J. A. McDonald, Purser of the North Pacific Steamship Menmouthshire, on arrival on Monday morning, reported:—On our way here from Kobe we passed a large quantity of wreckage between Omaezaki and Rock Island, also a life-buoy, but could not make out the name. Part of the wreckage was a large deck house attached to something similar to a hull."

The Kobe Herald reports that the City of Rio de Janeiro, which arrived at Kobe on Saturday, May 13th, at 9.30 a.m., when off Omaezaki on May 12th, picked up the crew of six men from the wreckage of a Japanese schooner, the Moanho Maru, bound from Matoya to Tokyo.

The Hongkong Daily Press understands that an endeavour is being made to get up evidence with a view to Spain's demanding a land indemnity from China on account of the Viceroy permitting the American steamer Abby to leave Canton with arms known to be for insurgents and landed at Batangas in September last, the vessel being afterwards captured by Admiral Dewey.

Captain Aitken, of the steamer Carlisle City, and his third engineer visited the steamer Goodwin on Tuesday night, and left for their own ship at a pretty late hour. They got into the Goodwin's boat, but, owing to the strong wind and the loss of an oar, could not reach the Carlisle City and drifted about the harbour. They shouted for help, and the Monmouthshire lowered a boat, Mr. Kennedy and Mr. Gibbs taking the oars. The Monmouthshire's boat, however, had not proceeded far when a rowlock broke, and they also were rendered helpless. Eventually they were swept by the sea on to the breakwater, where the boat was smashed. They scrambled on to the breakwater with some difficulty, and soon after found the other boat's crew also, who had been obliged to leave their boat. They were then towing it alongside the breakwater, but the waves did so much damage that they were at length obliged to abandon it. The party eventually reached the red lighthouse, where they passed the night comfortably enough, being received very hospitably by the lighthouse keepers.

Details of the fire at Shiraiishi, Katsuta-gori, Miyagi Prefecture, are to hand. About 1 o'clock a.m. flames broke out at a pile of fire-wood under the roof of a house occupied by one Saito, at Shimmachi. Fanned by the north-easterly wind, the spread of the fire was wonderfully rapid, and the whole town was involved in flames in spite of the strenuous efforts of both police authorities and firemen. It was not until 7.30 that the fire was mastered, after destroying 868 houses. Two persons were burned to death, and 70 or 80 seriously or slightly injured. The cause is supposed to be incendiary. Some days ago, when a fire occurred at the neighbouring village of Fukaya, some Shiraiishi firemen boasted that no fire occurred in Shiraiishi owing to the caution of the authorities, but the Fukaya firemen declared that there would one day be a conflagration which would reduce the town of Shiraiishi to ashes. Two or three days before the Shiraiishi fire, all the streams flowing through the village from Fukaya dried up, their courses having been diverted. It is supposed the Fukaya people are responsible, but no arrests have been made.—Asahi.

Yokohama police should pay some attention to the Hatoba jinrikisha man. His importunity, particularly when bluejackets are concerned, is a perfect pest, and is probably the cause of many of the disturbances which occasionally take place. On Tuesday afternoon there was a loud, indistinct, murmur of many voices in Main-street—the kind of dull roar, only squared or cubed, that serves to indicate popular unrest and incipient revolution in historical pieces on the stage. The noise was sufficiently penetrating to reach the occupants of inner offices, and a general rush was made to the windows facing the street. And this was what was seen. Half-a-dozen bluejackets from the Italian cruiser had landed at the Hatoba, and had had the audacity to insist on walking instead of throwing themselves into jinrikisha. This was too much for the kurumaya. They rose as one man, and pursued the unhappy sailors till they were half-way down Main-street, gathering reinforcements from every stand. The Italians—good-natured and inoffensive-looking fellows—bore the nuisance patiently till they were completely surrounded, and the whole street was blocked up with the vehicles. The jinrikisha men absolutely declined to let them move further, seized them by the arms and the flaps of their jackets, and vociferated as only coolies can. Finally the tars weakly gave way, jumped into the vehicles, and went off, probably in an altogether different direction from that they had mapped out for themselves. The police were either nowhere near, or prudently kept themselves out of the affair.

INNS OF COURT ASSOCIATION IN JAPAN.

ANNUAL DINNER.

The first annual dinner of this Association was held at the Hotel Metropole, Tokyo, on April 27, when amongst the members and guests who assembled were the following:—Viscount Nagao (President), H.E. Mr. Kiyoura (Minister of Justice), Sir E. M. Satow, K.C.M.G. (British Minister), Mr. Herod (U. S. Chargé d'Affaires), Rear-Admiral Fitzgerald, Baron Nambu (President of the Dai-Shin-In), Mr. Montague Kikwood (Legal Adviser to the Judicial Department), Judge Haruki (President of the Tokyo Appeal Court), Judge Mayeda (President of the Tokyo Court of First Instance), Mr. H. A. C. Bonar (H. B. M.'s Consul, Yokohama), Mr. Isobe (President of the Tokyo Bar Association), Count Hino, Viscount Inaba, and Messrs. Miyoshi, Masujima, H. J. Terry, Okumura, G. S. Scidmore, Kikuchi, Shimidzu, Mochizuki, N. W. MacIvor, Akiyama, H. G. Parlett, and others. Mr. Justice Wilkinson, Mr. Lowder, Mr. Litchfield, and Mr. Wallford were amongst the members who were unavoidably prevented from being present.

At the conclusion of dinner and after duly honouring the healths of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan and of Her Majesty the Queen of England, proposed respectively by Sir E. Satow and Viscount Nagao, Sir E. Satow proposed the toast of

THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN JAPAN.

SIR ERNEST, after referring briefly to the origin of the Roman and English legal systems, said that under the régime formerly existing in this country there were no written laws, and no definite distinction between legislative, administrative, and judicial functions. In civil cases the authorities tried to induce the parties to come to an arrangement as to the matters in dispute, which formed the basis of the judgment delivered, while in criminal matters the object was to obtain from the accused an admission of guilt, which he had to sign, and then sentence was pronounced. As soon as the Imperial Government was re-established in 1868, one of the first things done was to create a department of justice, and to frame codes. As in any state the protection of life was the first condition of national existence, a criminal code was the first to be taken in hand, then followed the civil and commercial codes in course of time. As a result of the labour spent on perfecting the system of the administration of justice, the Treaty Powers had agreed to their subjects coming under the jurisdiction of the courts that had been created. Hitherto, the interest of foreigners in the Japanese legal system had been of a limited character, but their concern with it would now be greatly multiplied, and the revised treaties were a proof of the confidence entertained by foreign governments that the administration of justice in this country would be marked by impartiality and equitable principles. He had great pleasure, therefore, in proposing the toast entrusted to him, coupling with it the name of H.E. Mr. Kiyoura, who first as Vice-Minister and then as Minister of Justice had taken so large a share in its organization.

THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE REPLIES.

His Excellency Mr. KIYOURA, the Minister of Justice, replying in Japanese, said:—Mr. Chairman, Your Excellency and Gentlemen—I am heartily pleased to have the pleasure of meeting you at this gathering to-night, where are assembled gentlemen of note both Japanese and foreign, whom we esteem with great affection. Especially is it the case with His Excellency the British Minister who has favoured us with his valuable ideas regarding the future of the judicial administration of this country. I have to thank him for the honour he has thus done to the Imperial Government and more particularly the judicial administration. Japan has, since its opening to foreign intercourse, encouraged by the guidance of Western nations, and following the fundamental principles of civilized influences, reformed her laws and institutions, and she has attained the degree of progress which you find to-day. The revision of the treaties has been concluded with the concurrence of the treaty Powers, agreeably to the cherished wishes of the Japanese nation, and their enforcement is well nigh at hand. The system of foreign settlements has so far presented an appearance resembling a great barrier supported by moats and fortifications, and we have always regretted that this state of things was an obstacle in the way of intimate intercourse between Japanese and foreigners. But the conditions under the new treaties will be like a good smooth broad way, where you find it easy to walk. It will bring forth closer friendship and more activity in commerce, thereby promoting social progress and the advancement of civilization. We must not forget to express our gratitude to foreign professors and gentlemen for their services in having contributed directly and indirectly to the progress this country has attained. This is significantly the case with Sir Ernest Satow. He understands Japan and her people by his long residence as a diplomatic officer in the capital of the Empire, and he has at all times rendered great assistance in promoting friendly intercourse between the Japanese and foreign nations, to say nothing of benefits conferred by him in his personal relations with our people. Again, Mr. Bonar and his predecessors stationed in Yokohama, the most important port in Japan, have promoted the settlement of legal affairs relating to Japanese and British subjects without any friction. I avail myself of the present opportunity for thanking the two gentlemen for their respective good offices. With the object of marching along the unceasing course of civilized progress of the present day, the Imperial Government has endeavoured, without resting, to perfect both the executive and judicial machinery of the country. Different codes of laws have been provided or revised. Various existing ordinances and ministerial regulations have been devised for the purpose of giving full protection to the life and property of the different nationals who are to come under Japanese jurisdiction. Special attention has been directed to the reform of the judicial system, knowing that considerable difference may arise, according to the condition of its organization and working, affecting most closely its efficiency in protecting private interests. For instance, great changes have been introduced in the machinery and personnel of the law courts. Rules and instructions have been newly issued. I trust, therefore, nothing has been left undone which may tend to promote the due protection of private rights and to facilitate judicial administration. We have recently despatched some carefully selected judicial officers to report upon the conduct of judicial business in Europe and America. As I personally observed during my recent official inspection of the different districts at Osaka, Kobe, and Nagoya, the changes effected in the personnel of the law officers, by appointing those imbued with newer knowledge, have had favourable effect in producing more activity and facility in the despatch of judicial business. The average number has been reduced of persons under arrest awaiting trials, and the average time of detention has been shortened. There have been more cases of bail granted than before. Further, the Imperial Government is not yet satisfied with what has so far been achieved, and it is still engaged in the investigation of any and every reform which may be found essential to be provided in proportion to the advancement of civilization. Whatever reforms have so far been effected in the criminal law and procedure, in the law of civil procedure, in the law of the organization of the law courts, and many other measures, do not exhaust the full extent of its aim, and further improvements will be pushed on still hereafter, the law revision committee working as hard as before in the consideration of these measures. Of these laws, the law of criminal procedure, which has the most important bearing upon the protection of personal freedom, has already been revised in part, and the remainder is under revision by the committee. The views brought forward by gentlemen versed in the laws of England and the United States, more particularly the members of the Tokyo Bar Association, with reference to the question of holding preliminary examinations in public and of admitting counsel at preliminary examinations, will receive due consideration at the hands of the Imperial Government, and that system will be adopted, in so far as it is thought fit, taking into consideration the existing circumstances of the country. In closing I should not hesitate to thank the gentlemen of English law societies, in the interests of progress in legal ideas and judicial reforms of Japan, for the different views they have presented to the public from time to time, and which have contributed both directly and indirectly to the development of the judicial administration. I hope that they will continue in the future to give us the benefit of their observations.

The toast proposed by his Excellency was responded to by Mr. Bonar, who concluded by proposing

THE JAPANESE BENCH AND BAR.

MR. H. A. C. BONAR:—Mr. Chairman, Your Excellencies and Gentlemen:—I am placed in a somewhat difficult position as a member of the Inns of Court Association in responding to the toast, "The Foreign Gentlemen engaged in the Administration of Justice," for I have to reply for a number of my colleagues who are entrusted, under the conditions of consular jurisdiction, with the administration of various systems not based on English law, the cult of which is partly the object of this Association. Whatever the systems that have been administered by my colleagues, I feel certain that they have been administered with ability and to the satisfaction of the nationals whom they represent. But I must say something more of a system to which I have the honour to belong, but for which, as one of its administrators, it is somewhat difficult for me to express. Judge Wilkinson has on a former occasion told you how the English system of legal procedure pursues the fairest and best of all existing ways to do right, and I believe and trust that the administration of that procedure in this country, whether by Judges or Consuls, has fully succeeded in doing right. If this success has been attained it is in a great measure due to the ease with which English law can be administered by more or less experienced persons, so long as certain principles are observed. In his instructions, Sir Edmund Hornby, the first Judge of the British Court for China and Japan, said to the Consuls that the "most they could be expected to know was where to find the law." All of you acquainted with English Law will appreciate the difficulty of "finding the law;" and many of you, I hope, have reason to know that "finding the law" for your clients is not at all an unprofitable occupation. We have here a friend and guest who has come a long way to exercise his particular skill in successfully discovering what he seeks. But a successor of Sir Edmund Hornby, Sir Richard Reunie, in much more encouraging to Consuls, and the secret of successful administration of English Law—and here I quote his words—is that "Law and Reasons are seldom at variance, and that a judgment based on broad common sense is rarely at issue with best and highest principles of English Law," in other words common sense and the Common English Law are one and the same thing. With the abolition, then, of Consular jurisdiction, it would have been satisfactory to see a system of Law adopted in this country which is easy of administration, and the main principles of which are never at variance with reason. The difficulty of "finding" this Law is perhaps the only objection that can be urged against English Law, and in opposition to that, the codified Laws of Japan, as they now exist, are perhaps entitled to admiration. But the spirit in which the Law is applied is everything; and while we sympathize fully with the difficulty that Japanese Judges may find in the application of a particular article of the Codes to a particular set of circumstances, we trust and hope that the very first principle they will attempt to apply is that of common sense. Left out in the cold as it has been, English Law will nevertheless be an inexhaustible source on which the Judges of Japan can draw for information and inspiration in all matters that are likely to come before them. Late as it may seem, some Judges and Public Prosecutors have have recently been despatched by the Imperial Japanese Government to America, England, France, and Germany for purposes of investigation. Each one on his return will have a particular tale to tell, but whatever the experiences of these gentlemen may be, we trust that the result of their mission, whether based solely on English methods or not, will affect the Criminal Procedure of Japan to this extent, namely, that an accused person, foreign or Japanese, may, like in the English Courts, within 24 hours of his being taken into custody, be brought before the examining Judge; that the examination, so far as is consistent with the public welfare, may be held publicly; and that, if committed for trial, the accused person will still be held innocent until proved guilty. With such a system in view and relying on the assurances given just now by His Excellency the Minister of Justice, that as far as feasible all possible improvements in that direction will be made by the Imperial Japanese Government, the "Foreign gentlemen administering justice in Japan" will not so regretfully relinquish their judicial duties, and foreigners will soon forget the advantages of that consular jurisdiction which is so soon to die an honourable death. With apologies for my lengthy response, I now propose the health of those gentlemen of the Japanese Bench and Bar, to whom, after the encouraging utterances of the Minister of Justice, we may confidently look for a liberal dispensation of Law, Justice, and Common Sense. I couple this toast with the names of Judge Mayeda and Mr. Miyoshi, "The Japanese Bench and Bar."

JUDGE MAYEDA REPLIES.

JUDGE MAYEDA (speaking in Japanese):—Mr. Chairman, Your Excellencies and Gentlemen:—I feel honoured by being one of the guests at this honourable assembly this evening. I do so all the more, because I count this occasion as one of the events to be remembered in my life, enabling me as it does to place my views before the present gathering. Looking back at old times, it was never imagined in those days, just after the last Revolution, that anyone should engage in conversation concerning the past and future of this country in such a party as the present. The change of circumstances brought about by the march of civilization has caused the treaty powers to recognize the progress attained by this country, and to consent to the revision of the treaties and the abolition of extra-territoriality. This fact is not only gratifying to the Japanese nation of the present generation, but it is also an event which should be significantly recorded in Japanese history. It should be remembered by the Japanese nation without forgetting our obligation to the treaty powers. We should particularly thank Great Britain for the assistance rendered by her both directly and indirectly towards the progress of Japan, and for being the first nation to do us the honour of revising the treaties. The long cherished wishes of the Japanese nation for the revision of the treaties were not for the mere vain glory of standing on an equal footing with foreign nations, but were inspired by the desire of discharging the trust and confidence thus placed in her, and of consummating the work of the new treaties by securing their smooth working. Their operation is now close at hand. To-day not only the government but also the people of Japan are hard at work in preparing to meet the necessities of the new régime so that nothing shall be omitted to improve upon existing conditions, and so as to obviate the inconvenience to foreigners. Has not this been just proved by the speech of His Excellency the Minister of Justice? Both the revised codes as passed by the Imperial Diet and other arrangements which will hereafter be introduced, will, I am convinced, obviate any inconvenience to foreigners after the operation of the new treaties. It is not, however, unreasonable that foreigners, whose languages and customs are so totally different from those of the Japanese, should feel some anxiety at having to entrust their rights of life, property, and reputation to Japanese protection, and that they may have some fear of the Japanese courts which are to be the guardians of their rights. I will, therefore, say a few words to explain the present condition of the Japanese courts. I have been told that foreigners who do not fully understand the customs and institutions of Japan have suspected that the independence of the Japanese judiciary might be merely theoretical. It is true that more than ten years ago, previous to the promulgation of the Japanese Constitution, judges were placed in the strange position of having to follow entirely the wishes of the executive in deciding certain matters. This order of things was, however, changed with the grant of the Constitution, and the passing of the laws relating to the constitution of the law courts by which the judges were secured in an independent position, so as to discharge their duties in the name of His Majesty the Emperor within the limits of law, and even the Minister of State for Justice is to-day powerless to say a word touching their decisions. Sufficient safeguards have been provided with reference to their appointment and dismissal, so that there is no fear for them in exercising their functions independently. The judges of to-day know fully well that there is no distinction to be made between natives and foreigners in the application of the laws, and this principle is strictly adhered to. That this is the case well, I am confident, be recognized by those of you who are engaged in the practice of the law. Nevertheless, whether the application of the law is in accordance with the spirit of legislation, and consequently inflicts the objects of protecting private rights or not, depends upon those who are the administrators of the laws. This consideration has for years occupied the attention of the Minister of Justice, and as the result of it those now occupying the bench may on the whole be said to be properly qualified. Of the judges in the Tokyo Appeal Court district more than half have passed through a special course in the study of law by the aid of foreign languages. There are to out of 22 judges in the local courts, 17 out of 28 judges in the district court, 18 out of 30 judges in the Appeal Court, and 16 out of 27 judges in the Supreme Court, who have studied either in the Japanese University or at colleges abroad. I am particularly pleased to tell you, gentlemen of this Association, that the majority of these judges understand English, the language of your Association. Even those who do not understand foreign languages are not, I do not hesitate to say, behind the others in their knowledge and experience of law and practice. Although I am not able to speak in the same way of the Judges sitting in the courts situated elsewhere than in the Tokyo Appeal Court district, those whose seats are in Osaka, Yokohama, Kobe, Nagasaki, Hakodate, and other important localities, have been carefully selected, and there is no reason for anxiety on the part of foreigners as to the fitness of these gentlemen to discharge their duties with satisfaction. Some people may be apprehensive on account of the difference in language. Such fear will, however, be unnecessary, as court interpreters will be carefully selected by examination, to say nothing of the fact of many of the judges themselves being versed in foreign languages. Some anxiety may be felt as to obtaining bail and other forms of release from arrest. These matters are duly looked after in accordance with law, being outside of the reach of the executive authorities, as will no doubt be admitted by the gentlemen present to-night. While it is beyond the powers of the judges to step out of the proper scope of the laws, and to make any discrimination between natives and foreigners, you may depend upon it that the judges will, so far as it lies within their discretion, leave nothing undone which may assist foreigners in the exercise of their rights, or the recovery of their claims. I should myself desire above all other things not to wound the mutual feelings of Japanese and foreigners. It is of frequent occurrence between those differing in language and customs that misunderstandings arise; a thing done with an intention of showing respect may be construed as an insult, or the expression of a wish to be friendly might happen to be taken quite the other way, as it often happens in daily life. When I was studying in Europe, what I felt unpleasant or troublesome at the beginning of my sojourn afterwards turned out to be nothing of the kind, as I discovered only after gaining more acquaintance with the manners and customs of the place. This an experience which I have often cited as a warning to my countrymen who go abroad. A drop of water multiplied may float a ship of several thousand tons. A slight conflict of sentiment may, if repeated, be the cause of irreparable injury. I should, therefore, wish most earnestly that both Japanese and foreigners should exert themselves to cultivate intimate intercourse, and acquaint themselves with the languages and manners of each other, so as to prevent misunderstandings and to secure the smooth working of the new treaties. I am convinced that an association like yours will be a most useful medium of promoting my wishes, and I hope your example will be followed by my countrymen, so as to facilitate closer intercourse between natives and foreigners. I wish, gentlemen, the future prosperity of your Association.

MR. MIYOSHI RESPONDS.

Mr. MIYOSHI (speaking in Japanese):—I feel it a great honour this evening to meet you gentlemen interested in the jurisprudence of English Law, and to be invited as the guest of Vice-count Nagaoka, your esteemed chairman. At the same time, as I say a few words of thanks for your guests, I wish to review what has been done by English lawyers in the interests of law and legal practice in this country, and to express my hopes for the future. In the feudal days, when the power of the Daimyo and Samurai was supreme, the rights of life, property, and liberty had no existence for the common people. Their protection was an impossibility. Since the revolution, the advancement of ideas and knowledge new to the Japanese has helped the progress of this country, which has made such remarkable strides in civilization, and the conditions thus produced make on a man like myself, born under the old régime, the impression of having been transported into a new world. While it is generally true that the professions and learned men of all western nations have helped Japan in leading her to reform her laws and institutions, the laurels of assisting the practical application of advanced legal principles in the Japanese administration of justice belong to English lawyers. They have been the leaders of law reforms in this country. The foreign lawyers who practiced at the Japanese Bar in its early days were English barristers only, such as Mr. Ness, Mr. Kirkwood, Mr. Lowder, and others, and of no other nationality. Those Japanese who took to the practice of law from the first period of their career were men like Mr. Iho Takahashi, Mr. Masujima, and others, all educated in English law. Therefore, I say it is the English lawyers who have mainly contributed to the real improvement of the Japanese law courts. Again, we owe to Great Britain her good will, it being the first nation to consent to the revision of the treaties. The cause of it lies, I am sure, in the fact that English lawyers appreciated the actual condition of our courts. Japanese legal ideas have made some progress, yet it is more with reference to public laws. The value of private rights and personal liberty is yet very little understood. The laws relating to the protection of these rights are still far from being perfect. Is not the non-admission of counsel at the preliminary examination of a criminal charge a very significant example of it? I should, therefore, any that there is a vast field for legal amelioration left yet in this country. May we hope that the authorities may be broad-minded and take special care to fully consider public opinion and that they may avail themselves of the co-operation of lawyers, both judges and advocates, for the advancement of the judicial progress of the country. For such purposes, you gentlemen who are English lawyers will set good and beneficial examples by your efforts toward the consummation of great reforms in the judicial administration of this country. The toast of

was replied to in English by Viscount NAGAOKA, the President. Your Excellencies and Gentlemen—I thank you for the favourable reception you have given to the toast just proposed by Mr. Miyoshi, and I feel proud of the honour that has been conferred upon me by coupling my name with it. This Association takes its name from the four Inns of Court, which are the sole surviving constituent bodies of a great legal university which once existed in England. In the charter under the Great Seal granted by James I. to the two societies of the Temple, they are described as "two out of those four colleges the most famous in all Europe." Mr. G. Pitt Lewis, Q.C., says that this University was the cradle of English Law, and that its history is the story of English Law from its infancy. It is not my purpose to occupy your time with the story of the origin, growth, and decline of this great legal university; but still, following Mr. Pitt Lewis, it may be stated briefly that it was formed of those societies or associations, known as Sergeants' Inns, where dwell together those who were alone capable of being judges; the Inns of Court, which comprised advocates in the Courts; who had not arrived at the degree of sergeants; and also the more advanced apprentices; and the Inns of Chancery, where dwell the "clerks of Chancery," and junior students of the law. These societies dwell in hostels or Inns, and down to the beginning of the 13th century their members were mostly ecclesiastics, but the prohibition of the clergy from practising in the secular courts, in the year 1207, made the establishment of an English School of Law an imperative necessity. In the years 1290-1292, Edward I. issued a royal proclamation, ordering "students apt and loyal" to be brought from the provinces to learn English Law; and it was probably about the end of the 13th or the beginning of the 14th century that the Inns of Court came into existence, though their origin is somewhat obscure. The Sergeants' Inns and the Inns of Chancery have now ceased to exist; and the four Inns of Court are the sole remaining colleges of the Great Legal University. They discharge the duty of educating students for the law through the medium of the "Council of Legal Education," and it was under the auspices of these Inns that every member of the Association, of which I have the honour to be the first President, received this education and became qualified for the degree of Barrister, the attainment of which is in itself proof that its possessor has had a liberal education, and is a passport to learned societies in all parts of the world. And though the Inns of Court are the only portals through which this status can be obtained, and though no one has any right either to be admitted as a student, or to be called to the bar, it is a privilege which is never withheld from any person, of whatsoever nationality he may be, who is properly introduced, and who has observed the conditions. The result of this liberal policy has been that a knowledge of English Law, comparable in extent only with that of Roman Law, has been spread all over the world; and that in nations once hostile to the admission of foreign influences, Western ideas are now readily welcomed, and English law has probably become as large a factor in the future history and civilization of the world as is English commerce. It is not surprising, therefore, that subjects of His Imperial Majesty, who like myself have enjoyed the benefit of the education which is afforded by the Inns of Court, and who have been called to the English Bar, should entertain a feeling of very sincere gratitude for the favours we have received, and should be enthusiastic in our desire to extol the advantages of a system from which we have derived so much profit. I fear I have somewhat trespassed upon your patience; but I have thought it right on this, our first grand night, that I should give a brief explanation why the Inns of Court Association, in whose prosperity you take so kindly an interest, came to be established in the capital city of Japan; and I join with you in the hope that its influence may expand. One of the means we employ to that end is to ask our friends to dine with us at least once a year; and I am heartily glad to see how well and how readily our invitations have been responded to on this occasion, and to welcome you in the name of our Association. The members of the Association will now join me in drinking to the health of our guests, coupled with the names of Mr. Kikuchi and Mr. MacIvor.

The spokesmen for the guests of the evening were Mr. N. W. MacIvor, formerly U.S. Consul-General at Yokohama, and Mr. Kikuchi, formerly Secretary to Count Yamada, Minister of Justice, and now one of the leading members of the Tokyo Bar.

MR. MACIVOR.

Mr. MacIvor, after a few opening sentiments on behalf of the guests, and apologizing for cutting his remarks short on account of the lateness of the hour, spoke as follows:—I see from the sentiments expressed by speakers who have preceded me that the attention of all seems to be turned to the effect of the change of jurisdiction provided for by treaties which will come into force at an early date. It is possible that you may wish to have the views of your guests on this all important question. I am very sorry that I cannot speak with authority for my large constituency (furnishing as it does the best evidence of the hospitality of your Association in the fact that we outnumber our hosts), since I have been unable to consult them all, but, speaking for myself, I would say that I do not believe that the results of the jurisdictional change will be as great as those on either side of the discussion seem to apprehend. I am satisfied that, though there may be uncertainties to be met with at first, the whole question will be worked out on practical lines which will protect the admitted rights of those of us who form the foreign section of the communities; my reason for this confidence is that the question has so far been one of theory productive of sentimental discussion and criticism which has not always been fair or well considered on either side; it has been handled by the diplomats, statesmen, legislators, and the Press, who have each in their respective spheres done what lay in their power to call attention to all important conditions raised by the change, and they have done their work well, but their work has been confined to the realm of theory. The matter is soon to assume a more practical form; we are never so much interested in the form of a law as we are in the application that is being made of that law to facts and to conditions. The application of the laws under changed conditions will soon fall upon the shoulders of the members of the Bench and Bar of the Empire. These gentlemen belong to a profession which does not permit one to become a man of one idea, since he is daily called upon to hear and act upon the cares and misfortunes of his fellows in all the varied walks and conditions of life. If, then, they cannot be men of one idea, it is reasonably safe to conclude that they will not be narrow men, but must become, in the application of the legal system, broad-minded practical men of affairs. Then when we remember that the Bench and Bar of Japan have in large measure received their legal incentives from the great body of principles known as Anglo-Saxon law, which has furnished the substructure of two of the greatest Governmental systems of the world, and that their efforts to assimilate these principles to local conditions will be encouraged and directed by such a broad-minded and fair-minded man as His Excellency the Minister of Justice, who sits with us to-night, we may be reasonably certain that justice will ultimately rule in the practical application of the new system. I do not mean to say that the new system is a perfect one; I can see some things in it that I should like to see changed, but it is a human system and no such claim perfection for itself. Then, it is an untried system and awaits its practical application to disclose imperfections that none of us see now. I believe that in the hands of a practical class of men such as those must be who compose the Bench and Bar of the Empire, these imperfections will gradually disappear and the system will adjust itself to local conditions and the demands of public justice and right. We sympathize with you, gentlemen, who will undertake this responsibility and assure you that we of the foreign communities, and possibly the governments that stand behind us, will watch with the deepest and most friendly interest for the results that will follow upon your taking charge of the practical handling and application of the new system.

MR. KIKUCHI.

Mr. Kikuchi (speaking in English)—You will not induct me for speaking disparagingly of your Inns of Court, when I say that somehow in my mind they have always been inseparably associated with dinner-eating. This peculiar attribute of your honourable Society seems to have a long history behind it, and, tested by the famous theory of evolution, it must be considered as the fittest, i.e., one best calculated for the welfare and prosperity of the venerable institution. It is a happy augury for your own Association that you started and kept it up with dinner-eating. None of your guests ever had a chance to get even a peep at any of the traditional convivialities of your mother society. But to-night we have been, through your kindness, permitted for the first time in our life not only to be present at, but actually to participate in, a similar entertainment held by your own Association. Naturally we deem it a great honour and privilege on our part, and there is no manner of doubt that all of us have gladly done full justice to and most gratefully and heartily enjoyed your sumptuous dinner. As for myself, however, I must beg your pardon to make a slight qualification of the statement I have just offered. All your dishes have been so many delicacies and all your wines excellent. But something has materially interfered with my hearty enjoyment of those delicacies and excellences. It was not the wearing of a stiff shirt and a swallow-tail, to neither of which I take a very special liking, but it was the grave sense of an approaching office which I was to have the honour to perform and which I am now performing. Now, apart from dinners, your Inns of Court are certainly an institution sufficiently unique in their character. They are the nurseries of your legal luminaries. They alone send forth all your judges, able and learned; it is from them alone that all your counsel of varied talents come. They may be fitly called the de facto fountain of British justice. Sir, this is no small virtue indeed, for British administration of justice is freely admitted on all hands to be the fairest and purest, and therefore, the best in the world. But I will not presume to dilate further upon the subject with which all of you are far more familiar than myself. It may not be amiss, however, to allude to some of the beneficial effects and influences which the venerable institution has, through its members, produced, and may yet produce, upon our country. During the early stages of our post-Restoration judicial history, most of the rudimentary ideas concerning practical dispensation of justice were thrust into our heads by English lawyers, perhaps with some assistance from their American cousins. I am not quite sure whether the earliest advisers to the Judicial Department were Englishmen or Americans, though I know that the latest is one of your fellow members present here to-night,—Mr. Kinkwood. But there is not the slightest doubt that those foreign lawyers who made our court-rooms ring with their learned arguments were almost all your brothers. In those days they were not particularly solicitous to follow up our rules of practice—and these were not many surely—but they made themselves quite at home in our courts, pursuing there the course of procedure which they were accustomed to take in their own tribunals. Many a time they startled and bewildered—I will not say teased—our judges with strange motions and other novel practices. But that was exactly the way in which our courts imbibed many of the modern forms of procedure, not to say of principles of substantive laws. In this connection, I should not fail to mention one at least of your Japanese members who, though he has left the Bar for politics, laboured then as a practitioner as well as in other capacities to introduce some of the sound rules of the English law into our own. I allude to Mr. Hoshi Toru. Several of your members who are here to-night may yet be able to recall vividly the scenes of those by-gone days and perhaps have in store many interesting personal reminiscences which they could relate. How their patience must have been taxed in conducting their cases through our courts, I can well imagine. But I should be sorry, indeed, if those gentlemen would gauge our courts of to-day and what is going on there with their memories of the former times as their standard. It may be worth while to spend an odd hour or two some day in taking a general survey of our moot rooms for the sake of curiosity, if for nothing else. They will not fail to observe some marked changes that have come over various phases of our judicial proceedings. It will not be exactly right to attribute all those improvements directly to their efforts and influences of the early days, but they will find some satisfaction in reflecting that their Japanese brothers have carefully and zealously husbanded the seeds they sowed in the past and have otherwise been prominent factors in bringing about the results referred to this evening. Let us turn for a moment to what your Japanese members have been doing since. In the Law Department of the Tokyo Imperial University, your Society is represented by the professor of the oldest standing, Professor Hadzumi, and two others, one of whom is an out and out advocate of English law. Speaking of legal education, some of you will remember a law institute once known as the English Law School, whose alumni now number more than two thousand. One of its founders, and for many years its most active and energetic promoter, belongs to your Society. I need hardly say I refer to Mr. Masujima. Of all the Courts in Japan, the one at Yokohama was the first to break up the old sluggish way of conducting judicial business and introduced instead the fresh atmosphere of modern practice. The then President of that Court, Mr. Okamura, is a member of your Association. If you come to codification of laws, you will recognize your fellow members taking a leading and prominent part in it. I need hardly remind you of the fact that you can count among you some of the ablest and most successful members of the Tokyo Bar. It will not be fitting to push my case further and resort to further evidence to prove all the results that have been brought about by the various members of your Society and Association. I remarked before that considerable progress had been made in the transaction of our judicial business. I should not be understood, however, to say that it approaches anything like perfection. On the other hand, I am one of those who believe that much is still left undone, and that there is still great room for improvement. As you are well aware, we have now codes of law, the criminal as well as civil, the substantive as well as the adjective. They are all made after Western models and substantially embody rules and principles common to civilized nations. Having taken a hand myself in the compilation of some of them, I shall not be expected to speak ill of them, even if you would allow me to. At the same time, we should remember that codes are but a form of legislation and legislations, however good in their ways, do not necessarily make the administration of justice what it ought to be. Egypt and Bulgaria may boast of excellent codes, but we are not to infer that therefore their administration of laws is also perfect. In fact, good laws badly administered are far worse than bad laws well handled. I am far from intimating that our administration of justice is not good. I simply mean to say that there is no necessary connection between the character of legislation and that of administration of law, and we should not sit contented because we have turned out so many codes. That there is much room for amelioration in the department of criminal justice, for instance, is a point upon which the opinions of the Bench and the Bar are practically unanimous. Now where shall we turn our attention to find a guiding light in the path towards realizing our aspiration? I do not hesitate to say, I am not afraid to express my conviction that we should look for it in England. No part of the English judicial system presents so marked a contrast to those of Continental Europe as its criminal justice. The enviable fame England has earned for her administration of justice is due largely, if not mainly, to her superiority in that respect. I have the authority of the greatest French thinkers for my remark. When the general public in this country comes to a similar conviction, an association like your own cannot fail to exercise a beneficial influence and assistance. I am not one of those who believe that the operation of our Revised Treaties will work wonders or miracles among our people, nor am I of those who believe in the impracticability of their operation. When they have been put into force, the dissatisfaction, if any at all, of the foreign residents may, perhaps, appear in the form of complaints about our criminal justice. Mere grumbles cannot be listened to, of course. To gain attention, complaints must be formulated and remedies should be suggested, if not pointed out. Under such circumstances, work might very naturally fall upon the members of your Association. I do not know whether your association, as such, will take any action in matters of such nature, but its individual members may have occasion to render valuable assistance in some way or other towards the future betterment of our judicial administration. I trust, however, you will not understand me as insinuating that you should extend your helping hands to such sanguine schemes as would convert our prisons into so many comfortable homes and their cells into drawing rooms. I shall not detain you longer, but before sitting down I should not omit to tender you our sincere thanks for your kindness and our best wishes for the prosperity of your Association and the good health of its members. And I must not forget also to express my earnest hope that, should I ever be given a similar honour again, I may be invited in fee simple, i.e., without any condition or encumbrance whatsoever, so that I shall be able to enjoy without any deduction and to my heart's content all the delicacies and excellencies of your table.

P. C. & A. C. ATHLETIC SPORTS.

The spring sports of the Yokohama Cricket and Athletic Club were held on Saturday, and were very largely attended, the gathering proving a great success both from a social and sporting point of view. The sport was especially good. In the putting the shot Onderdonk beat his record by five inches; in the hurdle race Dyer created a new record of 17½ secs, half a second better than the old; in the pole jump E. W. Kilby beat A. J. Smith's record of nine feet by two inches, and in the long jump Dyer tied J. Eyton's record of 20 feet. 4½ inches. The management was good, and there were no long waits between the events, while the performances of the Barfleur's band helped to relieve the proceedings of all monotony. The following were the officials:—Messrs. Jas. Dodds, J. P. Mollison, and H. A. Stewart, Judges; Mr. D. H. Blake, Clerk of the Course; Mr. E. I. Dyer, Starter; Mr. H. Gunn and Mr. E. Mendelson, Timekeepers; Mr. J. P. Mollison, President; Mr. C. M. Duff, Vice-President and Captain; Mr. F. E. White, Hon. Treas.; Messrs. D. H. Blake, E. I. Dyer, F. J. Lias, E. Mendelson, and Thos. Forrest, Committee; and Mr. H. A. Stewart, Hon. Sec.

Following are details of the events:—

E. G. Fradgley ...	50 yards	...	0
H. W. Kilby ...	40 yards	...	0
Time, 4 min. 55½ secs.

Poole ran splendidly, and finished with several yards to spare. The winner's time was for the actual distance run; E. W. Kilby's time was 4 min. 57½ secs.

At the close the prizes were presented to the winners by Mrs. Flint-Kilby.

THE JAPAN BREWERY COMPANY, LIMITED.

Report and Accounts showing the working of the old Company for the year ended the 31st March, 1899, and the position of the new Company on the 1st April, 1899.

The Directors have the pleasure to present herewith the accounts which have been prepared by the liquidators of the old Company, for the business year ended the 31st March, 1899.

The sales over the past year were fairly satisfactory, and there is reason to expect a marked increase during that now commenced, the sales for April being considerably in excess of those ever recorded for the same month of the year, and the improvement in storage room and bottling capacity enabling the company to meet the demand for their beer more adequately than has been possible during the last two summers. The Kim Beer placed on the market has become very popular.

The price of wages, materials, and coal were very high during some part of the year; but in coal and in several other items a considerable reduction has already taken place.

The working account for the year shows a profit of $96,307.35, which added to the sum of $14,172.20 brought to forward from the previous year, makes the total net profits $110,479.55. Deducting from this $23,625.00 for the interim dividend of 15 per cent. and part bonus to Chief Brewer paid in October, 1898, a balance is left of $86,854.55 which has been paid over to the new company, and will be disposed of as follows:—

To payment of $15.00 per share on 1,500 old Shares in the old Company (making a total for the year of 30 per cent.) $22,500.00
To Depreciation on Buildings and Machinery 10,000.00
To Auditors' Fees and Bonus to Staff, including a special Bonus to Chief Brewer on retirement 6,126.50
Carried forward..... 48,228.05

The difference between dollars and yen on the instalments of the 6,000 new shares in the old Company, interest on such instalments, and the other extraordinary costs occasioned by the issue of new Capital and by the carrying out of the Reconstruction Scheme have, in so far as paid, been met out of the Reserve Fund, such being deemed a proper course.

The new Company was registered in Hongkong on the 8th of April, with the same Directors as were on the Board of the old Company, namely Messrs. James Dodds, J. D. Hutchinson, W. R. Bennett, T. B. Glover, R. S. James, and H. Baehr. As soon as the register of Shareholders permits, a general meeting will be called.

By order of the Board of Directors,
JAMES STEWART, Secretary.

TELEGRAMS.

(TELEGRAMS RECEIVED AT THE LEGATION OF FRANCE IN TOKYO.)

THE "AFFAIRE."

Saigon, May 13.
Major Guignet has been put on the retired list for having communicated to a newspaper some letters which passed between the Ministers of War and Foreign Affairs with reference to the Paléologue incident.

Saigon, May 14.
M. Viviani (Radical Socialist deputy) questioned the French Cabinet on the subject of the affair of Major Guignet. M. Krantz, Minister of War, replied that Major Guignet had acknowledged that he had caused to be transmitted to the Petit-Journal the letters published. M. Delcassé, Minister of Foreign Affairs, recalled the incident which had occurred between Major Guignet and M. Paléologue (of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs) before the Court of Cassation on the subject of the despatch of Panizzardi (Military Attaché of the Italian Embassy). Major Guignet had finally been obliged to recognise that the translation remitted in 1894 to the Minister of War by the Minister of Foreign Affairs was exact. The Chamber received this last statement with cheers.

An order of the day declaring confidence in the Government was adopted by 389 votes to 64.

ANGLO-FRENCH CONVENTION.

The Chamber then approved, by show of hands, after a short discussion, the Anglo-French Convention relating to the Nile and the Niger.

ITALIAN CABINET.

Saigon, May 15.
The Italian Cabinet has been reconstructed under the presidency of General Pelloux.

DISORDER IN SPAIN.

A state of siege has been established at Valladolid in consequence of disturbances which took place between the students and the military.

THE FRENCH BUDGET.

Saigon, May 16.
The French Senate is diligently discussing the Budget.

THE BELGIAN COAL STRIKE.

The strike of coal-miners in Belgium has terminated.

THE MARCHAND MISSION.

The arrival of Major Marchand's mission in Paris is expected. Delegates of the Ministries of War, of the Navy, and of the Colonies are charged with the duty of receiving the mission at the station. Various receptions will follow.

THE FRENCH AND CHINA.

A Chinese Imperial Decree of April recognises the Catholic Religion throughout the whole of China; accords a grade to every missionary; and confirms the French protectorate.

DEATH OF A LITTERATEUR.

The French man of letters, critic, and journalist, M. Francisque Sarcey, is dead.

ENGLISHMEN IN THE TRANSVAAL.

Saigon, May 18.
Seven Englishmen have been arrested at Johannesburg for plotting against the Transvaal.

(FROM THE "JAPAN TIMES.")

THE TRANSVAAL SITUATION.

London, May 12.
Anxiety at Johannesburg has been allayed, owing to the report that Sir Alfred Milner, Governor of Cape Colony, and President Krüger are to meet at Bloemfontein.

London, May 15.
Sir Alfred Milner, Governor of the Cape Colony, and President Krüger are to meet at Bloemfontein at the end of the month.

London, May 17.
A sensation has been caused in South Africa and London by the news that seven former British officers have been arrested at Johannesburg, charged with inciting treason and enrollment of men for the purposes of rebellion, and that they have been conveyed to a gaol at Pretoria, where they have been visited by the British Agent.

CRISIS IN THE ENGLISH CHURCH.

London, May 12.
The Church Discipline Bill has been rejected by 310 votes against 156, and the Government amendment adopted.

CRICKET SEASON BEGUN.

The first match between Australians and the South of England team ended in a draw.

London, May 15.
The Essex team has beaten the Australians by 126.

BRITISH LAND TITLES AT HANKOW.

London, May 13.
Mr. St. John Brodrick, Under Secretary to the Foreign Office, speaking in the House of Commons, stated that representations had been made to Russia relative to the refusal of the Russian Consul to recognize British land titles at Hankow, and that Russia had instructed its Consul to suspend any definite action.

BOUNTY-FED SUGAR.

The Right Hon. C. T. Ritchie, President of the Board of Trade, replying to a deputation of sugar refiners favouring agreement with Powers willing to penalize bounty-fed sugars, said that he and Lord Salisbury had no objection to countervailing duties, but that before proposing them they must be certain that the country was with them, as was the case in India.

FRENCH CHAMBER APPROVES CONVENTION.

London, May 15.

The French Chamber of Deputies has approved the African Convention with Great Britain.

BRITISH BUDGET.

The Budget was passed through the Committee.

A RAILWAY ACCIDENT.

An excursion train dashed into an express at Exeter, on the Philadelphia-Reading Railroad. In consequence 34 were killed and 40 injured.

RUSSIA'S NEW DEMAND ON CHINA.

London, May 16.

Mr. St. John Brodrick, Under Secretary of Foreign Affairs, speaking in the House of Commons, said that, until full facts regarding Russia's demand to connect the Manchurian railway system direct with Peking are laid before the Government, he cannot make any pronouncement thereon.

The Times says in a leader that the Russian demand directly tends to frustrate the object of the recent agreement, namely the avoidance of all cause of conflict, that British trade in China rests on British power and prestige, and that both are seriously endangered by the Russian action.

ALLEGED TREASON AT JOHANNESBURG.

London, May 18.

It has since transpired that the Transvaal prisoners are civilian nobodies. They have been remanded for a fortnight on the capital charge of enrolling men, intending to arm them at Natal and return at a given signal to seize Johannesburg.

The British Agent called on President Krüger and expressed his regret as to the occurrence, when everything pointed toward a friendly understanding.

President Krüger, in reply, hoped that the affair would not interfere with his meeting Sir Alfred Milner, Governor of the Cape Colony.

(FROM THE "JIJI SHIMPO.")

NEW RUSSIAN DEMAND.

Peking, May 12, 2 p.m.

The Russian Minister called at the Tsungli Yamen on the 10th, and demanded a concession for the construction of a railway to Peking through Shanghai-kwan from a convenient starting point in Manchuria.

Peking, May 16.

The starting point of the railway line, a concession for the construction of which Russia has demanded of the Tsung-li Yamen, is Newchwang.

(FROM THE "ASAHI SHIMBUN")

DISTURBANCE AT KOWLOON.

Shanghai, May 16.

Renewed disturbances have occurred in the Hinterland of Kowloon. Over 100 soldiers and three gunboats were despatched from Hongkong. The Volunteers are also on guard.

(FROM THE "CHIN MAIL.")

AGUINALDO SUING FOR PEACE.

Manila, May 4.

President Aguinaldo's envoys have made a second visit to the American lines, and after a conference asked Major-General Otis to grant an armistice.

To this application, General Otis once more replied in the negative, and the insurgent envoys have returned to Apalit.

The Spanish commissioners, who went to Dagupan to endeavour to arrange for the release of the Spanish prisoners held by the insurgents, were not allowed to hold any communication with the shore, armed rebels assembling on the beach to prevent their landing.

And White announces a mate in 7 moves.

GAME No. 508.

One of 26 games played simultaneously at the Manhattan Chess Club, New York.

WHITE—Steinitz. BLACK—Amateur.

GAME No. 509.

A consultation game, in which three of the best players in Moscow were pitted against Lasker, who won in an exceedingly brilliant and original manner in 19 moves, as appended. The London Mail, to which paper we are indebted for this game, says the play will justly cause a sensation throughout the chess world.

LASKER V. MESSRS. FALK, BOFARKOW, AND BLUMENFELD.

WHITE—The Allies. BLACK—Lasker.

(Q P Opening).

1—P to Q4	1—P to Q4
2—P to QB4	2—P to K4

This move, when played a move earlier, constitutes the Charlick Counter Gambit, which probably suggested the text move. Mr. Marshall, a young player of New York, recently won a game with it from the French champion M. Janowski.

3-Q P takes P

3-P to Q 5

This is somewhat analogous to Black 3-P to K 5 in the Falkbeer-Lederer defence to the King's Gambit.

4-P to K 3

4-Kt to K B 3 was the correct play.

5-B to Q 2

4-B to Q Kt 5 ch

A surprising and pretty continuation.

6-Q to R 4 ch

5-P takes P 1

Of course, it is fairly obvious that if White had played 6-B takes B at once, then Black by P takes P ch, 7-K to K 2, P takes Kt (becoming a Knight, ch) 8-R takes Kt, B to Kt 5 ch wins the Queen. The move played seemed a safe course to win a piece, but it soon led the allies into difficulties.

7-B takes B

6-Kt to B 3

8-Kt to K 2

7-Q to R 5!

P to Kt 3 seems stronger, though Black would recover at least the piece by P takes P ch, followed by Q to Q 5 ch.

9-B to Q 4

8-Q takes P ch 1

10-Q Kt to B 3

9-B to Kt 5

11-B to Q 6

10-Castles ch

* There is nothing better.

12-P to K 6

11-P takes B

13-K to B 4

12-P takes P

14-P to Kt 4

13-Kt to B 3

15-P to Kt 5

14-P to Q 4

16-P takes P

15-Kt to K 4

17-Q to B 2

16-Kt takes P

18-Kt to Q 4

17-Kt to Kt 5

19-Kt takes Q

18-Kt takes Q

19-R to Q 7

The masterplay of the champion forms a valuable study.

And White resigns.

NOTES.

Cambridge proved greatly superior to Oxford this year, winning by 5½ to 1½ in their annual match.

Pillsbury, in his exhibition-tour, found Chess-players everywhere. "In towns where it would not be expected that Chess would have many votaries, there has been no difficulty in arranging simultaneous exhibitions with twenty or thirty boards, . . . with crowds of interested onlookers. In the cities it has not been possible to accommodate the crowds comfortably."

Janowski and Showalter have played three matches: the first was won by Janowski, and the other two, of five and seven games, by Showalter. They have now agreed to play a contest of ten games up for $1,000 a side, the match to come off in the autumn.

A telegraph match between Seattle and San Francisco, which has been pending for about two years was to come off this month.

M. Loubet, the President of the French Republic, has informed a committee of the International Chess Congress in Paris that he would be pleased to present several Sevres vases, valued at 5,000 francs, as special prizes for the international chess tournament to be contested in Paris.

Some time ago we published a list of the Chess-champions of the world. In this list the name of the champion of champions—Paul Morphy—does not appear. While Morphy was undoubtedly the greatest player of his time, yet he never was the Champion of the World. While he vanished Prof. Anderssen, he did not play a match with him or with any one for championship honours.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, MAY 13TH, 1899.

BIRTH.

At Herne Hill, London, on May 4th, the wife of THOS. W. McLEATH, Yokohama, of a Son.

DEATH.

At Holloway, London, on March 30th, Mrs. ELIZABETH CONDER, widow of the late Josiah Conder, aged seventy-two. (Intelligence received by mail of May 6th).

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

H.I.M. THE EMPRESS will visit the Tokyo Charity Hospital on the 16th.

THE EMPEROR had a magnificent reception in Yokohama on Tuesday when he drove through the Settlement on his way to the races.

H.I.M. THE EMPEROR is said to be particularly pleased with the reception accorded him on Tuesday by the foreign community.

FINE weather favoured the spring race meeting:

the sport was good, and the general result excellent.

THE decorations in Yokohama, more particularly the Bund, were the best ever seen in this town.

THE Prince Imperial will pay a visit to the standing squadron, now lying at Yokosuka, on the 15th.

MR. KATO, Minister to Great Britain, is stated to have left Vancouver on the 28th ultimo for home.

THE Italian Cabinet has resigned, fearing that the Chamber will demand the recall of the Squadron from China.

THE pony Aberdeen, that did so well at the Hongkong races last February, won every race it entered at Yokohama.

THE amalgamation of the 130th National Bank, Osaka, and the Nishijin Bank, Kyoto, will shortly be carried out.

THE Russian journals say that the Anglo-Russian arrangement proves that England can no longer claim the lion's share in China.

THE last Chamber Concert of the Junker Quartette party took place on Thursday at the Public Hall and attracted a large audience.

LIEUT. M. MEINCKE, military attaché to the German Legation, had a farewell audience of the Prince Imperial at 10 a.m. on Wednesday.

MR. ARAKAWA GITARO, Governor of Tottori Prefecture, has been removed to Miya Prefecture, Mr. Kubota Kanichi succeeding him.

THE sale of No. 607 of the Kelvin Shimbun, published at Yokohama, has been suspended on account of its containing matter injurious to public morals.

A BOMBAY despatch received on Tuesday states that plague is now declining there. The number of new cases per day are about 150, of which fully 100 prove fatal.

THE Hakui Maru, of the Japan Red Cross Society, now lying at Yokohama harbour, will commence service on the Hongkong Vladivostok line about the 20th inst.

REPLYING to the Foreign Residents' Address the other day, His Majesty departed from his usual custom and expressed a hope that the trade of Japan might be increased.

VARIOUS reports are circulated, tending to indicate that the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, Secretary of States for the Colonies, has resolved upon a strong attitude towards the Transvaal.

THERE is talk of the prominent Japanese Merchants of Yokohama inviting the foreign community to a huge garden party in July to commemorate the opening of the new order of things.

IBRAHIM ALI, Gen. Lord Kitchener's envoy to the Sultan of Darfur, found the latter dethroned, and the usurper routed Ibrahim Ali's escort of 150, killing 120. The survivors have returned to Omdurman.

WEATHER permitting the postponed Athletic sports of the Y. C. & A. C. will take place this afternoon. In consequence, the Ladies' Lawn Tennis Tournament and the opening races of the Yacht Club have been postponed.

ATTEMPTS are again being made to collect funds for the foundation of a University for women. A meeting of promoters was held on the 8th at the Imperial Hotel, Tokyo, Count Okuma, Baron Iwasaki, Messrs. Shibusawa, Kojima, Fuchikura, and others being present.

MR. TANAHARA, ex-Minister to Austria-Hungary, who has been talked of as a likely candidate for the post of Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs, left Vienna on Wednesday. His arrival home is expected on the 14th or 15th proximo.

IN satisfaction of the destruction of the French mission stations in Szechuan, the French Government, in addition to an indemnity of Taels 120,000, claims the cession of forty square miles of territory in the neighbourhood of Chungking.

ON Monday evening a young woman named Washimi Hiro (18), living in Chofu-machi, Yokohama, and a girl named Yoshimura Mitsu, an intimate friend, committed suicide by hanging themselves in the former's house. The cause remains a mystery.

ON Tuesday morning a clerk in the service of the 100th National Bank, Tokyo, while counting notes at the paying-out window, was robbed of three notes of the value of 100 yen each. The note snatcher had the appearance of a merchant and was apparently 28 years old.

M. DE FREYCINET, Minister of War, has resigned, because he was hoisted in the Chamber of Deputies while defending the Governor of the Military College, who had suspended a Dreyfusite professor. M. Kranz, Minister of Public Works, has succeeded M. de Freycinet.

OWING to financial embarrassments, the shareholders of the Shinagawa Electric Light Company are considering its amalgamation with the Tokyo Electric Light Company or the sale of the institution to the latter. The realization of the scheme, however, is improbable.

AT 9 a.m., on Tuesday a committee for revising the Tokyo Municipal divisions met and considered the question of disbursing 5,000 yen as expenses for the investigation of the Tokyo harbour construction work. Other Committees discussed the continuance of the present abattoirs and crematories, the widening of roads, etc.

THE funeral of the late Rear-Admiral Nomura, Commandant of Kure Naval Station, took place on Sunday afternoon at Aoyama Cemetery. Among those who attended were representatives of H.I.H. Princes Arisugawa, Kounetsu, Kwacho, and Yamashina, Marquis and Vice-Admiral Ito, Privy Counsellors Kawamura, and Saeki, and other naval officials. H.I.M. the Emperor contributed yen 300 toward the funeral expenses and a roll of white silk.

ACCORDING to investigations made at the close of February last, the criminals throughout the country numbered over 72,000, against over 74,000 during the corresponding month last year—a decrease of no fewer than 2,000. The explanation is that the authorities have adopted the policy of liberating first offenders after admonishing them; and that the decrease in the prices of commodities has lessened the embarrasment of the poor.

MESSRS. Kishy and Macdonald have raised a subscription among the friends of the late Yamamoto Tadakazu, constable of the Metropolitan Police Bureau, and the list lately closed at yen 96, which was sent to the widow a few days ago through the Kyobashi Police Office. Tadakazu used to be in charge of a branch office at Shinjuku bridge, Kyobashi district, and his courteous treatment of foreigners gained him their esteem.

POLITICAL NOTES.

The calm now reigning in the atmosphere of politics is not expected to be of very long duration. A depression is diagnosed by the prophets. They consider that the ultimate aim of the Constitutional Party is to obtain Marquis Ito for their head, and to organise a new Cabinet. But Marquis Ito is master of the situation, and will insist on having his own terms. The concessions that the Party would have to make to him could scarcely fail to dislocate it more or less. Besides, during its association with the present Cabinet, the Party has been subjected to disintegrating influences. There is now a Yamagata section, and there is a Hoshi section, and there is an anti-Hoshi section. The last consists of the Tosa folk and the Sugita folk. The Tosa are all for placing themselves under Marquis Ito, but Sugita's followers, in other words, the Satsuma men, would prefer an alliance with the elder Satsuma statesmen, and, failing that arrangement, are for Marquis Ito. If that diagnosis be correct, it would follow that Mr. Hoshi Toru and his friends are not anxious to have Marquis Ito's leadership, but we should hesitate to attribute any such reluctance to them.

As for the new party, the Kokken-to, which is to have its first general meeting on the 5th of July, the Asahi thinks that its prospects are questionable, for among its promoters there are no less than four coteries, an Ito coterie, a Yamagata coterie, an Inouye coterie, and a Shinagawa coterie. These four can not agree, the Asahi believes. But that is a very novel theory. When has it been shown, or why should it be assumed, that Marquis Ito, Marquis Yamagata, Count Inouye, and Viscount Shinagawa can not work together? They have repeatedly worked together in the past, and they are precisely the quartet whom the public would be disposed to group for administrative co-operation, though their inclusion in the same Cabinet might be difficult.

Various changes of Japanese diplomatic officials are predicted by the Mainichi Shimbun, with how much truth we do not know. Mr. Hayashi Gonsuke goes to Korea, we read; Mr. Uchida Kessai to London; Mr. Akabane Shiro to Peking, and Mr. Nakada Keigi to Siam. These various appointments are said to be connected with the general trend of Viscount Aoki's foreign policy, but, as to the nature of that trend, there is the usual oracular silence.

ARMAMENTS AND FOREIGN POLICY.

The leader of a forward Chinese policy for Japan is the Fiji Shimpō. That influential journal employs all its eloquence and power of reasoning to prove that unless Japan converts her Fuhkien claims into tangible realities, she will be permanently left out in the cold. There is not much difficulty in constructing an effective appeal to Japanese patriotism on those grounds, and when the Fiji's influence is supplemented by pertinacity, some measure of success will surely be secured. Its latest article on the subject laughs at the notion of waiting until the armaments-expansion programme is completed. Japan is already stronger than any State in the Far East. If European Powers would kindly halt until she had finished her preparations, she might be relatively stronger than she is now. But they are not so obliging. They go on adding to their armaments all the while, so that Japan's position is not a bit better now than it was in 1894, comparatively speaking, nor will it be a bit better in 1902 than it is to-day. "Strike at once" is the evident conclusion to which that line of reasoning points.

Setsurei (Mr. Miyake Yujiro) contributes one of his delightfully piquant articles to the Nippon, and by mere accident preaches from virtually the same text as the Fiji Shimpō. There is an excellent Chinese story of a rustic on whose farm an old tree-stump stood. One day a frightened hare dashed against the stump and broke its neck. The delighted farmer at once abandoned agriculture, placed tree-stumps in profusion on his land, and sat down to wait for more hares. Hence the proverb, Kabu wo mamotte usagi wo matsu (to watch the stump and wait for the hare). That is what Japan is doing now, according to Setsurei. The war of 1894-5 was the hare that collided against her stump. She had not made preparations for war. She did not expect it. Its occurrence was a mere accident of the time, and the fruits of victory came to her as unexpectedly as the hare did to the farmer's pot. Yet she at once set herself to prepare for more wars, and she is now busily planting stumps in the vain hope that some other silly folks will run their heads against them. Meanwhile foreign Powers are augmenting their military strength just as fast as she is, and while she fondly imagines that the distance between her and them is diminishing, it measures in reality just as much as it ever did. Nor is that all. They are not only adding to their respective strength, but they are also beginning to appreciate the folly of fighting for the spoils, and to perceive the wisdom of agreeing about a partition. If Japan waits a little longer, she will have to draw in her horns altogether or make head against united Europe.

THE STREETS OF TOKYO.

The agitation carried on for some time by various journals with reference to the disgraceful state of the Tokyo streets, has borne fruit. In March last the City Assembly was asked to consider a bill providing a sum of 1,000,000 yen for road-making. In view of the magnitude of the problem, the Assembly decided that a committee of investigation should be formed, consisting of one representative from each ward. The committee recently submitted its report, and on the evening of the 9th instant the Assembly decided that the work should be undertaken. The expenditure is to be spread over 5 years, and the funds will be raised by means of a house tax. There is nothing like patience. It is a magnificent reflection that five years hence the capital of Japan may hope to have good roads, and that the vast outlay of twenty thousand pounds is to be annually incurred for the purpose. How many millions upon millions will be lost in the meanwhile by the waste of toil and time that the bad streets entail?

A SENSATIONAL TELEGRAM.

The Fiji Shimpō publishes at once sensational and mystic comes from the Fiji's special agent in Shanghai, and its fourteen Japanese subjects seized by the Russians and killed. The mystery of the matter is that most important words in the telegram printed with defaced type so almost illegible. One, indeed, of the place where the event is totally illegible, but the other deciphered with some uncertainty appears to be tantei (explore). It is probably a euphemism for that be the proper interpretation of the news is that that these were acting as spies, and presumed that the place is some the vicinity of Port Arthur. The whole story may probably be as a canard. Its provenance, stamps it at once as apocryphal dimensions and dénouement are preposterous. What on earth fourteen "spies" or "explorers" doing in company, and how is it able that the Russians would permit death in an era of peace? She has given us a rest for some time, to have now set its burden-fact with extreme vigour.

As to the above two near words, the Fiji explains in a special issue that for tan-ri we must read ryo-baku (travellers), and that word was "Manchuria." Hence the telegram becomes:—"Fourteen travellers have been seized by the Russians in Manchuria, and because of course the Fiji and all the other papers decline to credit this story of intelligence. Nothing of the kind reached the Foreign Office, we know, nor can any confirmation be obtained."

DISHONEST SIZING "HABUTAYE."

Complaints are again heard of dishonest practices in connexion with the fabric of the prefectures of Kanazawa, and Toyama, and that a strongly worded communication has been made by the Prefect of Kanazawa on the subject. The fabric of Kanazawa on the subject of habutaye absorbs more or less moisture of weight varying from 2 to 3 per piece (hiki) is attributable to perjury. But the method of sizing by the adulterators increased it by from 20 to 30 momme per piece. Adulteration is not practised by paltry middlemen. Merchants are also said to be implicated. It does not rest with the manufacturer after the fabric reaches Yokohama it receives the treatment. There be only one or two places in Japan for adulteration, but it is said are now five or six. The label to each piece of the fabric in the station office at the seat of manufacture taken off in Yokohama before the operation of sizing, and is afterwards We read in the Fiji Shimpō that which have been thus treated detected by examining the number back, but our contemporary's view of this point is not quite clear.

EDUCATIONAL PROBLEMS.

The educational problem continues to receive a great deal of attention from vernacular newspapers. In some quarters it is predicted that the objectionable measure which recently obtained the approval of the High Educational Council will be quietly suppressed by the Government, since not only will it fail to secure the Cabinet's approval, but also a strong party in the Educational Department is ranged against it. Others, again, allege that the draft submitted to the High Council was intended to be a liberal modification of the strongly conservative veto approved by the Council last year against foreign educational enterprise in Japan, and that the Council having endorsed the modified measure—in other words, accepted a compromise—the Government will be more or less obliged to draft legislation on those lines.

There is a tendency, also, to justify the measure. Mr. Sawayagi, a high official of the Educational Department, is quoted by the Fimmin as pointing out that the proposed law does not involve any new departure, but is merely an embodiment of the policy hitherto pursued by the Department; the policy of completely separating religion and education. Mr. Sawayagi is represented as alleging that the most enlightened opinion in the Occident is now entirely in favour of completely differentiating the two, for whereas education can be regulated by rules constituting a system universally applicable, religion is an affair of innumerable creeds, and a form of faith that is meat to one may be poison to another. He further points out that, according to the proposed regulations, a man, whatever his educational qualifications and whatever his nationality, may establish a school provided that he places it under the charge of a head-master approved by the local governor. As to the charge that this legislation must be considered anti-foreign, Mr. Sawayagi denies it on the ground that all religions alike are excluded from the sphere of education. We regret to observe, also, that the Nichi Nichi Shim-bun takes the same line. It avows that Japan's attitude towards religion and towards the racial question generally is far more liberal than the attitude of several of the most highly civilized States, for she grants complete freedom of faith and does not attempt to exclude any nationals from her territory. Foreigners should look at home it says, before they gird at every act of Japan's which does not suit their pet theories.

Concerning the arguments put into the mouth of Mr. Sawayagi, there are two points to be noticed. The first is that the principle which he attributes to Western publicists is not really entertained by them. They do affirm that religious teaching ought not to be included in the curriculum of any school which receives aid from the State, because tax-payers might thus be compelled either to contribute to the propagation of a creed they condemn, or to violate the law by refusing to pay their taxes. But that case is quite beside the question. No one advocates State aid for religious schools. The whole point is that private education—education not dependent on public funds—should be entirely free. The meaning of the measures proposed by the High Educational Council is that no parent may send his son to a school where religion forms an item of legislation. In short, even though men of enterprise start schools entirely with resources of their own, they are denied the privilege of having religion taught there. There could be no grosser violation of the rights of the subject. The State has no manner of title to forbid the people to found and maintain private schools where religious influences may be brought to bear upon the character of children. To penalize such schools so that their existence becomes virtually impossible is unconstitutional arbitrariness.

The second point is that Japan's foreign friends condemn this educational proposal not simply because it banishes Christianity from private schools, but because it rules religion—Christianity, Buddhism, Shinto, &c.—entirely out of the child-life of the nation. A veto of that kind must be calamitous in its results.

The hope appears to be growing stronger that the illiberal project of law recently submitted to the High Council of Education and approved by that body, will fail to obtain the endorsement of the Cabinet. Even in the Educational Department a feeling is said to be growing that such interference with the freedom of private education would be contrary to the best interests of the country. There is, therefore, a possibility that the privilege of exemption from conscription will be granted to the pupils of all private schools whose curriculum satisfies the official standard, whether religious instruction be given or not. Theological schools and educational institutions where the prime purpose is to teach some form of creed, may be specially treated; their case remains to be discussed. We take this forecast from the columns of the Chiuo Shim-bun, but we confess that we ourselves are not very confident about its accuracy.

BANK OF FORMOSA.

The financial arrangements for starting the Bank of Formosa are now in a fair way to being completed. The subscribed capital of the Bank is to be 5 million yen, of which the Government takes one million yen worth of shares. One quarter of the capital is to be paid up at once, namely, one million by the general body of share-holders, and a quarter of a million by the Treasury—the Imperial Household Department also taking some of the latter. Further, the Government lends the Bank 2 million yen in silver coins for five years, without interest. Thus the Bank commences operations with a hard-money capital of 3½ million yen. Three-quarters of a million will be required for initial expenses, and the sum actually in hand for commencing business will consequently be 2½ million yen. Against that sum the Bank is entitled to issue notes to the total amount of 5 million yen—2½ million being the securities issue—and, out of these 5 millions, 3½ must be lent to the Formosan Government for public-works' purposes. Thus, finally, the sum actually available for general banking purposes will be only 1½ million yen, a very insignificant figure. Of course there is the possibility that the Bank may attract numerous depositors, but that prospect is not viewed with much hope, for although the Bank can afford to offer a high rate of interest, it is not likely to secure the confidence of the wealthy Chinese in Formosa for a considerable time.

MEETING OF BANKERS.

Forty persons representing 150 Japanese Banks met in the Osaka Hotel on the 6th instant. After the business of the meeting had been discharged, a Konshin-kai (convivial party) was held, and addresses were delivered by Count Matsukata and Mr. Yamamoto, Manager of the Bank of Japan. The Minister of Finance alluded to the fever of enterprise that had attacked the country after the war with China; the great stringency that had resulted in the money market; the comparative ease of the present time, and the necessity of guarding against a recurrence of similar excesses. He then spoke of banking business in Japan, and declared that it was still in its infancy, the banks being little better than pawn-shops. In Europe and America a banker attached more importance to the credit of a customer than to the security he could offer, but in Japan security was everything and credit comparatively nothing. Mr. Yamamoto endorsed this criticism. Much of what he said was of a technical character, and is so badly reported that we can not decipher its meaning. But he gave some interesting figures about banks:—

Year.	Number of banks in Japan.	Total paid-up capital.	Average paid-up capital per bank.
1896	1,300	144,800,000	88,030
1897	1,500	197,000,000	131,333
1898	1,700	223,000,000	131,176

The total deposits of these banks at the end of 1898 were 227,000,000 yen, being an average of 133,530 yen for the 1,700, so that the sum at their disposal for business purposes did not exceed 265,000 yen each, approximately. Mr. Yamamoto justly said that, though the existence of a large number of banks might be regarded as a matter for congratulation from some points of view, the exceeding pettiness of their operations was an obvious defect.

WOOL.

The sudden and rapid rise in the price of wool is attributed by Japanese journals to long-continued drought in Australia, and the consequent death of thousands of sheep. So far as Japan is concerned, the manufacture of woollen fabrics, an industry which has of late begun to assume considerable dimensions, will, of course, be seriously affected by an addition of 10 or 12 sen per lb. to the price of the raw material, and another result in that the stagnation in the demand for mousseline de laine—which was imported in such quantities at the close of last year, in anticipation of the increased tariff, as to produce a glut in the market—will quickly disappear. Already, indeed, speculative purchases of that fabric are said to be taking place.

SUGAMO PRISON AFFAIR.

It is alleged by the Yomiuri Shim-bun that although the affair of the chaplain at the Sugamo Prison has not been spoken of lately, and was supposed by the public to have been quietly settled, the Hongwan-ji people have never ceased to agitate about it and to make representations to the Authorities. The perseverance of the priests has been rewarded, for the Home Office has at last yielded, and the Christian Pastor, the Rev. Mr. Tomeoka, was replaced on the 3rd instant by two Kyōkai-shi from the Hongwan Temple.

SUCCESSION TO LANDED ESTATE IN FOREIGN SETTLEMENTS.

It is stated, we observe, by the Japan Herald, with reference to wills and intestacies, that "very possibly, one roundabout effect of the law of succession is that the succession to land even in the Settlements will be governed by Japanese law, so that such land can not be freely disposed of by will, and so that wills affecting it must be executed with a minute observance of all the requisites specified in the Civil Code." Our contemporary adds that, "if this is the case, it will certainly be an unpleasant surprise to land-holders." We have already had occasion to refer to some remarkable assertions by the same journal about wills in Japan, but it seems to have altogether forgotten the laws to which we then drew its attention. This latest departure is quite as strange as the original misconception, and will probably cause some uneasiness unless corrected.

The Japan Herald's first contention is that succession to lands in the Settlements will probably be governed by Japanese law and that, consequently, such land can not be freely disposed of by will. It is extremely difficult to understand what is signified by such language, but if we assume that the words are intended to mean what they say, our contemporary stands committed to the assertion that landed property governed by the Japanese law of succession can not be freely disposed of by will. That is nonsense, of course. The laws of Japan do not interfere in any way with the freedom of a testator. Even if they did, foreign land holders in the Settlements would still be protected by the terms of the title deeds under which they have acquired the property, for though the Japan Herald appears to be ignorant of the fact, the form of title deed prescribed by treaty contains the words, "leased in perpetuity to M. or N., his heirs and assigns."

Our contemporary's second allegation is that wills affecting the Settlement lands will have to be "executed with minute observance of all the requisites specified in the Civil Code." There is here a double blunder: a blunder as to the fact that the forms of Japanese law must be complied with by foreigners for testatory purposes, and a blunder as to the suggestion that the Civil Code of Japan prescribes any intricate or difficult steps of procedure in the matter of wills. The former blunder might easily have been avoided by a slight exercise of memory for, just a month ago, we called our contemporary's attention to the 26th article of the Law concerning the Application of Laws in General, which says:—"The existence and the effect of a will are governed by the law of the nationality to which the maker of the will belongs at the time of the making; the revocation of a will is governed by the law of the nationality of the maker at the time of revocation; and, notwithstanding the provisions of these two paragraphs, the law of the place where the act is done may be followed as to the forms of a will." Thus we have it provided in the most unequivocal language that a foreigner making a will in Japan is free to choose between the forms prescribed by the law of his own nationality, and the forms prescribed by the laws of Japan, but that, in either case, the law of his nationality at the time of making the will will govern its existence and effect.

As to the implication that the Civil Code of Japan provides intricate and troublesome procedure with regard to wills, nothing could be further from the truth. A will, according to the Japanese Code, may be a holograph document, in which case it must be written and signed wholly by the testator, and there need not be any witness or formalities of any kind. It may also be a public document, in which case the services of a notary public must be employed and two witnesses must affix their names. Finally, it may be a secret document, in which case the closed will must be acknowledged before a notary public and at least two witnesses. It is difficult to conceive any simpler procedure or more concise instructions. Few Englishmen venture to write their own wills: they feel constrained to avoid legal pitfalls by engaging the aid of an attorney. But a Japanese subject need have no hesitation whatever. All that is necessary is that he should commit to writing with his own hand his wishes as to the disposal of his property, and that he should be careful to avoid erasures, or to add a note acknowledging them if they occur.

It is surely both unfortunate and mischievous that the uneasiness which many of the foreign residents already feel about the probable results of their submission to Japanese jurisdiction, should be needlessly augmented by mistakes like those which we have here corrected.

EMIGRATION TO KOREA.

The Liberal organ (Jimmin) strongly urges its countrymen to form associations for the purpose of engaging in Chinese trade and establishing colonies in Korea. That used to be a pet project of the Fiji Shimpō's some time ago, and the Jimmin probably thinks that the subject has grown old enough to be novel. Perhaps such writing may produce some effect, but if newspaper articles can galvanize the Japanese into becoming colonists where colonization presents no attractions to them, the Japanese must be very different from other peoples. There is a remarkable strain of romance in the character of this nation. If an English journalist wanted to encourage emigration he would never think of setting about the task in any way but one; namely, collecting statistics and detailing hard, practical facts to prove that there was money in the venture. He would know very well that a sermon preached from any other text must fall on deaf ears. But the Japanese editor approaches the matter from a political point of view. He invites his countrymen to emigrate with the patriotic purpose of extending Japan's influence in a neighbouring empire, and he does not begin to take the trouble of explaining what personal advantages, if any, are to be derived by adopting his counsel. When one thinks of the class of people from whom alone emigrants are drawn; when one remembers how little they have to do with newspapers, and how ill they can afford to embark upon enterprises with nothing more substantial than a patriotic halo by way of reward, the romance and unpracticality of such writing assume quite quaint proportions.

OPERATION OF THE NEW COMMERCIAL CODE.

The new Commercial Code is to go into operation, as our readers are aware, from the 16th of June. Various Ordinances and Department Notifications have to be issued in connexion with the event. The principal of them are:—(1) Ordinance relating to pedlars and petty traders, referred to in Art. VIII. of the Code. (2) Ordinance relating to foreign insurance companies which have branches or agencies in Japan. (3) Notification of the Department of Agriculture and Commerce with reference to insurance companies. (4) Notification of the Communications Department with reference to the limits of navigation on lakes, rivers, harbours, bays and coasts.

The Yorossu Choho, referring to the above, says that the authorities are also considering the advisability of drafting an Ordinance with reference to foreign joint stock companies which have their principal place of business in Yokohama, Kobe or Nagasaki and are carrying on trade operations there. "Foreign companies," our contemporary writes, "which have their principal business establishments in the Settlements, will of course become subject to the provisions of the Commercial Code when the Revised Treaties go into operation. But as they have all been established in conformity with the laws of their own nationality, it will be necessary that some changes be effected in their rules and regulations in order to bring them under the Japanese Code. Some, indeed, may even have to dissolve their organization by way of preliminary, should the rules and regulations in compliance with which they are established, be found greatly at variance with the Code. Hence it will probably be essential to issue an Ordinance fixing a limit of time subsequently to the operation of the new Treaties, within which the requisite changes of rules or organization may be effected. If, before the expiry of the period of grace, any questions involving litigation should arise, they will have to be decided in accordance with the national laws of the company concerned. The Authorities are very anxious to devise suitable methods for dealing with these matters."

CURRENCY IN KOREA.

It appears that the Koreans have been issuing debased subsidiary coins and using them to buy up good Japanese coins as well as Japanese paper notes, so that business is now seriously hampered, and the Japanese merchants in the peninsula are said to be in considerable embarrassment. The Yomiuri Shimbun recounts the facts at some length, and uses them as a peg to hang one of its habitual attacks on Viscount Aoki. Our critical contemporary's opinion is that the Minister of Foreign Affairs ought to have been able to prevent the issue of debased coins before their quantity became embarrassing. A Foreign Minister, to satisfy the Progressist organ's requirements, ought to be omniscient and, at the same time, prepared to meddle to an unlimited extent in the domestic affairs of other countries.

IMPERIAL VISIT TO YOKOHAMA.

THE SETTLEMENT EN FÊTE.

THE ADDRESS FROM FOREIGN RESIDENTS.

The foreign settlement of Yokohama held holiday on Tuesday, for although work was nominally supposed to be proceeding in the early morning, long before ten o'clock every suggestion or thought of toil was laid aside and thence onward the day was devoted to the pursuit of pleasure. His Imperial Majesty has frequently visited the Yokohama race-meetings, but never before has the Community formally received him in the manner customary in western lands. The Emperor is averse to display and fuss of all kinds, and prefers to drive unostentatiously to and from the race-track at Negishi in the character of a private gentleman; and His Majesty's wish has always been scrupulously respected by the Nippon Race Club and the community generally. But this year, owing to the significant events that will transpire in July—when foreigners will pass from the jurisdiction of their own Consular Courts under the guardianship of the Imperial Government of Japan—it was felt that the occasion of the Emperor's visit should be signalled by something a little out of the ordinary. The proper steps were therefore taken to ascertain the Emperor's opinion on the subject, and when it was found that His Majesty would graciously receive an Address, a public meeting was called at which power was conferred on a representative committee to draw up an address and to decorate the route. This Committee, which had for its Chairman, Mr. R. D. Robison, and its Vice-Chairman Mr. W. F. Mitchell—two better men for the positions would be hard to find—was as follows:—

THE CONSULAR BODY.

AMERICAN—Messrs. Stuart Eldridge, John Lindsey, Geo. Middleton, W. T. Payne.
AUSTRIAN—Mr. K. M. Benedictich.
BRITISH—Messrs. Vivian R. Bowden, J. Dodds, F. S. James, E. Flint Kilby, J. F. Lowder, J. P. Mullinn, W. W. Till, W. B. Walter.
CHINESE—Mr. Lo Wo Sing.
DANISH—Mr. F. M. Tegenar.
DUTCH—Mr. H. Klingem.
FRENCH—Messrs. E. Knuff, C. Pravioux, A. Soux.
GERMAN—Messrs. H. J. Holm, M. Kaufmann, M. Pors, A. Unger.
ITALIAN—Messrs. A. Bianchi, F. Biagini.
MEXICAN—(Mexican Consul General).
NORWEGIAN—Mr. J. M. Jensen.
PERUVIAN—(Peruvian Consul).
PORTUGUESE—Mr. A. Eca da Silva.
RUSSIAN—Mr. W. Droumeier.
SPANISH—(Spanish Consul).
SWEDISH—(Swedish Consul).
SWISS—Messrs. H. Abegg, F. Strässer.

His Majesty left Shimabashi shortly after 9 o'clock and travelled by the Imperial special train to Yokohama, accompanied by a small suite and his usual escort of Lancers. As he steamed into the railway station the Yashima Kan (38), battleship, 12,517, Capt. Uchida; the Matsushima Kan (30), cruiser 4,278, Capt. Endo; the Itsukushima Kan (33), cruiser, 4,278, Capt. Masaki Hashimoto; and the British first-class battleship Barfleur, Rear-Admiral Fitzgerald, fired an Imperial salute of 21 guns.

Accompanying His Majesty were Prince Kan-in; Marquis Tokudaiji, Grand Chamberlain; Viscount Tanaka, Minister to the Imperial Household; Lieut.-General Baron Okazawa, Chief Military Aide-de-camp; Baron Saunomiya, Grand Master of Ceremonies, and other Court functionaries. His Majesty, on alighting, was received by the members of the Foreign Committee, and by Governor Asada, Mr. Umeda, Mayor of Yokohama, Mr. Otani Kahei, Chairman of the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Watanabe, President of Municipal Assembly, Mr. Rinoiye, Secretary to the Kencho, and naval officers from the Japanese warships in harbour. As His Majesty stepped on the platform the Yokosuka Naval Band struck up the national anthem. The Emperor, who was preceded by an aide-de-camp bearing the Imperial Banner, a chrysanthemum on a red ground, bowed his acknowledgments of the welcome of the Reception Committee, and proceeded upstairs to a private room, where Mr. Robison and Mr. Mitchell followed to present, on behalf of the foreign community, the address which had been prepared.

THE ADDRESS.

Mr. Robison read the address, which was followed and afterwards handed it to His Majesty, who received it personally: May it please Your Imperial Majesty:

On the auspicious occasion of Your Majesty's presence in Yokohama, the Foreign Residents of all nationalities unanimously desire to take advantage of the opportunity afforded to them of manifesting their profound respect for Your Imperial Majesty.

They feel it is a great honour, and it gives them the greatest satisfaction, to welcome your Majesty at this port and to witness your Imperial Majesty's progress through the streets of this Settlement, in accordance with the wish expressed by us and graciously acceded to by your Imperial Majesty. It is a matter of history how Yokohama has grown in forty years from an insignificant fishing village until it has attained the important commercial position which it now occupies.

The Foreign Residents, now numbering over 5,000, are pleased to have taken a part in the development of this prosperity. They recognise how much they owe to the protection of your Imperial Majesty, and they fervently desire that your Majesty may be long spared to rule this country in the enlightened and liberal spirit which has characterised this era of Meiji.

THE EMPEROR'S REPLY.

His Majesty's reply was as follows:—

"I have received your address with much satisfaction, and I thank you for the cordial welcome you have given me. I also hope that the commerce between Japan and all foreign countries will be further developed."

His Majesty then left the station precincts; and entered his carriage. There was an enormous crowd outside the station; nearly all of them loyal Japanese straining every nerve to catch a glimpse of their beloved Sovereign. Near the entrance were the members of the Prefectural Assembly, the Municipal Council of Yokohama, the Red Cross Society, and a large number of students. A squadron of lancers of the Imperial Body Guard formed the escort and surrounded the Imperial carriage, which was followed by carriages containing the members of the Emperor's suite, Government officials, Kencho officials, and foreign residents. The students sang the Kimi-ga-yo as the Emperor passed, and at the Recreation Ground a number of Chinese scholars from the Taiton School, in uniform, were drawn up to welcome His Majesty. The Imperial carriage proceeded round the Recreation Ground, and then drove past the British Consulate to the Bund, as far as the Grand Hotel corner, where it crossed Yatozaka, and passed along the main Bluff road to the Race course.

The procession entered the course by the usual carriage road, and His Majesty was received at the steps of the Grand Stand by Sir Ernest Satow, K.C.M.G., President, and Dr. Wheeler, Vice-President of the Club. He at once ascended to the Imperial Box at the top of the stand, where he remained till the finish of the last race. The escort was then reformed, and, amid the respectful salutations of the great crowd of foreigners who were present, set out on the return journey, which was through Yamamotocho, down the Jizozaka, then to the left to Maida-bashi, along the creek, across the bridge, through Awacho and to the left round the corner of the premises of Messrs. Geen, Evison, Stutchberry & Co.; and down Main-street to the Railway Station, crossing the Benten-bashi.

The police arrangements were perfect; constables were stationed every few yards of the route, and the conduct of the crowd was admirable. Foreigners universally respected the rule of Japanese etiquette which demands that no one shall view an Imperial procession from a higher level than His Majesty.

THE DECORATIONS.

In front of the railway station and immediately facing the Benten bridge was erected a huge arch in the shape of a temple torii, with subordinate arches on either side. White and red were the colours used and the piece was highly effective. Along Honcho-dori Japanese flags and lanterns were hung in profusion. At the entrance to the recreation ground, the centre of which is used by the Yokohama Cricket and Athletic Club, was erected a low, but tasteful arch of bamboo boughs and evergreens. This bore a tablet on which was emblazoned the word Hōgei (Welcome to the Emperor). Just above this tablet was a chrysanthemum—the Imperial crest—wrought in flowers, while other devices were set out in shrubs and variegated grasses. All round the Cricket ground were flags of various nations and Japanese paper lanterns. Nippon Dori was rather plain, but the road running past the Union Church was gay in the extreme, Messrs. R. Isaacs & Bro., Messrs. Strauss & Co., and the devices at Wright's Hotel being particularly pleasing. Near the Custom House, facing the Harbour Office, a grand arch of evergreens was raised, upon, and near, which were the national flags of several Powers. But the best piece of decoration was

THE BUND.

Here the Committee had expended to the greatest advantage the scanty leisure and means placed at their disposal. All the telegraph, telephone and other posts were draped in red and white bunting; Venetian masts were placed at regular intervals between, while each post was connected with ropes, festoons, and garlands of evergreens and flowers. Across the roadway were suspended, at intervals of a dozen yards or so, slight rustic arches of greenery, and flags, streamers and lanterns swung from every available post, staff, or line. Unsightly scaffolding poles were hidden away behind broad bands of red-and-white bunting, and armorial shields of almost every nation or clan under the sun found representation somewhere along the broad thoroughfare. The whole effect was very charming, rivalling almost the display of Jubilee times. Mr. Unger, who was responsible for this portion of the scheme, had over 400 men employed upon it. Needless to say the men-of-war, merchant steamers, steam launches and yachts in harbour were all gaily decorated. The Y.U.C. premises were hung with flags and set out with choice flowering plants; the Standard Oil Company made a capital display, as did also the M.M. and C.P.R. Companies. At the boat-house of the Y.A.R.C., the decorations partook of a nautical character and included the four-oared Petrel. The Oriental and Club Hotels were gay with flowers and flags, and, of course, the Grand Hotel was a triumph of artistic dressing. On the ando which formed a prominent feature of the Grand's display, were the words Seiun Bansai (Long live the Emperor). At the Yato Bashi an imposing arch of evergreens was built, and a similar one crowned the steep ascent of Camp Hill, just in front of the Public Hall. The private residences along the Imperial route of the Bluff all "hung out banners on their outward walls," the display at Mr. MacLaren's and Mr. E. J. Moss' being particularly noticeable. The General Hospital fairly wreathed itself in flags and greenery, making one of the best set pieces along the road. Opposite Mr. Till's residence was a big evergreen torii bearing an appropriate inscription in Japanese. At the top of Jizosaka another huge arch was built similar in character to the one near the Public Hall. Motomachi and Main Street were, of course, profusely set out with flags and other forms of out-door finery. Indeed, considering the short notice, the town was exceedingly well-decorated and presented as gay a scene as the most enthusiastic could have wished.

THE SIGHT-SEERS.

The demeanour of the crowds that lined the whole route was in strange contrast to that of western lands. There was no cheering, no rippling run of hurrahs—or the Japanese equivalent, bansai—such as one usually associates with royal or imperial progresses. All was respectful, quiet, and impressively orderly.

JAPANESE OPINION.

The Kokumin Shimbun writes about this event in very warm terms. It recalls the evil past, thirty years ago, when some of the Foreign Ministers took mistaken views of Japanese affairs, and some of the Japanese people were imbued with hostility to foreigners, so that estrangements and collision were the custom of the time. These things have now faded into dream-land, and both sides have clasped hands of friendship, laughing over their old troubles, and hoping that hereafter they may walk together in paths of mutual good-will and prosperity. The visit of the Sovereign to the Foreign Settlement and the reception which the whole foreign community of Yokohama prepared for His Majesty will become historical events, marking the close of the ancient era and the opening of the new.

HIBIYA PARK.

More than a year ago an exact statement was published about a park which the Tokyo Municipality proposed to make at Hibiya. A large area available for the purpose had long been lying vacant, disfiguring the most fashionable quarter of the city. We were then told about artificial hills, miniature lakes, rockeries, shrubberies and so forth, which should convert the weed-covered waste into a pretty pleasure. But the waste remains as much en evidence as ever, and the projected improvements, like other steps of progress in Tokyo, are still in the land of dreams. However, the subject has once more come upon the tapis, and we are now informed not only about embankments, parterres and walks, but even about the precise widths of the ditches that are to surround the enclosure on its northern, southern, eastern and western faces, as well as the conduits with which the drains are to communicate. Experience of the Tokyo Municipality's methods has taught us that to know the dimensions of a ditch, even to decimals of an inch, does not necessarily signify that the ditch is within years of being dug. However, it is our business to record current events, and we therefore note that the programme has been once more drawn from its pigeon-hole, and that the cost of completing it is estimated at 133,127 yen—we omit the sen and rin. What is now troubling the authorities is whether the park should be laid out with the object of serving as a retreat for aged persons who desire to wander in its bosky solitudes, forgetting life and its cares, or whether it should be adapted to the uses of boisterous youth, and furnished with tennis-lawns, cycling tracks, panoramas and penny peep-shows. The question is not practical. Any other topic from dream-land would have an equal claim on public attention. Still, we are at one with the folks who advocate the idea of a retreat for rumination. That is certainly best suited to the mood of the Tokyo citizens, as evidenced in the doings of their Municipal officials.

LAKE KAWAGUCHI.

Another correspondent writes about what he calls, with apparent justice, a foolish scheme, namely, the draining of Kawaguchi Lake, and the conversion of its bed into rice-fields. If the plan is carried out, it can scarcely fail to inflict loss on both Japanese and foreigners. Many people regard this lake as the most beautiful in Japan. Whether it deserves such a very high eulogy we not know, but certainly it has scenic charms of the highest type, and its effacement would be an infinitely regrettable act from that point of view alone. Then there is the practical question. Undoubtedly a lake situated at an altitude of 2,800 feet must have a great effect on the water-supply of the surrounding country. As a matter of fact, the streams of the Fujikawa Valley are almost entirely dependent upon the lakes of which the Kawaguchi sheet of water is one, and a small difference in the level of the lakes means a great difference in the volume of water received by the streams. This a point of much importance, and it should be carefully investigated before any project for the draining of the lake is permitted. Then, again, the water of the lake would have to be run into the Banyu-gawa, a river which already works havoc in Kanagawa Prefecture in times of flood, one of its frequent feats being to wash away the railway at Hiratsuka. Suppose that the volume of water now carried off by the Banyu-gawa be augmented by the contents of a lake 5 miles long, three-quarters of a mile wide, and subject to rises of from 10 to 15 feet in 48 hours, can there be any doubt that the river's floods would acquire destructive potentialities such as might cost Kanagawa Prefecture more in one season than the people who drained the lake would obtain in a century? Indeed, the profit derivable from such a reclamation might be illusory, for the bed of the lake seems to be chiefly lava rock, quite unfitted for purposes of agriculture. The scheme appears to us to be wild and rash. We venture to hope that it will not be lightly sanctioned.

A COMMERCIAL DIFFICULTY.

Here is an item from the Tokyo Asahi:—"The Fujiyama Company of Yokohama, which deals in silk fabrics, made a contract with Messrs. Browne and Company of No. 72, in the Settlement, to deliver 1,100 pieces (2,200 tan) of aya-habutaye, at 7 yen per 100 momme, and the contract should have been implemented by the end of March. The Fujiyama Company sublet the order to Mr. Uyeno Motokichi, but owing to the sudden rise in the price of raw silk, the weavers all failed to keep their engagements, and the habutaye not coming to hand, the contract with Messrs. Browne and Company could not be fulfilled. The Fujiyama Company were not able to deliver more than one-half of the habutaye. They promised to deliver the remainder in six months, but Messrs. Browne and Company, not content with this, stopped 5,000 yen out of a payment of 7,000 yen that they had to make to the Fujiyama Company for other goods delivered by the latter, and announced their intention of not making the full payment until the habutaye contract was completely implemented. It has hitherto been found impossible to induce them to alter their attitude, and the matter is now under discussion."

COTTON SPINNING.

Tables published by the Keisai Zasshi show that the total quantity of cotton yarn spun in Japan from April 1st, 1898 to March 31st, 1899, was 32,265,745 kwan (268,881,098 lbs.), of which 18,496,209 kwan, or 57 per cent., was from 15 to 17 counts; 10,814,378 kwan, or 33 per cent., was from 17 to 19 counts, and the remaining 10 per cent was of 20 counts and upwards. The raw cotton used in the manufacture was as follows:—

	Kwan.	Lbs.
Japanese Cotton ...	50,944
Indian Cotton ...	22,053,934
Chinese Cotton ...	3,272,962
American Cotton ...	12,141,867
Australian Cotton ...	199,626
Saigon Cotton ...	448,739
Egyptian Cotton ...	352,864
Other Cotton ...	182,711
Total ...	38,703,647	or 332,530,391

JAPANESE CLARET.

Very few of our readers are in love with Japanese claret, we imagine. Some, however, may be disposed to drink it, and for their sakes we may explain that there has of late been much talk about the injurious adulteration of the wine. Four brands are mentioned as being coloured with poisonous aniline dyes. We do not know that the statement emanates from an entirely trustworthy source, but the police authorities are now said to have taken up the matter, so that the exact facts will doubtless be soon published.

JAPANESE LADIES' COSTUME.

There is an incipient agitation in favour of a radical change in the costume of Japanese ladies—nothing less than the abolition of the girdle (obi) and the substitution of the capacious trousers known as hakama. The advocate of the innovation is the Yimmin. It speaks in very disparaging terms of the obi, and denounces it as unwholesome and unsightly, but it certainly is neither the one nor the other. We, too, have often discussed the subject of ladies' dress in Japan, but we have never thought of attacking the obi. Our idea has always been that from the girdle upwards the costume of the Japanese female is exceedingly picturesque, sensible and economical, but that the skirt is eminently impractical, and has, moreover, the evil effect of compelling a most ungraceful gait. A Japanese lady never moves prettily. She never carries the foot straight forward and plants it elastically, toe first, heel last. What she does is to walk with curved paces, the lower part of the leg and the foot swinging in an arc from the knee as pivot with the direction of advance for inner chord, and the outer edge of the foot being planted on the ground. When we add that the habit of exercising the prehensile power of the toes for the purpose of gripping the loop of the sandal causes the heel to be turned outward, we find a combination of movements constrained, unnatural, and clumsy. Further, the wearer of a Japanese skirt can never be sure of not offending against modesty, and is virtually precluded from sitting on a chair or a sofa. The skirt ought to go, but we should be sorry to see the obi ostracised, for it is a very beautiful article of dress and has been pronounced eminently wholesome by competent medical authorities. The Yimmin talks of the expense of the obi. Well, it certainly costs a good deal, but, on the other hand, how many obis does a Japanese lady buy in her life-time, and how many does she wear out? The stock of a fashionable woman seldom exceeds seven or eight, and when one is discarded, it finds probably two or three other wearers in succession before it passes quite out of use. There is not the slightest comparison between the expense of women's costume in the West and in Japan. The item of jewelry alone constitutes an immense difference. A few years ago it seemed unhappily possible that the habit of wearing jewelry might come into vogue in this country, and to the extent of a few rings the apprehension proved only too correct. But, on the whole, the innate good taste of Japanese ladies has rebelled against the solecism of encircling the neck, the waist, the arms, the fingers, and the head with shackles of gem-set metal. The some-time tendency to adopt foreign costume has also disappeared in great part. It can never disappear altogether so long as the extraordinary rule is enforced that a Japanese lady may not appear at the Imperial Court in the ordinary costume of her own country, but must either wear alien garments which generally render her ungainly and uncomfortable, or put on a costume—the hi-no-hakama, or crimson trousers—which can not be carried without long practice and is almost a monstrosity. That severe, and, as we venture to think, unwise rule secures a compulsory vogue for foreign costume. Let us not be suspected of denying the picturesqueness of the Occidental lady's garments. Worn as she wears them, they are often most charming. But they do not suit the lady of Japan, not does it appear possible that a woman should develop ability to wear each costume, the Japanese and the foreign, with equal grace, unless the skirt of the former is changed for the hakama. The gait of a hakama-wearer is perfectly suited to petticoats, and the costumes would then become interchangeable.

JAPANESE PROSPECTING FOR COAL IN CHINA.

Statements have recently been circulated that rich coal-bearing strata exist in the Russian and German "spheres of influence" in China. Inspired by these accounts, a certain wealthy Japanese merchant, says the Shogyo Shimpo, determined to inaugurate prospecting operations. He despatched experts to China, and, after incurring large expenses, his emissaries have discovered a most promising coal mine in Anhui province. It is situated near the bank of the Yangtze, at Swan-seng, which is 100 miles to the south-west of Bu-u. As to the facilities for bringing the mineral to market, it appears that it can be carried by water to Ning-kok-hu, which is 90 miles from Bu-u, and from thence a land journey of 17 miles over level roads will take it to Swan-seng. The coal is said to be equal to that of Kiushiu in quality, and there are three veins, each over a great area.

VISCOUNT KAWAKAMI.

Viscount Kawakami has had a relapse. He had been progressing quite favourably when, on the 5th instant during his mid-day meal, a return of the spasms took place. The bulletin of the physicians attending him—Doctors Hashimoto, Takagi, Baelz, and others—says that, although these attacks are not in themselves actually dangerous, their recurrence in the case of a patient whose strength has been already so much exhausted, affords ground for much uneasiness.

His convalescence would be very welcome to the Government, not merely because the country can not afford to lose a strategist and military administrator of such ability, but also because his permanent incapacity for duty would create a serious political difficulty. Public opinion is unanimous in regarding Viscount Katsura as the one man in all Japan eminently fitted to preside over the Head Quarter Staff should there be a necessity to replace Viscount Kawakami. But Viscount Katsura now holds the portfolio of War, and it would be exceedingly difficult to find a successor for him were he transferred to Head Quarters. He is one of the mainstays of the Cabinet, and the tenure of another important portfolio also probably depends on his remaining in his present position. It is not at all sure, of course, that this difficulty will not still arise, for Viscount Kawakami's recovery may not be so complete as to warrant his continued discharge of the onerous duties of Chief of Staff. But for the present the problem is postponed.

ADULTERATED SILK FABRICS.

We recently published a statement which had appeared in several Japanese journals with reference to an analysis of French silk fabrics. Mr. Henry Satow, of the Department of Agriculture and Commerce, had made the analysis, and was represented as having found that the wool of the stuff consisted apparently, of artificial silk, so brittle as to deprive the fabric of all durability. The Yoroku Choho now alleges that an analysis of the same fabric made at the Tokyo Industrial School did not confirm Mr. Satow's conclusions, but showed that pure silk only had been used by the weavers, and that the brittleness was due to sizing with deleterious compounds for the purpose of increasing the weight of the fabric. The Yoroku speaks very sarcastically of Mr. Satow's errors, but truly it seems immaterial whether the worthlessness of the stuff was due to a mixture of artificial silk or to unscrupulous sizing.

DEPARTURE OF LIEUTENANT MEINCKE.

Lieutenant M. Meincke left Tokyo on the afternoon of the 11th instant, having completed his term of service as military Attache at the German Legation in Tokyo. Before his departure the officers of the Tokyo Garrison and the Head Quarter Staff presented to him a beautiful souvenir in the form of an album containing their photographs. The border of each picture was exquisitely painted by the best artists of the time, the motives of the decorative designs being taken from the names of the donors. Lieutenant Meincke was entertained at a farewell banquet by members of the Tokyo Club on the night before his departure from Tokyo, and a large number of persons of all nationalities assembled at Shimbashi to bid him farewell.

THE INDUSTRIAL BANK.

The subscriptions for the Industrial Bank's debentures closed on the 9th instant. The total sum subscribed by the public was 272,980 yen at the head office and 530,340 yen at the branches, or 803,320 yen in all. Since the sum to be raised was a million and a half, it follows that the Government has to subscribe 696,680 yen. This result is somewhat better than the original official estimate, namely, that the Government would have to find one half of the whole amount. But it is a poor result after all. Even with the scheme of prize-bearing coupons to tempt them, Japanese capitalists can not be induced to put up a million and a half of yen.

JAPANESE FISHING ENTERPRISE IN KOREA.

The fact that a Russian whaling company has obtained three stations on the coast of Korea to facilitate its operations is already matter of public knowledge. We read now, in Japanese papers, that steps have been taken by the Foreign Office in Tokyo to prefer corresponding demands on behalf of Japanese fishermen, and that the desired concessions will doubtless be granted by Korea at an early date.

THE EMPEROR'S VISIT TO YOKOHAMA.

IT appears to us that the greatest possible credit is due to the International Committee of Yokohama for the admirable arrangements they made in the brief time at their disposal to prepare for the EMPEROR'S reception. It may be safely asserted that never on any occasion during the Meiji era has HIS MAJESTY found a route so handsomely and tastefully decorated for his passage as the Bund was on the 9th instant. Even the triumphal return to the capital in 1896 was not marked by any spectacular display of comparable taste and excellence. Of course, it is not easy to find a place which lends itself so readily to a great effort as the Bund does. A noble esplanade, under all circumstances, its freedom from every semblance of curve or variation of level throughout its entire length are features perfectly adapted to the style of decoration chosen. It seemed like an endless avenue in fairy-land, and the effect of the spanning arches of greenery was to divide the sea-scape on the north and east into a multitude of varying vistas, each with its own distinctive middle-distance of shipping and its back-ground of hills. The EMPEROR, we understand, fully appreciated the scene, and expressed in very emphatic terms not only the pleasure he derived from its artistic beauty, but also his satisfaction that the foreign community should have taken such pains to welcome him. The cheering at the Race-course, led by Mr. T. THOMAS, was of the lustiest and heartiest character, and HIS MAJESTY bowed repeatedly in acknowledgment.

Judged by the custom of European Sovereigns, HIS MAJESTY'S reply to the Community's Address may possibly appear curt. But it was, in truth, a very signal departure from Japanese canons of Imperial etiquette. As a general rule the EMPEROR limits himself to half a dozen words at most when replying to addresses. He did not reach even that maximum on the occasion of the Imperial progress through the Kobe Settlement last year. But in reply to the Yokohama Deputation, HIS MAJESTY not only declared his satisfaction at the receipt of the Address and his thanks for the cordial welcome given to him, but also went on to express a hope that the commerce between Japan and foreign countries may be further developed. Mr. R. D. ROBISON, the Community's representative, was authorized to speak of the growth of Yokohama as a historical fact. We may add that this reference to commerce in a Japanese Emperor's public utterances is also historical, for it is certainly the first instance on record. The EMPEROR was evidently disposed to show the utmost graciousness. He not only acknowledged with unusual distinctness the cheers raised by the foreigners, but he also received the Community's Address direct from Mr. ROBISON'S hand, whereas the ordinary course would have been for Mr. ROBISON to lay it on the table at which HIS MAJESTY stood.

JAPANESE VIEWS OF THE ANGLO- RUSSIAN ENTENTE.

FEW topics have ever attracted so much attention in Japan or received such interested notice from the vernacular press as the recently concluded Anglo-Russian entente. We have already alluded to some of our Tokyo contemporaries' writings. Thus the Yiji Shimpō, when the news of the arrangement first reached Japan, regarded it as a public declaration on the part of the two great Powers of the world that the partition of China was inevitable; the Yomuri Shimbun construed it as a clear indication that Great Britain had changed her Far-Eastern policy, and that the reason of the change was Japan's hesitation about joining the league for the conservation of China, and the Kokumin and the Yiji concurred in declaring that, since the business of division had now commenced, Japan must step forward and claim her share by giving practical effect to the pledges she had obtained about Fokien. These views are now supplemented by several other expressions of opinion. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun, for example, differs from all the above contentions, denies that the partition of China has been brought nearer; and infers, on the contrary, that a new guarantee for her integrity has been given. The first era of danger, it thinks, was one of territorial aggression, commencing with the seizure of Kiao-chow, by Germany and closing with the occupation of Wei-hai-wei by England. The second era was one of railway competition. That, too, has now been brought to a close, and unless some problem arising out of China's actual condition presents itself, there is no prospect of fresh difficulties. In short, the Nichi Nichi classes the Anglo-Russian agreement in the same category with the Russo-Japanese Convention in Korea, and concludes that, just as the operation of the latter covenant has not entailed any injury to Korea or impeded her independence, so the Anglo-Russian entente will not disturb China's integrity. The Yiji Shimpō, also, has materially modified its tone. Instead of repeating its apprehension about the speedy partition of the Chinese empire, it now believes that the entente will contribute to the peace of the East, and rejoices to think that the two great Powers have been able to agree. Nevertheless the Yiji retains its apprehensions about the ultimate safety of the Chinese empire, and evidently thinks that a difficult chapter of foreign policy has opened for Japan.

Side by side with these comments we find others of a more highly coloured character. The Hochi Shimbun thinks that the Convention has no elements of durability. Among all the nations of the world the English are least capable of yielding. Ever since they conquered the Invincible Armada, their career has been one long series of triumphs. They have fought country after country, and always come out victorious. They have built up an empire such as the world never saw before, and they stand out to-day as the leading Power among all peoples. But now, for the first time, they seem to have yielded a step, and cried "peace" to a rival. Are we to suppose that this compromise is an evidence of the decay of their immemorial spirit, and that they are content to see their hitherto untarnished glory begin to fade from to-day? By no means. What is happening now in China is simply what happened in India a century and a half ago. The French, with their head quarters at Pondicherry, and the English with theirs at Fort St. George, looked upon Coromandel and Madras respectively as their spheres of influence, and for several years traded side by side without active rivalry or territorial aggression. But the struggle between them was only deferred. It came inevitably, and when it came the English stopped short of nothing less than sweeping their competitors out of India. China is the India of the Far East. The British may agree with the Russians for a time, but the clash will surely come, and when it comes, the history of England teaches us where it will end. This convention is but a breathing space (omoi nakaba ni suginu).

If you want to trap a bear, says the Chiuo Shimbun, don't tell it that you intend to skin it. Germany obeyed that precept at Kiao-chow. She occupied the place temporarily in appearance, and having cajoled China past the point of successful resistance, settled down permanently to her new possession. England and Russia are following the same line. They pretend to be merely agreeing not to dispute with each other, and they place the integrity of China in the forefront of their agreement. Thus China's eyes are blinded. She does not perceive that she is about to be skinned. Yet nothing is more certain than that the Yangtze Valley is to be an appanage of the British crown and Manchuria a Russian province. The Chinese Empire, in short, is becoming another Europe. The four Great Powers of Europe, England, Russia, France, and Germany, will soon have carved large States out of its bulk, and Japan will find herself brought into direct contact and competition with Western nations. She must face the prospect boldly and prepare for it resolutely. It is not a time for her to fritter away her strength in petty squabbles over domestic politics. The Chiuo then passes on to attack Count

OKUMA for creating discontent among the agricultural classes at such a time by his anti-land-tax agitation, and thus diverting the people's attention from great national problems to petty parochial issues.

Two other leading journals deduce lessons for Japan's instruction from the action of England and Russia. The Fimmin (Liberal organ) concludes that an offensive attitude is the true secret of a successful defensive policy. It is not enough to stand ready. The enemy must always be forced back upon his own lines. That is the principle obeyed by the two great Asiatic Powers. They are perpetually pressing forward: constantly threatening a further advance. It must not be supposed that an era of real rest has now dawned. What the two Powers have done is merely to map out the areas of their activity. But Japan is always in an attitude of retreat and self-effacement. Such is the gist of the Fimmin's criticism. There is no mistaking the direction indicated by the Liberal sign-post.

The Nippon, as usual, has a special theory to propound, but it is a theory based on the well-recognized difference between the methods of England and Russia. England rules, Russia assimilates. Both seem to succeed. Both make vast strides of empire. Russia finds in China an excellent field for the practice of her special plan. She insinuates herself between the Manchus and the Chinese, and utilizes the one against the other. England stands over both and moulds them to her will. The question for Japan is, in which of these two methods does her better chance of success lie; which is more adapted to her capacities and opportunities? Undoubtedly the Russian method. Whatever facilities Russia possesses for ingratiating herself with the Chinese and winning their confidence, are possessed by Japan in a far fuller degree. This country's course is clear. Its people must establish schools in China, must themselves study the Chinese language, must lend to the Chinese every possible assistance, and must help them to conserve their own customs while adopting the essentials of Occidental civilization. Sound advice certainly, but when we (Japan Mail) observe the procedure adopted by Japan in Formosa where, for the first time, she has to grapple with the problem of governing Chinese, the words of the Nippon sound like the voice of one crying in the wilderness.

THE JUDICIARY.

According to statistics for 1897, the number of Judges in Japan was 1,063 and the number of Public Procurators, 443. But the regulations published last month with regard to the fixed establishment of the Judiciary provide for an increase of 181 Judges and 30 Public Procurators, bringing the totals to 1,244 and 473, respectively. On the other hand, the operation of the new Codes will largely augment the work devolving on the Judiciary, and the District Courts will be specially occupied, since upon them falls the duty of all registrations. Further, owing to the amendments effected in the Code of Criminal Procedure by the last Diet, the Judges will have to detail the evidence and make full statements of their reasons in pronouncing judgments. That will treble their work, to say nothing of the additional business thrown upon them by the abolition of Consular Jurisdiction. It is, therefore, anticipated, says the Nippon, from which we take these details, that the question of increasing the number of Local and District Courts, as well as of the Judges and Public Procurators, will soon come upon the tapis.

OSAKA BANKS.

Some trouble is reported in Osaka banking circles. Last month, the Thirty-fourth Bank, the Independent Bank, and the Union Bank combined to form one large institution, under the presidency of Mr. Koyama. But a party under the leadership of Mr. Okahashi Jisuke are agitating to effect a change of president. They urged Mr. Koyama to resign, but he declined to follow their advice, and his friends supported him, so that a division was caused among the business men of Osaka. Count Matsukata and Mr. Yamamoto, President of the Bank of Japan, who happen to be in Osaka at present, have attempted to compose the dispute, but without success. This kind of agitation is becoming quite fashionable in Japan just now.

EXCHANGES.

The Exchanges in Japan, those of Tokyo and Osaka excepted, are said to be having rather a bad time. Several of them have recently put up their shutters, and others are expected to follow suit soon. In connexion with this subject the Mainichi Shinbun quotes a table recently published by the Department of Agriculture and Commerce:—

Year.	Number of Exchanges.	Total paid up Capital. Yen.
End of 1891	110	5,744,000
" 1895	123	5,895,200
" 1896	124	6,309,200
" 1897	152	11,629,500
February 1899	142	10,972,500

The year 1897 was evidently the time when the Exchange-fever reached its highest point.

RUSSIANS AND JAPANESE IN NAGASAKI.

There seems to be an unfortunate state of ill-feeling between Russian and Japanese man-of-war's men in Nagasaki. Several collisions have occurred within the past year, and if the last be correctly reported, it must have been of rather serious dimensions, five men having been wounded. Such occurrences are not in themselves important, but they are apt to have reproductive consequences, and they are certainly significant of relations which can not be pleasing to the statesmen of either country. There ought not to be any difficulty in keeping the men apart. When collisions of such a nature are to be apprehended, the commanding officers on both sides usually coöperate to prevent them.

TOKYO DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL SOCIETY.

This Society gave a very successful performance at the Shoreikai, on the 5th instant. The object was, as usual, charitable and a good audience assembled. "On 'Change'" was the piece chosen. Written originally in German, it has been translated and arranged for the English stage by Miss Eweretta Lawrence. A somewhat formidable farce of three acts—the second a very long one—occasionally ponderous as to humour and depending for its stir and briskness chiefly on the vim and spirit of the performers, it is not eminently calculated for amateur acting. The Tokyo amateurs, however, took hold of it courageously, and their rendering evinced considerable study and talent. The piece is largely based on contrasts of character. Mr. James Burnett (Mr. J. Conder), a genial, open-handed stock-broker, who has made an ample fortune on 'Change and developed a souffron of pomposity in the sunshine of success, serves as a striking foil to his cousin, Professor Seneca Peckering Peck (Captain Brinkley), an irascible, close-fisted, conceited prig of a Scotch pedant, who despises the business of money-making, imagines that if he bent his scientific intellect to such a trade, he could make millions in a moment, and is goaded on by Burnett to try his hand at stock-jobbing under circumstances which the Scotchman imagines to be bona fide, but which are secretly contrived by Burnett in such a manner as to prevent any real loss. Of course the Professor makes a terrible fiasco and it is upon his vicissitudes of fortune that the principal action of the play turns. Mrs. Lavinia Burnett (Miss Hayes) is a dame of superfine laced-and-starched airs and graces, poetic, romantic, dainty, and delicate, whereas her daughter, Iris (Miss Hilda von Fallot) is a sweetly natural and slightly wayward lassie, who has just emerged from a convent, and has no idea of concealing her verdant delight in the mysteries of life. Mrs. Professor Peckering Peck (Miss Nishikawa), a good lady, somewhat worn out by breathing the petulant and penurious atmosphere that surrounds her Scotch husband, but not yet entirely divested of hopes of happier things, has a daughter Millie (Miss F. Denning), an unaffected, kindly, and artless girl, who seems to be just what her mother must have been at the same age. Tom (Mr. Hillhouse) is a young doctor, slow and gauche, desperately in love with Millie, but totally ignorant of the finesse of love-making, and the very antipodes of his friend Joe (Mr. Vickers), a dashing rattling youth, full of verve and audacity, who has emerged buoyant and self-confident from experiences in America that would have crushed a smaller spirit, and who now, with only a month's salary in his pocket, wants to share it with Tom, while he gives his whole heart to Iris. De Haas (Mr. Pattison) minces through the play as a dude, a vacant ass, with a certain measure of malign cunning. He loves Iris, but, of course, receives only rude contempt from her father, and, equally of course, is favoured by her mother, who sees in him a poetic, lavender-pressed person after her own model. De Haas serves as a foil to everybody, and is ultimately kicked off the stage. Finally there are a second-hand book-seller, Mouser (Mr. Gardiner); a buttons, Tiffin (Master Carl von Fallot), and two porters (Mr. James Mason and Mr. Richard Morris.)

The character of De Haas is so accentuated by oddity that he becomes the most prominent figure in the piece. Mr. Pattison's conception and rendering of the part were admirable. In quality his acting did not reach a higher level, perhaps, than some of the excellent performances which have already established his reputation, but the absolute novelty of the study showed remarkable versatility, and the manner of the thing was very mirth-provoking. Burnett's role does not permit any special emphasis, and is therefore correspondingly difficult to make conspicuous, but Mr. Conder, as the semi-jovial, semi-pompous nouveau riche, certainly achieved the greatest success he has ever scored. Under his treatment the character showed lights and shades which relieved it from any suspicion of the common-place, and constituted a representation thoroughly artistic without any evidence of art. On the whole, the role of Joe, which fell to the lot of Mr. Vickers, taxes the capacities of an amateur more than any of the male parts in the farce, for, while precluding all display of eccentricity, the tyro's refuge, it drags the performer before the public in situations which instinctively shun observation, and requires him to be perfectly natural as a wooer, as a disappointed lover, and as an accepted suitor. These passions always fit a man badly, but when he is obliged to wear them coram populo, they generally take the shape of very ungainly gear. Mr. Vickers made his first appearance in Tokyo in this perplexing role—we believe that it was his first appearance on any stage—and he undoubtedly deserves to be congratulated on the result. It was a close, conscientious, and unembarrassed study, and would have been altogether pleasing had it been a little more restful. We do not mean less vivacious. There was not a bit too much vivacity; possibly, indeed, some of the sentiment might have had more sparkle. What we mean is that the amateur's tendency to punctuate his lines by "prowling" made itself slightly apparent. That is an easily corrected blemish. The Dramatic Society obtains a powerful recruit in Mr. Vickers. Tom's part labours under the same defect at that of Joe, absence of salient points. Mr. Hillhouse seemed to satisfy the author's conception. He was just a plain, honest, diffident, and perfectly natural young fellow, and one could thoroughly sympathise with Millie's disposition to galvanise him into fervour and Mrs. Peck's approval of his penniless suit. Mr. Gardiner, as the second-hand bookseller (Mouser) had not much to do, but he made more of his part than the Germany author thought of putting into it, and added materially to the success of the performance by saving it from the too common defect of slovenly acting in the minor roles. Master Carl von Fallot made a good "buttons," and Mr. James Mason and Mr. R. Morris acted their small parts vigorously, which was all that they had to do.

We have spoken first of the men because the farce is mainly a man's play, but we do not intend to suggest that this departure from the usual order of priority is based on any question of merit. The ladies carried off more than their due share of the laurels. Miss Hayes (Mrs. James Burnett) had appeared only once before on the Tokyo stage, and, while appreciating her evidently high histrionic capacities, we were disposed to question her conception of the part she played on that occasion. But the role of Lavinia she rendered admirably. Every movement, every gesture, and every modulation of her voice suggested the lady a little too fine; the postaster with less ideality than mannerism. She had interpreted the character faithfully and her reproduction of it was faultless. For Miss Nishikawa, as Mrs. Peck, there was also a good opportunity. This young lady, takes a higher place as an actress on each appearance in public, and she has now established her competence to fill any role that may be assigned to her. She was quite a perfect little dame of five-and-forty, true to the life in every respect, and delightfully natural. To Miss Hilda von Fallot's part (Iris) the same remarks apply as to the part of Joe. It is an exceedingly difficult character, demanding a display of most varied emotions without the slightest approach to exaggeration. Miss von Fallot played it in a really artistic manner. Her acting showed many fine points which imparted sparkle to the whole without disturbing the general impression of subdued force and gracefulness. Millie (Miss F. Dening) is just a sweet artless girl with one opportunity of shining. It is a good opportunity, however, and was so prettily utilized that one felt inclined to go on the stage and shake Tom into fuller appreciation of the chance presented to him. We have seen Miss Dening fill more important roles successfully, but as Millie she certainly gained fresh laurels.

We must congratulate the ladies and the gentlemen alike on their "costumes." All the harmonies were consulted and the possibilities exploited. The decoration of the stage—for which Mr. Conder is to be thanked—was also very pleasing and appropriate. It is especially incumbent, too, to thank and felicitate the stage-manager, Dr. Clay MacCauley. His skilled direction was very palpable in the smooth interactions of the performers and the invariably well balanced grouping of the figures. Mr. Beart kindly took charge during an interval when Dr. MacCauley was incapacitated by illness. We need scarcely speak of Mr. Beart as a stage-manager. He is a king of that craft. Of course a large meed of gratitude and praise is due to Baroness Sannomiya. Her good offices in connection with these affairs are invaluable, and the same must be said of Mr. Conder, to whose artistic taste and technical knowledge the Society is perpetually indebted. Miss Gladys Nishikawa undertook the task of prompter and discharged it most conscientiously, and the Imperial Band played some pretty music before the curtain rose as well as during the interacts.

(BY AN UNPROFESSIONAL CRITIC.)

Amateurs commonly experience some difficulty in the selection of a piece for dramatic representation. Supposing them to be of the ordinary degree of taste and culture, they will abhor melodrama as a device of the Evil One. High-class comedy and serious drama, again, are excellent things not to attempt; they are apt to be unconvincing in the hands even of competent professional actors, and most amateurs do well to leave them altogether alone. The choice is thus narrowed down to farce. A good farce is unquestionably the safest card to play. Deficiencies are less apparent, inartistic exaggeration does less damage; all the player has to do is to amuse, and it is easy—almost painfully easy—to amuse people of good digestion and conscience who have paid their money for the express purpose of being amused.

But there is still a difficulty for the amateur. He has to be more careful of the proprieties than his professional counterpart. A chartered libertine like Mr. Arthur Roberts can say things which would be heinous in Mr. Smith or Mr. Robinson. Miss Marie Tempest can look, or speak, or dress—in such a comprehensive phrase can be used of a costume which is merely sketchy—as an Artist's Model, and so on, except a member of the London County Council, says a word in reproof. But Miss Brown—whose mamma is in the reserved seats, and whose Sunday scholars are in the gallery on reduced terms to see "teacher!"—Why, the thing is clearly impossible. And how could a highly respectable family solicitor, with a young family, retain the respect of either his clients or his offspring if he had to represent in his own person the adventures of a gay old reprobate at the Moulin Rouge or the Folies Bergères?

The choice is thus rather limited. There are plenty of farces which are one prolonged laugh from start to finish, but they are mostly "suggested" (which is another word for "robbed") from the French, and are much too French, even after toning down, for the English palate. There are plenty of farces, on the other hand, which contain not one word in bringing a blush to the cheek of innocence, but then they are often so unutterably stupid that nothing but genius on the part of the actors could redeem them from inanity.

It would be unjust to Herr von Moser, the author of the farce played by the Tokyo Dramatic Association on Friday evening, to say that his work belonged entirely to the latter category. "On 'Change" was exceedingly proper, and moderately stupid, but still not wholly dull. It bore, however, the trade mark of German-made humour. The Teuton applies to the making of a joke that dogged perseverance and patient research that make him the prince of scientific investigators. One cannot help admiring Kladderadatsch, but it is the same kind of admiration one feels for Gibbon's "Decline and Fall," or for "The Wealth of Nations." The fixity of purpose, the tenacity of effort, the determination to joke or die compel one's respect. But after all it is not humour—as I understand it. A good colourable imitation perhaps, sufficiently good to pass the barrier at the literary douane, but not the real thing. Do you remember that story of the German Baron who had settled in Paris, and wished to become truly French? One night a Frenchman called in and found him jumping ponderously—he was a heavy man—over the chairs and tables. "What on earth are you doing?" exclaimed the visitor. "Ach," was the reply, "j'abbrends à être fit." That was his idea of acquiring French vivacity. These of course are purely personal opinions. There may be some who like German light humour, just as there are some who like tallow candles. I frankly acknowledge that my attitude is that of the backwoodsman towards roast polecat—I can eat it, but I don't "hanker" after it.

The leading idea of "On 'Change" is not brilliant, the characters are more absurd than amusing, and the construction is clumsy. It would have been intolerably dull without good acting, and the Tokyo amateurs, owing so little as they did to the author, deserve every credit for providing capital entertainment out of rather bare materials.

Mr. Conder, to my mind, is entitled to the chief honours among the men—both in regard to what he had to do and the manner in which he did it. The part was one which it was hard to render convincing. Imagine a stock-broker who, piqued by the sneer of a man of books, allows the latter to take temporary charge of his office, and speculate as he pleases to the tune of £10,000! Figure to yourself any business man doing this. Surely such a stockbroker would be considered eccentric even in Mr. Gilbert's Empire of Topsy-turvydom. But Mr. Conder was equal to the task. He carried off the part with the ease of a finished actor, and brought into it so much real, quiet humour, that one recognised Mr. Burnett as a man, and not a mere stage convention.

One can well imagine even a good-natured man declining the part of Professor Pocherig Peck. The rôle is not humorous—only frankly silly. Besides, there is a Scotch accent to be maintained throughout three acts, and that is tiring to actor and audience alike. I say Scotch accent, but I should rather say the accent of a stage Scotchman, which is a very different thing. I doubt whether any audience of ordinary nerves would stand real broad Scotch for two hours and a half together. Actors know this, and they compromise by the invention of theatrical Scotch. It is the same with stage Irishmen and sailors. "Arrah," "Bedad," and "Spalpeen" are not, I believe, indispensable to conversation in Dublin, but they are to a talk between two stage Irishmen. Real sailors seldom wish their timbers shivered at their main braces—whatever main braces may be—spliced. But they have to do it on the stage. Otherwise the audience would rebel. Captain Brinkley chose the better part. He was awfully Scotch—with a rich melodious accent of which it would be hard to find the counterpart beyond the Tweed. But it was much better than real Scotch, all the same. Captain Brinkley banged his sashpender, and counted his hawbees like a true Kailyarder.

I hope Mr. Pattison will not feel offended if I say a word about his de Haas. De Haas is a fool, and meant to be a fool. That is conceded. But is he precisely the kind of fool Mr. Pattison made him? I know Mr. Pattison has his preferences for that falsetto voice, that trick of pronouncing "very" "vewy," and that absurd exaggeration of deportment. I have seen many stage "nashers" of that particular type. They used to be the classic ideal of a stage fool, though I am happy to think that they are rarely met with now, except among third-rate provincial companies. Persons like de Haas are supposed to move in polite society, they are supposed at any rate to be human beings. In this world of fools and this fool of a world there are fools of infinite variety, but did any one ever meet a fool of the type of Mr. Pattison's de Haas? The exaggeration of the character takes away much of its effect, because it never gives the spectator the idea of verisimilitude. He sees at once that it is acting—clever acting, it may be, but not that sort which convinces and which is required even in farce. An artist of Mr. Pattison's evident ability should discard a discredited tradition; he would do better if he relied on his own taste.

Mr. Vickers did not appear altogether happy as Joe Johnson, but that was hardly his fault. These "lovers' parts are always a stumbling block to amateurs. Even in actual life it takes a great deal to prevent a man in love appearing ridiculous to his fellow creatures, and love, as made on the stage, is perhaps the most ridiculous thing in the world. It takes an experienced actor to seize his adored one by the hand, and as she bashfully turns her head aside, breathe his affection down the back of her neck. To do that properly, so that the audience shall believe and sympathise with it, is the highest art. Who shall blame Mr. Vickers if he hardly succeeded where many who had less excuse have failed? In the more natural points of his rôle he was much happier. Mr. Hillhouse, as an awkward lover, had more chance, and he availed himself of it. He looked and spoke the part capitally. Mr. Gardiner, as Muster, though it was a small rôle, also struck me as good.

As for the ladies, the author was not altogether kind to them. The parts were nearly all sketchy and indistinctive. Iris (Miss Von Fallot) and Millie (Miss F. Dening) were just two pretty, attractive girls, quite colourless, altogether of the wax doll type, such as one sees in every machine-made play, provided for one purpose only—to have love made to them. Miss Dening appeared in one situation which had the raw material of humor, and that she utilised. Miss Von Fallot acted charmingly within the narrow limits prescribed by the playwright, and both ladies fulfilled the ideal of sweet girlhood. Miss Nishikawa, I thought, was a splendid Mrs. Peck. In fact, it appeared to me, in spite of the comparative insignificance of the part, perhaps the best realised of the feminine characters. For a young lady to transform herself into a demure, becaped and bespectacled Professor's wife, a little worried over money affairs and ambitious of leaving dingy lodgings for a neat villa—to do this so absolutely naturally as Miss Nishikawa did is surely art of a very high order. Her performance was really a remarkable one. Of Miss Hayes' Mrs. Burnett I should, perhaps, have spoken before. The part was one which might in some hands have been colourless and lacking in individuality; in others it might easily have been ridiculously exaggerated. Miss Hayes played it with admirable restraint. Indeed she made a rôle which was, in it left the author's hands, a mere wooden stage conventionality, quite natural and human.

Altogether it was a poor play far from poorly played.—Communicated.

CHAMBER CONCERT.

The third and last of Herr Junker's Chamber Concerts was held at the Public Hall on Thursday, and was largely attended. The string quartette consisting of Herr Junker (first violin), Mr. Herbert Pöhl (second violin), Mr. Fritz Schmid (violin) and Mr. Rodolph Schmid (cello), was successful in its selections, notably in the two from Beethoven, the quartette from Mozart (in which Mr. Kaufmann assisted), and the selection from Bach. Professor Von Koeber's piano soli were perhaps the instrumental gems of the evening, his Berceuse from Chopin being especially enjoyable. Signor Bracciatini, who has an extremely powerful tenor voice—almost too powerful for so small a room—was heard to advantage in two selections, and was both times loudly encored. Mr. Friedlander was the baritone, and no doubt did his best in the solo "Gott sei mir gnädig" from "Paulus," though there is something which does not please both in his voice and manner. The programme was as follows:—

PART I.

- 1.—String Quartette in "C Minor".....Beethoven.
- 2.—Tenor Solo...."Libro Santo".....Pisenti.
- 3.—Trio in "C Minor".....Beethoven.
for Piano, Violin, and Violoncello.
- 4.—Baritone Solo
"Gott sei mir gnädig" from "Paulus"
Mendelssohn.

PART II.

- 1.—Quintette in "G Minor".....Mozart.
for 2 Violins, 2 Violas and Violoncello.
- 2.—Piano Solo—
(a) Pastorale }.....Scarlatti-Tausig.
(b) Scherzo }
(c) Berceuse.....Chopin
- 3.—Tenor Solo....Aria from "Carmen"....Bizet.
- 4.—String Quartette, Selections—
(a) "Air".....Bach.
(b) Entr'acte from Mignon
(by request).....Thomas.

PRINTERS' ERRORS.

We have no doubt that our readers often open their eyes in surprise at the typographical errors occurring in these columns, as well as in the columns of Far Eastern journals generally. Such errors are a constant source of woe and worry to the English staff of the unfortunate newspaper they disfigure, yet when it is remembered that Japanese compositors are required to set up manuscript badly written in a language of which they know nothing, the paucity rather than the plenitude of their blunders is surprising. Probably the best printed journal in the world is the London Times. Twice within the past twenty years its compositors have played malicious tricks, and the great newspaper has had to spend thousands of pounds in buying back the copies distributed before the misprint was discovered. On the most recent occasion of the kind, by a skilful transposition of type at the last moment before locking the forms, a member of Parliament was represented as having used abominable language in a speech delivered during the previous night. The trick was discovered very soon after the distribution of the paper had commenced, and every available agency was requisitioned to recall the copies sent out. The resulting expense is said to have amounted to twenty-seven hundred pounds sterling, and on the afternoon of the same day, copies of the misprinted number were selling for £5 each. But these were deliberately planned affairs against which no organization could provide. From accidental errors of compositors The Times may claim almost absolute freedom. We are constant readers of the great journal, and we have never yet detected a mistake of type-setting. The system pursued in Printing House Square and in the offices of other great journals is this:—Every proof is examined not merely by the author and the ordinary readers, but also by an old man and a boy. The two last work together, the boy reading the copy aloud and the old man following the printed matter. The idea of this combination is that neither of the two becomes interested in what he reads, and that whereas the lad is never likely to substitute words of his own imagining for the actual text, the old man is not betrayed into any impulses of impatience. The worst proof-reader, as a rule, is the author himself, for it is well known that by unconscious cerebration he imagines the correct presence of the words which ought to be before him, though their forms may be mutilated, and even though they be absent altogether. But that other great dailies of London have no such record as that of The Times will be apparent from the following notes in a recent issue of the Morning Leader:—

Yesterday I had the honour to call attention to a somewhat original bit of Greek in the Standard. And now, just to show my impartiality, I invite the reader to notice the following somewhat dark and puzzling statements in two or three leading articles in yesterday's Daily News. The first is taken from an article headed "Can the Bill be Knocked into Shape?" and it contains the following very fair and moderate suggestion:

The Opposition, then, object to the bill not because of real answer, and we trust that some peer will take it up again.

I throw out the hint with all humility, but it seems to me that the bill is not the only thing that requires to be knocked into shape.

I pass on to another leader in the same dignified journal, and read with a respect bordering on awe these observations about the conditions prevailing in the late Mr. Cadbury's model factory:

It seems like dreamland, or something out of a novel—spacious cooking, dining, and recreation room, pretty arbors where the girls might read and that at their ease, and all as cause it seeks to increase the dignity and importance of the local bodies, but because it tends to impair the solidarity of London as a whole.

I confess I am unable to follow the argument, but we must all agree with the first remark, that "it seems like dreamland."

I turn to yet another leading article in the same paper, and having settled down in firm earnest to find out what my excellent contemporary really has to say about "Confession in the Church" I come across this:—

The other question put by Lord Portsmouth was of wider and deeper significance. It re-adjusts to "the factory!" His incessant care pursued his people in sickness as in health.

There is a little bit more of dreamland business knocking about here, I'm afraid, and we must all ask in what Mr. Chadband called "the spirit of ter-ewth." How do we stand?

Now, some narrow-minded and dull souls may write to me asking why I poke fun at other papers for slips when my own paper has now and then been known to trip. Of course it has! Even The Morning Leader is human, but that is what makes one enjoy these little regrettable incidents all the more. And I compliment any paper which concentrates its errors in its leading articles, for it's ten to one no one ever reads them.

But when my really sound and able contemporary the Daily News begins to indulge its weakness for fun and frolic in its reporting columns I must protest. Here is what I gather from its inspired page on the question of "condensed milk as food":

Dr. W. Stocker (Willesden) said practically 200 per cent. of the children who died in his district last summer died from the effects of taking "separated" condensed milk. (Sensation.) He was simply mentioning the facts. Quite so; but I have noticed that sometimes when I "simply mention the facts" my observations cause considerable sensation.

SPRING MEETING OF THE NIPPON RACE CLUB.

FIRST DAY.—MONDAY, MAY 8TH.

PATRON.—H.I.H. Komatsu-no-Miya, H.I.H. Fushimi-no-Miya, H.I.H. Takashito-no-Miya.

PERMANENT COMMITTEE.—Sir Ernest Satow, K.C.M.G., President; Dr. Wheeler, Vice-President; Messrs. T. Asada, W. B. Walter, Jas. Dodds, F. Strahler, Baron d'Anethan, Count Orfini, Messrs. T. Thomas, R. D. Robinson, W. W. Till, E. Knaff, G. Philip, S. Isaacs, W. F. Mitchell, and T. Rinoiye.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.—Mr. W. W. Till, Chairman; Messrs. E. Knaff, T. Thomas, J. C. Nicholson, A. J. Easton, Geo. Philip, K. Mori.

CLERK OF THE COURSE.—Mr. A. J. Easton.
SECRETARY.—J. E. Beale.

The opening day of the Nippon Race Club's spring meeting passed off very pleasantly. Some anxiety was felt as to the weather, for the early morning was very dubious, but fortunately there was no rain to spoil the enjoyment of those present, though the wind was a trifle cold and cutting for so late in the year. The attendance was not very large, the majority of those who toil and spin having apparently reserved their holiday till to day, when the Emperor's visit will add special interest to the occasion. Official circles both in Yokohama and Tokyo were fairly well represented, and there was a good sprinkling of ladies, many of whom were walking advertisements of their dress-makers' and milliners' artistic tastes. The racing was on the whole interesting, and in several of the events the finishes were close and exciting, but there were no sensational surprises; the expected mostly happened. A record was made in the Nippon Plate, one and a half miles, Tatsuta winning in the excellent time of 2 min. 55½ secs. against 2 min. 56 secs. made by Mr. Takeda's Young Australia in November, 1891. The enjoyment of the spectators was enhanced by performances of the Town Band.

It should be noted that Wisconsin, Civility, and Gladiateur are scratched all engagements.

Following are details of the racing:—

1.—THE MONGOLIAN PLATE, for Subscription China Ponies, non-winners in Japan at date of entry; winner yen 250, second yen 50; weight as per scale. Three-quarters of a Mile. Entrance fee, yen 10.

Mr. Nishimura's Azuma, 150lb. (Mr. Kingdon) 1
Mr. Avis' Nightingale, 147lb. (Goto) 2
Mr. Nemo's Open Door, 150lb. (Ichi) 3
Mr. R. Field's Tortoise, 150lb. (Miura) 0
Mr. Tatsuta's Hayabusa, 150lb. (Riki) 0
Mr. Hyogo's Hiroshima, 147lb. (Takahashi) 0
Mr. Russia's Chingiz, 147lb. (Horikoshi) 0
Mr. Worthington's Edinburgh, 153lb. (Yasu) 0
Mr. G. Campredon's Fleur-de-lis, 147lb. (Kubota) 0

Mr. Tytherleigh's Manifesto, 153lb. (Tobe) 0
Time, 1 min. 39½ sec.

After several false starts the field got away well together, Nightingale leading the way with Edinburgh and Chingiz well up, and the rest following in a cluster. So they ran to the half mile, when Edinburgh forced Nightingale into second place, Open Door racing third. At the Shakespeare Nightingale again came to the front, with Manifesto and Azuma in close attendance. On turning into the straight Chingiz challenged the favourite and passed him close on the post, winning by two lengths, a good third. Chingiz was fourth.

PARI MUTUEL, 5 yen—Tortoise 0, Hayabusa 6, Open Door 12, Hiroshima 6, Chingiz 15, Edinburgh 15, Nightingale 54, Azuma 28, Fleur-de-lis 8, Manifesto 1; total, 715 yen—Azuma 23 yen.

2.—THE ALL-AGED STAKES, for Country breeds; yen 250; weight as per scale, maidens at date of entry 5lb. allowance. Three-quarter Mile. Entrance fee, yen 10.

Mr. R. Field's Tomboy, 145lb. (Miura) 1
Mr. States' Idaho, 140lb. (Sugina) 2
Mr. Yoda's Saikio, 137lb. (Hakodate) 3
Mr. Avis' Peacock, 130lb. (Goto) 0

* Mare.—Allowance deducted.
† Maiden.—Allowance deducted.
Time, 1.25½.

From the start Idaho settled down to the lead, with Peacock second, and Saikio third. Shortly after Saikio forced his way into second place, and was almost on even terms with Idaho. They ran thus till the Shakespeare, when Tomboy came up, and made a bid, passing Idaho and Saikio just before entering the straight. An exciting race ensued up to the post, Tomboy getting in half a length ahead; Saikio close up.

PARI MUTUEL, 5 yen—Tomboy 29, Peacock 20, Idaho 72, Saikio 58; 895 yen—Tomboy, 28 yen.

3.—THE CRITERION STAKES, for China Ponies; winner yen 250, second yen 50; weight as per scale. Three-quarter Mile. Entrance fee, yen 10.

Mr. Tatsuta's Kutaka (late Kestrel), 147lb. (Riki) 1
Mr. R. Field's Kinder, 144lb. (Mr. Mottu) 2
Mr. Nishimura's MacMorse, 150lb. (Goto) 3
Mr. Nemo's Rond-de-Cuir (late Nitsaka), 150lb. (Ichi) 0

Mr. Russia's Doorak, 144lb. (Horikoshi) 0
Mr. Guignol's Kuigoni, 147lb. (Matsuya) 0
Mr. States' O'egon, 150lb. (Mr. Pakenham) 0
Messrs. Sharp and Elliott's Gadfly, 150lb. (Mr. Elliott) 0
Time, 1.37½

The field went away all together, but on thinning Kutaka assumed the lead with Kinder second, and Oregon third. This was about the order till the entrance to the straight, when MacMorse came away from the rack and jumped into third place. Kutaka was never seriously troubled, and won by two lengths. MacMorse made a splendid effort at the post, and all but snatched second place from Kinder. Oregon was fourth. Gadfly was weighed in, but was not quiet enough to be saddled in time and so did not run.

PARI MUTUEL, 5 yen—Kinder 88, Kutaka 27, Rond-de-Cuir 19, Doorak 14, MacMorse 35, Gadfly 5; total, 1,160 yen—Kutaka, 39 yen.

4.—THE SHIMOSA PLATE, for Subscription Country-breds of Autumn 1898; yen 150; weight 130lb.; winners in Japan at date of 130lb. † Mile. Entrance fee, yen 10.

Mr. Schuix's Mazette, 135lb. (Miyagawa) 1
Mr. News' Eclat, 130lb. (Sugina) 2
Mr. Avis' Chaffinch, 135lb. (Matsuya) 3
Mr. Tatsuta's Sekirew, 135lb. (Hattori) 0
Time 1.13½.

Mazette led from the start, with Eclat a length or two behind, and Chaffinch racing third. The pace was leisurely up to the trees, when Eclat made an effort to come on terms, but it was clearly Mazette's race, and he came in an easy winner by about three lengths, the same distance between second and third.

PARI MUTUEL, 5 yen—Sekirew 89, Eclat 36, Chaffinch 27, Mazette 67; total, 1,095 yen—Mazette, 15 yen.

5.—THE MANDARIN PLATE, for Subscription China Ponies of Autumn 1898 and Spring 1899; winner yen 250, second yen 50; weight as per scale; winners in Japan at date of entry 5lb. extra, winners of more than one race at date of entry excluded. 1½ Miles. Entrance fee, yen 10.

Mr. Guignol's Confidence, 155lb. (Mr. Longin) 1
Mr. Tytherleigh's Manifesto, 153lb. (Yasu) 2
Mr. R. Field's Terrapin, 147lb. (Miura) 3
Mr. News' Evenement, 147lb. (Sugina) 0
Mr. Hyogo's Iwabuchi, 150lb. (Takahashi) 0
Mr. Starlight's Mars, 153lb. (Katsu) 0
Time 2.37.

Manifesto went away with a long lead, with Confidence and Evenement having second and third. Manifesto made the running as far as the Trees, when Confidence got on terms and Terrapin ran into third place. A good race ensued down the straight, but Manifesto was unable to make up lost ground, and Confidence won by three lengths. Bad third. Mars was fourth and Evenement last.

PARI MUTUEL, 5 yen—Terrapin 26, Evenement 37, Iwabuchi 16, Confidence 55, Mars 13, Manifesto 85; total, 1,160 yen—Confidence, 19 yen.

6.—THE NIPPON PLATE, for Country-breds; winner yen 200, second yen 50; weight as per scale, maidens at date of entry 5lb. allowance. One-half Miles. Entrance fee, yen 10.

Mr. Tatsuta's Tatsuta, 145lb. (Riki) 1
Mr. Worthington's Tambour Majeur, 132lb. (Yasu) 3
Mr. Russia's Hermine, 137lb. (Horikoshi) 0
Time 2.55½.

Hermine took the lead, but was passed by both Tambour Majeur and Tatsuta just after the trees had been reached. Coming down the straight Tambour Majeur and Tatsuta were racing neck and neck, Hermine going two or three lengths behind. Going up the rise Tatsuta got a slight lead, but it was a very close thing till the houses, when Tatsuta began to forge ahead, and had obtained a couple of lengths lead by the half-mile post. From thence to the Shakespeare he increased the advantage, and was leading easily on entering the straight. From this point it was a sure thing, and Tatsuta came in quite untroubled with half a dozen lengths to spare; a bad third.

PARI MUTUEL, 5 yen—Tatsuta 174, Hermine 72, Tambour Major 136; total, 1,910 yen—Tatsuta, 10 yen.

7.—THE SHANGHAI PLATE, for China Ponies; winner yen 250, second yen 50; weight as per scale. One-and-a-half Miles. Entrance fee, yen 10.

Mr. Worthington's Aberdeen, 150lb. (Yasu) 1

Mr. Nemo's Mr. Darcy, 140lb. (Ichi) 2
Mr. Hyogo's Okayama (late Miyajima), 153lb. (Takahashi) 3

Mr. Nemo's San-moon, 153lb. (Katsu) 0
Mr. News' Eclairer, 150lb. (Mr. Kingdon) 0
Mr. Russia's Maygar, 153lb. (Horikoshi) 0
Mr. States' Oregon, 150lb. (Mr. Pakenham) 0
Messrs. Sharp and Elliott's Gadfly, 150lb. (Hakodate) 0
Time, 3.23½.

Mr. Nemo declared the best of his pair to win. Aberdeen took the lead from the start, with Mr. Darcy second, and Eclairer and Maygar close behind. This was the order till the half mile was passed. Okayama, who had been in the rack, then commenced to work his way through the field, but was unable to get on terms with Aberdeen and Mr. Darcy. The former had an easy run down the straight, finishing with two lengths to spare. Okayama was a bad third, and Eclairer was close up. San-moon came in at the tail.

PARI MUTUEL, 5 yen—San-moon 14, Mr. Darcy 112, Eclairer 50, Okayama 14, Maygar 24, Aberdeen 127, Oregon 19, Gadfly 7; total 1,835 yen.—Aberdeen 13 yen.

8.—THE JAPAN STAKES, for Country-breds, maidens at date of entry; winner yen 200, second yen 50; weight as per scale. † Mile. Entrance fee, yen 10.

Mr. Avis' Peacock, 135lb. (Goto) 1
Mr. Tatsuta's Omokage, 135lb. (Sugina) 2
Mr. Nemo's Speranza (late Mizuhashi), 137lb. (Ichi) 3
Mr. Starlight's Minerva, 140lb. (Katsu) 0
Mr. G. Campredon's Iris, 145lb. (Kubota) 0
* Mare.—Allowance deducted.
Time, 1 min. 12 secs.

Omokage jumped away with the lead, with Peacock close up. Peacock passed Omokage near the Shakespeare, and went away with a long lead, coming in with several lengths to spare; fair third. Minerva was fourth and Iris last.

PARI MUTUEL, 5 yen—Omokage 127, Speranza 39, Peacock 182, Minerva 54, Iris 11; total, 1,715 yen.—Peacock 14 yen.

9.—THE CELESTIAL STAKES, for Subscription China Ponies, non-winners in Japan at date of entry; winner yen 225, second yen 50; weight as per scale; winner of race 5. 5lb. extra. 1½ Miles. Entrance fee, yen 10.

Mr. Nishimura's Azuma, 150lb. (Mr. Kingdon) 1
Mr. Russia's Chingiz, 147lb. (Horikoshi) 2
Mr. Guignol's Cascadeur, 150lb. (Mr. Longin) 3
Mr. R. Field's Tortoise, 150lb. (Mr. Tegen) 0
Mr. Hyogo's Iwabuchi, 150lb. (Takahashi) 0
Mr. Avis' Nightingale, 147lb. (Mr. Pakenham) 0
Mr. Wayloong's Ginko, 150lb. (Yasu) 0
Mr. G. Campredon's Fleur-de-lis, 147lb. (Miyagawa) 0
Time 2 min. 37½.

Cascadeur jumped away with the lead, but when they passed the grand stand Ginko was ahead, with Chingiz and Nightingale close. Going up the rise Nightingale got a slight lead, closely followed by Chingiz, Azuma, and Cascadeur. Nightingale had a length's lead as far as the houses, when Azuma made a bid and rushed into first place just before entering the home straight. From that point he was not troubled, and won by several lengths. Nightingale allowed himself also to be beaten by Chingiz and Cascadeur, and came in fourth. Tortoise was last.

PARI MUTUEL. 5 yen—Tortoise 3, Iwabuchi 4, Chingiz 27, Cascadeur 25, Nightingale 99, Azuma 129, Ginko 72, Fleur-de-lis 7; total, 1,830 yen—Azuma, 13 yen.

SECOND DAY.—TUESDAY, MAY 9TH.

Tuesday was probably a record in the annals of the Nippon Race Club. Seldom, if ever, has the great day of the meeting passed off with so much clat. The Ladies' Day is always, if the weather is reasonably tolerable, a brilliant social function, but the fact that the Emperor had consented to make what was practically a State visit to the course gave added interest and importance to the gathering. Fortunately the day, as far as the climatic conditions were concerned, was perfect. Some misgiving was felt early in the morning, as to possible mean conduct on the part of the powers which regulate the clouds, and which, in spite of all scientific improvements, are still not amenable even to a Court Chamberlain. But these prognostications of evil were happily not fulfilled, and Tuesday was as pleasant a day as could possibly be wished—not too warm to render the crowded grand stand insufferably hot, and not too devoid of sunlight to neutralise the effect of the gay-tinted spring dresses of the ladies. The attendance was a record one. The grand stand and the ground in front of it were packed, and the scene was most brilliant and animated. There were hundreds of foreign visitors from Tokyo, Kobe, and the country; crowds of Japanese and Chinese; and practically the whole foreign population of Yokohama, except the few whom business—and it must be serious business that cannot be put aside on race day—tied to their desks in the Settlement. Everybody, at all events, with the slightest pretensions to being "smart" was to be seen. Silk hats were as plentiful as in Piccadilly; and tasteful spring toilets were in almost as great numbers and in nearly as bewildering variety as on a June morning in Hyde Park. Nearly all the Legation officials from Tokyo were on the course, and a great body of Japanese notables were also present. Among the principal visitors were:—Prince Kan-in, Viscount Aoki, Minister of Foreign Affairs, Viscountess Aoki, and Miss Aoki; Marquis Tokudaiji, Grand Chamberlain to the Emperor; Viscount Tanaka, Minister of the Household Department; Baron Sannomiya, Grand Master of Ceremonies; Governor Asada; Marquis and Marchioness Nabeshima; Mr. Nagasaki, Private Secretary to the Minister of the Imperial Household; Count Lieut. Hirohaki, Chamberlain to His Majesty the Emperor; Baron Madenokoji, Chamberlain to His Majesty; Sir Ernest Satow, British Minister; Baron Rosen, Russian Minister, and Baroness Rosen; M. Harmand, French Minister, Madame Harmand, and Mademoiselle Harmand; Count von Leyden, German Minister; Count Orfini, Italian Minister; Baron d'Anethan, Belgian Minister, and Baroness d'Anethan; Hon. A. E. Buck, United States Minister, and Mrs. Buck; M. Antoine de Grubisch, Austrian chargé d'affaires; Senor Louis de la Barrera, Spanish chargé d'affaires; Senor de Freitas, Portuguese chargé d'affaires, and Senora de Freitas; Mr. Van der Polder, Dutch chargé d'affaires, and Mrs. Van der Polder; the Mexican chargé d'affaires; Viscount and Viscountess de Bondy, Mr. Ralph Paget, Senor and Senora Caicer, Mr. Paul May, Mr. Poklewsky, Mr. Michel Andréau, Commander Chugin; Mr. H. A. C. Bonar, British Consul at Yokohama; Marquis Nembrini de Gonzaga, and nearly all the Consular body of Yokohama.

His Majesty arrived on the ground shortly after 11.30, followed by his suite, and escorted by a troop of Lancers of the Imperial Bodyguard. He was received at the steps of the Grand Stand by Sir Ernest Satow, and at once proceeded to the Imperial box, whence he watched the whole of the races. At the end of the meeting the Imperial Guards formed up at the entrance to the grand stand, and His Majesty entered his carriage amid ringing cheers, which he acknowledged by a gracious bow. A huge crowd lined the road on the homeward journey.

The sport was worthy of the occasion; and several exciting finishes were witnessed. The pleasure of those present was greatly augmented by the capital performances of the massed bands of H.M.S. Victorious and Barfleur.

Details of the racing are as follows:—

1.—THE NANKIN STAKES, for Subscription China Ponies of Autumn 1898 and Spring 1899: winner yen 200, second yen 50; weight as per scale; winners in Japan at date of entry 5lb. extra; of more than one race excluded. Three-quarter Mile. Entrance fee, yen 10.

Mr. Worthington's Edinburgh, 153lb. ... (Yasu) 1
Mr. G. Campredon's Fleur-de-lis, 147lb. (Mr. Kingdon) 2

Mr. Avis' Nightingale, 147lb. ... (Goto) 3
Mr. Tatsuta's Hayabusa, 150lb. ... (Rikizo) 0
Mr. Nemo's Open Door, 150lb. ... (Ichi) 0
Mr. News' Evenement, 147lb. ... (Mayeda) 0
Mr. Hyogo's Hiroshima, 147lb. ... (Takahashi) 0
Mr. Tythierleigh's Manifesto, 153lb. ... (Kobey) 0
Time, 1.38.5.

Open Door made the running, attended by Edinburgh and Manifesto, with Fleur-de-lis close up. They ran thus to the Shakespeare, when Open Door and Manifesto fell altogether to the rear, and Fleur-de-lis took up the lead, with Edinburgh racing second, and Nightingale a length or two behind. On entering the straight Edinburgh made a splendid bid, and for most of the distance was racing neck with Fleur-de-lis, eventually coming in with a length and a half to spare. Poor third. Hayabusa was fourth, and Open Door last.

PARI MUTUEL. 5 yen—Hayabusa 24, Open Door 5, Evenement 1, Hiroshima 3, Edinburgh 18, Nightingale 90, Fleur-de-lis 24, Manifesto 35; total, 1,000 yen—Edinburgh, 30 yen.

2.—THE SPRING STAKES, for Country-breds; yen 200; weight as per scale, maidens at date of entry 5lb. allowance, winners at the meeting 5lb. extra. 1½ Miles. Entrance fee, yen 10.

Mr. Yodo's Saikio, 137lb. ... (Ichi) 1
Mr. R. Field's Tomboy, 145lb. ... (Mura) 2
Mr. States' Idaho, 140lb. ... (Sugura) 3
* Mare.—Allowance deducted.
Time, 2.10.5.

Idaho made the running, with Saikio next and Tomboy, who was a warm favourite, last. They went past the stand and up the dip in this order, but approaching the Shakespeare Saikio went ahead with a long lead, and shortly after Tomboy passed Idaho. Saikio was never troubled, and came in several lengths ahead.

PARI MUTUEL. 5 yen—Tomboy 148, Idaho 85, Saikio 54; total 1435 yen—Saikio 24 yen.

3.—THE KANAGAWA STAKES, for Subscription Country-breds of Autumn 1898; yen 150; weight 130lb., winners in Japan at date of entry and winner of Race 4, first day, 5b. extra. Three-quarter Mile. Entrance fee, yen 10.

Mr. Sphinx's Mazette, 140lb. ... (Miyagawa) 1
Mr. News' Eclair, 130lb. ... (Sugura) 2
Mr. Tatsuta's Sekirew, 135lb. ... (Yasu) 3
Mr. Avis' Chaffinch, 135lb. ... (Goto) 0
Time 1.28.5.

Mazette got away with the lead, and held it throughout, winning by a length; two lengths between second and third.

PARI MUTUEL. 5 yen—Mazette 128, Eclair 51, Chaffinch 24, Sekirew 72; total, 1,375 yen—Mazette 10 yen.

4.—THE LADIES' PURSE, Presented, for all China Ponies; to be ridden by Members of the Club or Visitors, whose names must be sent to the Committee before the meeting and approved by them; weight as per scale with 5lb. added. One Mile. Entrance fee, yen 10.

Mr. Worthington's Aberdeen, 155lb. (Mr. Easton) 1
Mr. Nishimura's MacMorse, 155lb. (Mr. Nishimura) 2

Mr. Russia's Magyar, 158lb. ... (Mr. Pearson) 3
Mr. R. Field's Kindar, 149lb. ... (Mr. Motin) 0
Mr. Nemo's Mr. Darcy, 155lb. carried 160lb. (Mr. Andreis) 0

Mr. News' Eclair, 155lb. ... (Mr. Kingdon) 0
Mr. Guignol's Confidence, 155lb. ... (Mr. Lougin) 0
Mr. States' Oregon, 155lb. ... (Mr. Pakemham) 0
Messrs. Sharp and Elliott's 155lb. (Mr. Elliott) 0
Time, 2.12.5.

MacMorse made the running, followed by Magyar, with Oregon close up, and the rest running in a bunch. Going up the dip Oregon drew up level, and a blanket would have covered the first four till the half mile post, when Aberdeen worked through the field, and took a slight lead, which he increased during the journey to the home stretch. On entering the straight Aberdeen was leading with Magyar a length or two behind, and MacMorse third. Half-way up MacMorse challenged Magyar, and shot ahead of him just before the post. He could not, however, reach Aberdeen, who won by two lengths. A length between second and third.

A PRETTY PRESENTATION.

After the race the Ladies' Purse, value fifty sovereigns, was presented to Mr. Easton by Miss Lloyd Thomas with the following neat little speech:—

I have much pleasure in behalf of the ladies of Tokio and Yokohama in presenting you with this purse as a token of the great interest we take in this noble sport. That the Nippon Race Club may long continue in its present flourishing condition is the earnest hope of us all and it is a good augury for the future success of the club that His Majesty the Emperor has honoured this Meeting with his presence. We are sorry that some of the riders had to lose but it was inevitable when so good a pony as Aberdeen was ridden by so able a rider as yourself, and it is only natural that the clerk of the course should lead the way. We hope you will accept our good wishes that your success to-day may not be a simile of the fickle goddess of fortune but may prove a token of the certain and lasting favour of the goddess of victory.

Mr. Easton, in reply, said:—I have to thank you, Miss Thomas, for so kindly presenting the prize, and I have also to thank on behalf of the members of the Club the ladies of Yokohama and Tokyo for so liberally subscribing to the purse. I am told it is the largest on record, which shows the increasing interest that is taken in our races. I have seen racing in nearly all parts of the world and I think considering our small community there are many ladies who take as genuine an interest in racing as they do in other parts. It was only this morning that I decided to ride, and therefore I have had no time to think about a speech, but I may say that I feel proud in having won to-day, for it is no ordinary day, because H.M. the Emperor has honoured the Club with his presence and also graciously consented to receive this morning an address from the foreign community, showing the feeling that exists on the eve of the new treaties.

PARI MUTUEL. 5 yen—Kindar 128, Mr. Darcy 49, Eclair 66, Magyar 27, Aberdeen 250, Confidence 43, Oregon 30, MacMorse 33, Gadfly 10; total, 3,130 yen—Aberdeen 11 yen.

5.—THE MAIDENS' PLATE, for Country-breds, maidens at date of entry; winner yen 200, second yen 50; weight as per scale; winner of Race 8, first day, 5lb. extra. Three-quarter Mile. Entrance fee, yen 10.

Mr. Avis' Peacock, 135lb. ... (Goto) 1
Mr. Tatsuta's Omokage, 135lb. ... (Sugura) 2
Mr. Guignol's Zigoto, 135b. ... (Miyagawa) 3
Mr. Nemo's Speranza, 137lb. ... (Ichi) 0
Mr. Starlight's Mineva, 140lb. ... (Katsu) 0
Mr. G. Campredon's Iris, 145lb. ... (Horikoshi) 0
* Mare.—Allowance deducted.
Time, 1.25.5.

Omokage jumped away with the lead, with Iris next, and the rest of the field close up. Omokage steadily increased his lead as far as the houses, where he had an advantage of five or six lengths. Peacock then made a bid, and had greatly improved his position when they reached the trees. Entering the straight Peacock was two lengths behind Omokage, and half-way down he got on terms, finishing with two lengths to spare. Zigoto was a good third.

PARI MUTUEL. Omokage 150, Speranza 31, Zigoto 14, Peacock 250, Mineva 16, Iris 11; total 2,360 yen—Peacock 8 yen.

6.—THE PEKING CUP, for Subscription China Ponies, non-winners in Japan at date of entry; winner yen 225, second 50; weight as per scale; winner of Race 5, or 9 first day, 5b. extra. One-half Miles. Entrance fee, yen 10.

Mr. Nishimura's Azuma, 150lb. (Mr. Kingdon) 1
Mr. R. Field's Terrapin, 147lb. ... (Mr. Motin) 2
Mr. Russia's Chingiz, 147lb. ... (Horikoshi) 3
Mr. Hyogo's Iwabuchi, 150lb. ... (Takahashi) 0
Mr. R. Field's Tortoise, 150lb. ... (Mura) 0
Mr. Starlight's Mai, 153lb. ... (Katsu) 0
Time, 3.29.5.

Mr. R. Field declared the best of his pair to win. The field got away well together, but as they passed the post Azuma was leading by a length, with Chingiz next and Mai and Terrapin just behind. This order was maintained until the Shakespeare, when Chingiz began to go ahead, and just before entering the straight he had a slight lead. Azuma, however, then got on terms again, and rushed into first place, winning by about two lengths. Terrapin also beat Chingiz just before the post, three lengths separating them.

THE EMPEROR'S PRIZE.

The Emperor's prize, a magnificent silver bowl, was presented by Viscount Tanaka, Minister of the Imperial Household to Mr. Kingdon, the jockey of the winning horse. Three hearty cheers and a lusty Bansai led by Mr. Thomas were given for His Majesty, who acknowledged the compliment with a gracious bow.

PARI MUTUEL, 5 yen—Tortoise 18, Terrapin 65, Iwabuchi 35, Chingiz 218, Azuma 385, Mats 14; total, 3,675 yen—Azuma, 9 yen.

7.—THE NIPPON STAKES, for Country-breds; yen 200; weight as per scale; Maidens at date of 10lb. allowance; winners at the meeting of one race 5lb. extra, of two races excluded. One Mile. Entrance fee, yen 10.

Mr. Tatsuta's Tatsuta, 145lb. (Riki) 1
Mr. States' Idaho, 140lb. (Sugiura) 2
* Mare.—Allowance deducted.

Time, 1:53.

Though there were seven entries, the race resolved itself into a match. The pair kept together almost all the distance, Tatsuta eventually winning by half a length.

PARI MUTUEL, 5 yen—Tatsuta 31, Idaho 18; total, 245 yen—Tatsuta, 7 yen.

8.—THE MANCHURIAN STAKES, for China Ponies; winner yen 200; weight as per scale; winners of the race at the meeting 5lb. extra; of two races excluded. 1½ Miles. Entrance fee, yen 10.

Mr. Nemo's Mr. Darcy, 150lb. (Ichi) 1
Mr. Hyogo's Doorak, 144lb. (Takahashi) 2
Mr. Tatsuta's Kotaka, 147lb. (Riki) 3
Mr. Nemo's San-moon, 153lb. (Katsu) 4
Mr. News' Elclairer, 150lb. (Mr. Kingdon) 5
Mr. Russia's Magyar, 153lb. (Hattori) 6
Mr. Russia's Doorak, 144lb. (Horikoshi) 7
Mr. Guignol's Kirigomi, 147lb. (Matsuya) 8
Mr. States' Oregon, 150lb. (Mr. Pakenham) 9
Messrs. Sharp and Elliott's Gaddy, 150lb. (Mr. Elliott) 10

Time, 2:33½.

Mr. Nemo and Mr. Russia declared best to win. Mr. Darcy went away with the lead, with San Moon and Doorak close behind. Doorak had got into second place by the dip, but soon fell back into the rack. Okayama worked his way through the field and was at one time on terms with Mr. Darcy, but the latter, just before entering the straight, went away, and won by three lengths, a good third. Oregon was fourth and Doorak fifth.

PARI MUTUEL, 5 yen—Kotaka 284, Mr. Darcy 129, San-Moon 7, Elclairer 23, Okayama 34, Magyar 7, Doorak 83, Kirigomi 13, Oregon 18, Gaddy 7; total, 3,160 yen—Mr. Darcy, 22 yen.

9.—THE TAIWAN STAKES, for Subscription China Ponies, non-winners in Japan at date of entry; winner yen 200, second yen 50; weight as per scale; winners of one race at the meeting 5lb. extra, of two races excluded. One Mile. Entrance fee, yen 10.

Mr. Avis' Nightingale, 147lb. (Goto) 1
Mr. Guignol's Cascadeur, 150lb. (Mr. Longin) 2
Mr. Starlight's Mats, 153lb. (Katsu) 3

Mr. Tytherleigh's Manifesto, 153lb. (Kobei) 10
Mr. Wayfoong's Ginko, 150lb. (Mr. Pakenham) 11
Time, 2:16½.

Manifesto made the running, followed by Nightingale and Ginko. So they ran till the houses were reached, when Nightingale drew level and finally passed Manifesto, Cascadeur and Mats also working their way through the field to second and third place. Nightingale had a slight lead on entering the straight, when Cascadeur made a splendid bid, and a neck to neck race ensued, Nightingale finishing first by a head. Bad third.

PARI MUTUEL, 5 yen—Hayabusa 28, Evènement 6, Chingiz 43, Edinburgh 48, Cascadeur 35, Nightingale 73, Mats 4, Fleur-de-lis 7, Manifesto 26, Ginko 77; total, 1,735 yen—Nightingale, 21 yen.

THIRD DAY.—WEDNESDAY, MAY 10TH.

The third day of the races was decidedly of an "off" character. The attendance had greatly thinned, and there were not many ladies present in comparison with the large numbers of the previous day. The weather was fortunately beautifully fine, and the day was a fitting conclusion to a meeting which has been particularly fortunate in regard to the atmospheric conditions. The Town Band was present and played during the intervals between the races. Speculation was very rife, and some of the totals in the pari mutuel were extremely large. The sport witnessed was on the whole excellent, and some finishes were exceedingly near. It should be mentioned that the arrangements for the meeting, except as regards accommodation for the Press, were excellent; and the catering of Clauson's Hotel, who supplied the lunch, gave much satisfaction.

Details:—

1.—THE CÉSAREWITCH STAKES (Handicap), A forced entry at yen 20 of all China Ponies entered at the meeting; non-starters half forfeit; winner yen 300, second yen 100, third yen 50; handicap after the second day's racing. One Mile.

Mr. Nishimura's MacMorse, 150lb. (Yasu) 1
Mr. Russia's Magyar, 145lb. (Mr. Pearson) 2
Mr. Nemo's Mr. Darcy, 153lb. (Ichi) 3
Mr. R. Field's Tortoise, 132lb. (Mitsu) 4
Mr. Tatsuta's Kotaka, 150lb. (Riki) 5
Mr. News' Elclairer, 138lb. (Mr. Kingdon) 6
Mr. News' Evènement, 134lb. (Mayeda) 7
Mr. Hyogo's Okayama, 149lb. (Mr. Mottu) 8
Mr. Russia's Doorak, 139lb. (Horikoshi) 9
Mr. Guignol's Kirigomi, 140lb. (Miyagawa) 10
Mr. Guignol's Confidence, 150lb. (Mr. Longin) 11
Mr. Avis' Nightingale, 140lb. (Goto) 12
Mr. States' Oregon, 143lb. (Sugiura) 13
Mr. Starlight's Mats, 137lb. (Katsu) 14
Mr. Wayfoong's Ginko, 137lb. (Hayashi) 15
Time 2:10½.

Mr. News and Mr. Russia declared best to win. Kotaka made the running, closely followed by MacMorse and Mr. Darcy, but Kotaka soon fell behind and MacMorse assumed the lead, which he kept throughout, Magyar, who had come up after passing the Shakespeare, failing to reach him. Won by three lengths; third close up. Oregon was fourth, Nightingale fifth, and Mats last.

PARI MUTUEL, (5 yen)—Tortoise 1, Kotaka 32, Mr. Darcy 57, Elclairer 20, Okayama 11, Magyar 7, Doorak 11, Kirigomi 4, Confidence 5, Nightingale 7, Oregon 3, MacMorse 9, Mats 2, Ginko 4; total 1,275 yen—MacMorse 13 yen.

2.—THE PRIX DES HARAS (Handicap), for all Country-breds; a forced entry at yen 20 of all Country-breds at the meeting except Subscription Horses of Autumn 1898 and Maidens at date of entry; non-starters half forfeit; winner yen 300, second yen 100, third yen 50; handicap after second day's racing. One Mile.

Mr. Yodo's Saikio, 137lb. (Ichi) 1
Mr. States' Idaho, 135lb. (Sugiura) 2
Mr. Avis' Peacock, 140lb. (Goto) 3
Mr. Starlight's Mineva, 125lb. (Katsu) 4
Mr. G. Campredon's Iris, 112lb. (Kubota) 5
Time, 1:53½.

It was a poor start, Iris being left altogether behind. Saikio settled down with the lead, with Idaho and Peacock in attendance. They ran thus to the finish, Saikio winning easily by three or four lengths. Peacock a poor third.

PARI MUTUEL, (5 yen)—Peacock 44, Idaho 70, Mineva 3, Iris 2, Saikio 122, total 1,205 yen—Saikio 9 yen.

3.—THE YOUNGSTERS' HANDICAP, for Subscription Country-breds of Autumn 1898; a forced entry at yen 20 of all horses entered at the meeting; non-starters half forfeit; yen 250; handicap after second day's racing. Five furlongs.

Mr. Sobink's Mazette, 150lb. (Miyagawa) 1
Mr. News' Eclat, 150lb. (Sugiura) 2
Mr. Tatsuta's Sekirew, 126lb. (Hayashi) 3
Time, 1:17½.

After several false starts Mazette got away with the lead, with Eclat second. So they raced as far as the Shakespeare, where Sekirew challenged Eclat and momentarily held second place, but just afterwards Eclat came up again and pressed Mazette hard. On entering the straight Eclat was a length or two behind, and a splendid race ensued to the finish, the horses racing neck and neck most of the distance. Mazette, however, managed to get in a short head in front. Sekirew was a poor third.

PARI MUTUEL, 5 yen—Sekirew 101, Eclat, 222, Mazette 175; Total, 2,490 yen—Mazette 13 yen.

4.—THE CHINA CHAMPION, a Champion Race for all China Ponies; a forced entry for winners at the meeting, of one race yen 10, of two races yen 20, and of more than two races yen 40; optional to beaten Ponies at an entrance fee of yen 25; yen 500; weight as per scale. Mile and a quarter.

Mr. Worthington's Aberdeen, 150lb.

(Mr. Easton) 1
Mr. Nemo's Mr. Darcy, 150lb. (Ichi) 2
Mr. Nishimura's Azuma, 150lb. (Mr. Kingdon) 3
Mr. Worthington's Edinburgh, 153lb. (Yasu) 4
Mr. Guignol's Confidence, 150lb. (Mr. Longin) 5
Time, 2:40½.

Edinburgh made the running, but, going up the dip, fell behind, and Mr. Darcy and Aberdeen came to the front, and near the Shakespeare the latter gained a short lead. They raced thus as far as the entrance to the straight, when Mr. Darcy made an effort to reach Aberdeen, but the latter came away, and won by a length and a half. Bad third. Edinburgh was last.

PARI MUTUEL, 5 yen—Azuma, 148, Confidence 9, Aberdeen 302, Edinburgh 29, Mr. Darcy 47; total 2,675 yen—Aberdeen 8 yen.

5.—THE COUNTRY-BRED CHAMPION, a Champion Race for all Country-breds; a forced entry for winners at the Meeting, except Subscription Horses of Autumn 1898, of one race yen 10, of two races yen 20, and of more than two races yen 40; optional to beaten Horses at an Entrance fee of yen 25; yen 500; weight as per scale. Mile and a quarter.

Mr. Tatsuta's Tatsuta, 145lb. (Riki) 1
Mr. Yodo's Saikio, 137lb. (Ichi) 2
Mr. States' Idaho, 140lb. (Sugiura) 3
Mr. R. Field's Tomboy, 145lb. (Mr. Easton) 4
Time, 2:22½.

Saikio led from the start, followed by Tatsuta and Idaho, Tomboy being altogether out of it. Tatsuta came away between the trees and the straight, and on entering the latter he had a good lead, which he increased with every stride, coming in five or six lengths ahead; three or four lengths between second and third.

PARI MUTUEL, 5 yen—Tomboy 135, Tatsuta 334, Saikio 67, Idaho 23; total 2,795—Tatsuta 8 yen.

6.—THE CHINA SUBSCRIPTION CONSOLATION, a Consolation Race for Subscription China Ponies, non-winners in Japan at date of entry, that have started and not won a race at the Meeting; winner yen 150, second yen; weight as per scale. One Mile. Entrance fee, yen 5.

Mr. G. Campredon's Fleur-de-lis, 147lb. (Mr. Kingdon) 1
Mr. Russia's Chingiz, 147lb. (Horikoshi) 2
Mr. News' Evènement, 147lb. (Mayeda) 3
Mr. R. Field's Terrapin, 147lb. (Mr. Mottu) 4
Mr. Tatsuta's Hayabusa, 150lb. (Riki) 5
Mr. Nemo's Open Door, 150lb. (Ichi) 6
Mr. Hyogo's Iwabuchi, 150lb. (Takahashi) 7
Mr. Hyogo's Hiroshima, 147lb. (Miyagawa) 8
Mr. Guignol's Cascadeur, 150lb. (Mr. Longin) 9
Mr. Starlight's Mats, 153lb. (Katsu) 10
Mr. Tytherleigh's Manifesto, 153lb. (Mr. Pearson) 11
Mr. Wayfoong's Ginko, 150lb. (Yasu) 12
Time, 2:15½.

From the start the field ran in a cluster till the dip, when they began to string out, Chingiz taking the lead. At the trees Fleur-de-lis came away, and on entering the straight had a fair lead. Chingiz tried hard to reach him, but was beaten by a length; bad third. Hiroshima was last.

PARI MUTUEL, 5 yen—Terrapin 62, Hayabusa 24, Open Door 5, Evènement 4, Iwabuchi 1, Hiroshima 7, Chingiz 76, Cascadeur 202, Mats 6, Fleur-de-lis 30, Manifesto 27, Ginko 30; total 2,370 yen—Fleur-de-lis 71 yen.

7.—THE YOUNGSTERS' CONSOLATION, for Subscription Country-breds of Autumn 1898 that have started and not won a race at the Meeting; yen 150; weight 128lb. Half-a-Mile. Entrance fee, yen 5.

Mr. Tatsuta's Sekirew, 128lb. carried 11b. over (Hayashi) 2
Mr. Avis' Chaffinch, 128lb. carried 3lb. over (Goto) 3
Time, 57½.

Chaffinch made the running, with Eclat racing second and Sekirew lying a little behind. At the trees Sekirew worked his way into second place, and was pressing Chaffinch when they entered the straight. Halfway down he got just a head in front, but on the post Eclat rushed past both and won by a neck. Third close up.

PARI MUTUEL, 5 yen—Sekirew 107, Eclat 269, Chaffinch 116; total, 2,469—Eclat 8 yen.

8.—THE SOLACE, a Consolation Race for all China Ponies that have started and not won a race at the Meeting; winner yen 150, second yen 50; weight as per scale. Three-quarters of a Mile. Entrance fee, yen 5.

Mr. States' Oregon, 150lb. (Sugimura) 0
Messrs. Sharp and Elliott's Gadfly, 150lb. (Mr. Elliott) 0

Time, 1 39½.

Mr. News and Mr. Russia declared best to win. Oregon made the running, the rest of the field following in a cluster. They began to thin out just before entering the straight, when Kindar was leading. Half-way down Eclairer rushed ahead, and won by a head only. A fair third.

PARI MUTUEL, 5 yen—Kindar 173. Rond de Cuir 9, Sun-moon 8, Eclairer 59, Evenement 7, Iwabuchi 1, Okayama 89, Magyar 57, Dorak 18, Chingiz 24, Kuigomi 4, Oregon 11, Gadfly 6; total 2,330 yen—Eclairer 36 yen.

9.—THE COUNTRY-BRED CONSOLATION, a Consolation Race for all Country-breds that have have started and not won a race at the Meeting; maidens at date of entry 5lb. allowance; winner yen 150, second yen 50; weight as per scale. Three-quarters of a Mile. Entrance fee, yen 5.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The German Government is sending four torpedo-boats to China to strengthen the squadron in the Far East.

A Malay ran amok at Penang the other day and killed four persons and wounded five. A police corporal stopped his career by shooting him dead.

It was expected that U.S. flagship Olympia would leave Manila on Sunday last, homeward bound. She will be docked at Hongkong and proceed via Suez Canal.

The paragraph published by Japanese newspapers to the effect that His Excellency Baron d'Auchan is about to make a trip to Europe, has no foundation.

M. Doumer, Governor-General of Indo-China, during his visit to Bangkok, had several long interviews with the King of Siam. He was also entertained at a banquet at the Royal Palace, where complimentary speeches were delivered.

Early on Wednesday morning a Japanese, apparently 24 years old, called at the Vantai Exchange, 72 Settlement, Yokohama, and presented a forged cheque for 175 yen 60 sen purporting to be drawn on the Chartered Bank by a guest in the Grand Hotel. He was paid the money and the exchange-shop afterwards found the cheque was false.

Says the China Mail:—The suit commenced in the Original Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, by Cuisanto Lichanco and Gregorio Agoncillo, as attorneys for Emilio Aguinaldo, the leader of the Filipino forces in the Philippines, for the recovery of a sum of $200,000, and interest accrued, deposited with the Bank on 3rd January, 1898, has been settled out of Court, the money having been paid over by the Bank.

On Wednesday the Higo Evening News announced the death of the Rev. H. Rheas, D.D., who has been many years in Kobe as a Baptist Missionary. Dr. Rheas was a native of New Jersey. His death occurred early that morning. He was in the seventy-first year of his age, and leaves to mourn his loss a widow, who has attained the age of 84, and with whom the deepest sympathy will be felt.

A meeting was called for Tuesday evening in connection with the Progressist party in Yokohama, and many Liberal soshi attended. The principal speakers, however, did not attend, and the admittance money was retained. The disappointed soshi were greatly incensed, and attacked Mr. Doi Kosaku, Manager of the Branch Office of the Progressive party, with an iron rail, inflicting wounds on his face. A soshi of the party was also injured. The former is receiving medical treatment in Yokohama Hospital.

At the Court of Alderman, recently, the Lord Mayor nominated Alfred Henry Bevan, Esq., citizen and brewer, to serve the office of Sheriff of the City of London next year. Mr. Bevan is connected with Messrs. Barclay, Perkins, and Company (Limited), the well known brewers of Southwark, of which company he is a director. He will have as colleague Mr. Alderman Treloar, who is popularly known as the Children's Alderman.

Last December a Dr. Esser, who then claimed to have just returned from an extended tour of the German colonies, was granted a long audience by Emperor William, who was greatly interested in his account of his travels and rewarded Esser with a decoration. A number of doubting colonial officers have been investigating and examining Esser, who, it now appears, has been shown to be a rank impostor. It is added that he now admits that he never saw the places he described.

The financial returns of the Colonial Treasurer of Hongkong for 1898 are published. The revenue was $2,918,159, an increase on the 1897 revenue of $231,244, while the expenditure amounted to $2,841,805, an increase of $260,395. The statement of assets and liabilities shows that the assets amount to $1,089,802, of which $915,000 is represented by subsidiary coins on the spot and in transit. The liabilities amount to $876,444, showing a balance of assets over liabilities of $213,358, from which has to be deducted the balance of the 1893 loan $123,334, reducing the net balance to $90,024.

Following were the winners in the shooting matches held at Tsurumi on the 7th May:— 1st Match, Standing Doubles, won by T. Watanabe, 33 points.
2nd Match, Walking Singles, won by S. Suzuki, 18 points.
3rd Match, Standing Doubles, won by S. Tanaka, 12 points.
Best Average Score, T. Watanabe, 57 points, 1st Gold Medal.
Ditto, A. Kingdon, 54 points, 2nd Gold Medal.

The opening ceremony of the newly built Shimbashi Bridge, Tokyo, was held on the 4th in most favourable weather. At 11 o'clock Governor Sengo, Mayor Matsuda, and other officials met, and the Governor, the Mayor, and the chief of the engineering work, read congratulatory addresses. They then viewed the under part of the bridge from a boat and afterwards partook of a foreign style luncheon. The work of construction was begun in March last year, and 62,242 yen was spent. The length of the bridge is over 60 feet, while its breadth is 50 feet, the area covering 200 trudo. It is of iron and paved with stone.

News has arrived from Iloilo indicating that no farther fighting has occurred there. On the M. lo side the people are very friendly; on the Jaro side, the insurgents are strengthening their entrenchments, which means nothing, for as soon as the Americans decide upon an advance the Filipinos will make the customary strategic movement to the rear. At Negros everything is peaceful, Colonel Smith and the officers of the Californian Regiment doing much to spread a friendly feeling amongst the natives. General Miller, accompanied by Mrs. and Miss Miller, have been the guests of the President of the new Republican Government at Bacolod.

The Captain of the P. and O. steamer Bengal, on arrival at Singapore on April 30, reported the disappearance of a Russian naval officer, a Lieutenant Rastopulo, lately of the Russian cruiser Rossia. This unfortunate officer was proceeding to Port Said; thence he intended to take a passage to Odessa. When the Bengal was in the neighbourhood of Round Island, about 600 miles from Singapore, Lieut. Rastopulo, on the evening of April 18th, was seen to fall or more probably to leap overboard. On this becoming known, through the alarm being given, the ship was at once turned round on her course, and a boat was lowered. No sign was, however, seen of the missing man, and after a search the ship resumed her course for Singapore. It is understood that, before leaving Nagasaki, Lieut. Rastopulo had received bad news from Europe, a fact that supports the theory of suicide.

Sunday, says the Kobe Herald, was a great day for the Osaka wheelmen, a meeting having been arranged on the course near the Castle under the auspices of the Garrison. There were fifteen events in all, mainly—we believe—for members of the Osaka Yurin Club. Mr. Fujita, champion of Osaka, and Mr. Yamada, the champion of Osaka, Kioto and Kobe, were in great form, but they were not able to out-distance Mr. W. C. Vaughan, the Yokohama rider, who is now on a visit to this part of the country. Messrs. Mancini and Arthur McGlew also defeated the champion rider of the three cities. That was in the Five Mile Race—10 laps. Several sarts, but the only riders who finished or ran into the last lap were Messrs. Vaughan, Mancini, McGlew and Yamada.

The Yokohama rider defeated the Kobe men without apparent difficulty. In the Championships—two and a half miles—Mr. Vaughan again pedalled in an easy first, but the race was won by Mr. Fujita, the judges having decided that the event was intended for Japanese riders alone, though they allowed Mr. Vaughan to run, just for the purpose of seeing how he compared with the Osaka champion. Mr. Fujita won the race, but the Yokohama man was first at the goal, easily. Mr. Vaughan gave an exhibition of trick riding during the afternoon, which was hugely appreciated. The crowds cheered loudly, and at the close the officers of the Garrison descended from the Grand Stand and congratulated the foreign visitor most heartily. The races commenced at 10.30 and ended at 6.30, after which about 200 hundred cyclists adjourned to the Osaka Hotel and took dinner. It is estimated that there were almost 100,000 people on the ground.

Captain Shimazaki and the officers of the Japanese cruiser Asama, in Plymouth Sound, gave an "At Home" on board that vessel on 20th March. The appearance of the ship was thoroughly characteristic of her nationality. Every point was gay with bunting, while paper flowers of many colours had been freely used in adding to the festive appearance of the ship. At the top of the main gangway, hidden in bunting, the captain and his chief officers welcomed their English guests, while in the rear a smart squad of sailors stood at arms. Apart from the interest which the ship excited, there was an appropriateness in this visit to Plymouth while the flag of Admiral Fremantle is flying from the local flagship. He was in command of the British squadron in Far Eastern waters during the Chino-Japanese war, and was repeatedly complimented on the strict neutrality he maintained. As all the officers of the Asama fought in this campaign, they recognised in Admiral Fremantle an old friend. Singularly enough, this officer's successor on the China station, Admiral Sir Alexander Buller, was also among the guests, and there were many other naval officers who made the "At Home" an excuse for renewing friendships made in the Far East in past years. It was a critical gathering, and naval officers viewed the ship with undisguised interest. She is a formidable fighting machine and compares, for armour and armament, extremely well with vessels of even considerably greater tonnage. The Asama sailed for Japan on 25th March.

Japan must take the bitter with the sweet. The tide of foreign civilization is bound to throw some ugly things upon her shores as well as to carry thither the products of Western intelligence. Apparently she is on the verge of being invaded by the "trust" system of America. The experiment is to be tried in cigars. The American Tobacco Company is said to have combined with the Yezo-ye firm, and the necessary steps of organization will soon be completed. Vernacular newspapers say that two experts from the States are now in Yokohama, and that the office of the Trust will probably be at No. 3 in the Foreign Settlement.

Lieut.-Colonel Yatsushiro, Japanese Military Attaché in St. Petersburg, having been relieved of his duties, has set out from that city en route for Japan, intending to make an extended tour through the Russian empire, visiting the shores of the Black Sea, and proceeding thence via the Caspian through Central Asia. His successor at the Legation in St. Petersburg, Colonel Murata, also intends to reach his post over-land, journeying from Vladivostok through Siberia. There will soon be quite a number of Japanese officers who have made extended tours in Russia's dominions.

NOTES FROM CHINA.

Wang Chih-chun, Provincial Treasurer of Szechuan, through whose efforts the rebellion of Yü Man-tze was recently suppressed, has been decorated by the Empress Dowager with the Yellow Riding Jacket.

H.M. 1st class battleship Renown is coming to China to relieve the Centurion, and the new Rear-Admiral will bring out one of the Canopus class of 1st-class battleships as his flagship.

The Foochow Echo of the 22nd ult. says:—Samsah Bay has been quite a fashionable port of call for men-of-war of all nationalities during the last few years. Last week there were two Japanese cruisers in the harbour.

Some 500 houses in the Chinese City of Tientsin were destroyed by fire on the 27th ult. The reason why such a great destruction of property occurred is said to be a new rule of the Tientsin Taotai, who ordered that each district was to be under the supervision of its own fire brigade, so that when the conflagration took place, none of the neighbouring district fire brigades lent their aids. This is the ancient curse of China—"no b'long my pidjin"—which operated so conspicuously in the Japan-China war.

The Universal Gazette says that the French Consul at Chungking has made nine demands on the Chinese Government by way of reparation for the destruction of Catholic property in Szechuen by Yu Mantzu's hordes. Only five of the demands have been made known which are: the punishment of the inert officials; the execution of Yu Mantzu; the payment of an indemnity; the concession of ground along the banks of the Yangtze from Ichang to Chengtu, and finally a concession to open petroleum wells in that province.

In the course of some remarks on the recent race meeting at Shanghai, the N.-C. Daily News gives these figures as the result of three days' working of the Pari Mutuel:—

1st day	$18,680
2nd "	24,975
3rd "	25,440
Total	$69,095

Upon this the Race Club levied a toll of ten per cent, or nearly $7,000. We believe at Yokohama on the second day over yen 30,000 was staked at the Pari Mutuel.

The Shanghai Derby, in the Spring Race Meeting recently held, resulted in a dead heat, Mr. Crawford on Interrogation finishing level with Mr. M. Jones on Rio Grande in 3m. 14½secs., the distance being one mile and a half. The Ladies' Purse was won by Mr. A. W. Burkhill on Sinbad in 4m. 24½secs.; two miles. The prize took the novel form of a particularly neat miniature racing saddle, made of pig-skin, with silk girths and surcingle, the weight-cloth being of white and red embroidered satin, whilst the pockets were filled with sovereigns instead of lead.

The conservative element at Peking, who have always bitterly opposed the opening of the new Peking University, have, it seems, recently taken the opportunity offered by the question of raising funds for the proposed conservation of the Yellow River to memorialise the Empress Dowager, urging the closing of that institution of learning and the transference of the Tls. 200,000 per annum set aside by the Board of Revenue for its maintenance to the Yellow River works, "thereby," so says the memorial, "devoting useful money towards a useful object." The Empress Dowager—says a Shanghai contemporary—has, so far, issued no rescript in answer to the above memorial.

The North China Daily News is advocating the leasing of one of the Saddle islands by the Municipal Council of Shanghai to be used as a summer retreat, or sanatorium, for residents of the model Settlement who cannot afford the time—and we might add, without fear of offence, the money—to run to Japan or the northern watering places. There is a good deal in the idea, for the Saddles are only 6 hours sea-voyage from Shanghai and have excellent beaches for bathing. Japan, by the way, is earning a bad name these days for high living, extortionate charges, and wholesale fleecing. From Singapore, all along the China coast, up to far northern Newchwang, the cry has gone forth that Japan is no longer the place where the poor, or moderately circumstanced, man can come to spend a short holiday. Hotels, railways, finrikishas, tradesmen, all have raised their rates until living and travelling here have become so expensive that the burden is too great to be borne. There is a good deal of truth in these wailings, and Japan has only herself to blame if the tide of tourists and summer visitors turns from her shores to cheaper places.

The Morning Oregonian of the 28th of March announces the death at Portland, Oregon, on the previous day, of Mr. John Poyntz Munro Fraser. The N.-C. Daily News says many old residents will remember this gentleman in the British Consular service at Shanghai. He was appointed a student interpreter in 1859, and rose by degrees in the rank of 1st-class assistant in 1866, leaving China and the service in 1874. He was a genial companion and one of the pillars of the A.D.C. After leaving China he lived for a number of years in California, where he published a voluminous history of Solano County, Cal. Then he moved to Oregon and wrote a large history of Benton and some other Oregon counties. In 1890 he went into business in New York, but returned to Oregon a year ago too ill to undertake any work, though he was able to be at church only the day before his death from apoplexy. He has left a widow, but no children. He was a man of great ability and good education, but he unfortunately threw away his chances in China, to the great regret of his numerous friends. He was about sixty years old when he died.

The N.-C. Daily News of May 4 gives the following account of the sinking of a pilot boat by the N.Y.K. Saikio Maru on the previous day:—

The pilot-boat No. 2, partly owned by Mr. J. D. C. Arthur, licensed pilot, was run into and sunk at ten minutes to one, yesterday morning, whilst at anchor inside the Bell Buoy (entrance to the South Channel). Capt. Young, of the Japanese mail steamer Saikio Maru from Japan, desiring a pilot, was proceeding cautiously towards the boat, which at the time was carrying the Company's private signal lights, and was keeping the same heaving a point or more on his starboard bow. The night, although calm and clear, was very dark and colourless, the horizon being without definition, thus making an accurate estimation of distance impossible. The Tongsba light-vessel was bearing W. by S. mag., and the Saikio Maru was, when making for the pilot-boat, steering a W.N.W. course, her commander calculating that the tide was running west and that the boat was over a quarter of a mile distant and would be riding nearly end on to his course, whereas she was lying right athwart, the tide setting S.W. at the rate of from 3 to 4 knots. The chief officer, who was right forward on the forecastle head, was the first to notice the danger and immediately drew Capt. Young's attention to it; the engines were instantly stopped and a minute afterwards the helm was put hard to starboard and the engines at full speed astern, but too late—the bow of the steamer crashed into the starboard quarter of the pilot-boat. The pilot by this time was alongside in his dingy, totally unaware of the peril in his craft. Capt. Young, realising the gravity of the situation, had the engines set slow ahead, thus keeping his stern in the breach made, until the crew, who had been employed heaving up their anchor, were rescued. As the cry "Man overboard" was given life-buoys were immediately thrown and the starboard life boat manned and partly lowered, when the pilot alongside called out that he had picked the individual up. Learning that all were safely on board the Captain then proceeded on his course, as nothing could be done for the pilot-boat, she being full of water and on the verge of sinking. Capt. Young, who is a very popular commander and well known in the East and the Australian colonies, is one of the N.Y.K.'s oldest servants, and has never previously had an accident.

NEW LAWS OF JAPAN.

(TRANSLATED IN H.B.M. LEGATION.)

LAW No. 68.

LAW FOR RENDERING ASSISTANCE IN CONNECTION WITH THE ARREST AND DETENTION OF MEMBERS OF CREWS OF FOREIGN VESSELS OF WAR AND MERCHANT VESSELS.

Art. I.—Assistance to be given in pursuance of Commercial Treaties or Consular Conventions with Treaty Powers in connexion with the arrest and detention of members of crews of foreign vessels of war and merchant vessels shall be rendered by a Public Procurator at the request of the consular officer concerned.

Art. II.—A Public Procurator may not comply with a request for assistance in connexion with arrest or detention in the following cases.

1. When the person to be arrested or detained is a subject of the Empire.
2. When the person to be arrested or detained is under prosecution or undergoing punishment for an offence punishable as a crime or misdemeanour in the Empire.
3. When a further request is made in connexion with the same affair against a member of the crew of a vessel of war or a merchant vessel, who has already been set at liberty in accordance with Art. VII.
4. When the consular officer has not accompanied his written request for assistance by a proper extract of the vessel's register and of the articles of the vessel of war or merchant vessel, or other official document sufficient to prove that the person is a member of the crew.
5. When the consular officer has not guaranteed the payment of expenses in connexion with the assistance to be rendered.

Art. III.—When a Public Procurator recognizes that a request made by a consular official for assistance in connexion with arrest or detention is proper, he shall immediately take the necessary steps.

Art. IV.—When a Public Procurator has to order the arrest of a member of the crew of a vessel of war or a merchant vessel, he shall issue a warrant of arrest.

Art. V.—When the person who has received an order to execute a warrant of arrest has arrested the person indicated by it, he shall deliver him to the Public Procurator who issued the warrant.

Art. VI.—In the case mentioned in the preceding Article the Public Procurator shall immediately examine the person, and when he recognizes that there is no doubt of his identity, he shall hand him over to the Consular officer concerned.

Art. VII.—When the Consular Officer requests that the member of the crew of the vessel of war or merchant vessel who has been arrested be kept in detention, the Public Procurator shall cause him to be detained in a prison.

Art. VIII.—When the Consular Officer requests that a member of the crew of a vessel of war or a merchant vessel, who is under detention, may be set at liberty, or when he does not, within six months from the date of arrest, make a request for him to be handed over, he shall be set at liberty.

Art. IX.—The provisions regarding warrants of detention in the Code of Criminal Procedure shall be observed as far as practicable in connexion with the issue and execution of warrants of arrest.

Art. X.—The Public Procurator shall make a request to the Consular Officer concerned for the actual amount of the expenses incurred in connexion with the assistance rendered.

Art. XI.—When a Public Procurator has received a request from a Consular Officer for assistance in connexion with arrest or detention, he shall at once report to the Minister of Justice. When he recognizes that the case is not one in which assistance ought to be rendered, and when the steps taken for rendering assistance have been completed, he shall similarly report.

LAW No. 95.

LAW FOR RENDERING ASSISTANCE IN CASES OF SHIPPING DISASTER.*

CHAPTER I.—VESSELS MEETING WITH SHIPWRECK OR OTHER CASUALTY.†

Art. I.—The work of rendering assistance to vessels meeting with shipwreck or other casualty shall be performed by the mayor of a city, town, or village who is first cognizant of the matter.

Art. II.—A person who discovers that a vessel has been wrecked or has met with any other casualty shall, without delay, report the fact to the mayor or to the police officials of the nearest city, town, or village.

When police officials receive the information, they shall notify the mayor of a city, town, or village.

Art. III.—When a mayor of a city, town, or village becomes aware of the fact that a vessel has been wrecked or has met with any other casualty, he shall at once proceed to the spot, and take the steps necessary for rendering assistance.

Art. IV.—Police officials shall aid the mayor of a city, town, or village, in the work of rendering assistance, and when there is no mayor of a city, town, or village, on the spot, shall discharge the duties in his stead.

Art. V.—Assistance shall not be rendered against the wish of the master of the vessel.

The provisions of the preceding clause shall not apply in cases where the mayor of a city, town, or village, is of opinion that the means employed by the master of the vessel for preserving human life are insufficient, or in cases where he is of opinion that the master is acting in bad faith.

Art. VI.—The mayor of a city, town, or village, may summon persons to render assistance, may requisition vessels, vehicles, horses, or other things, and may make use of land belonging to other persons.

Persons summoned in accordance with the provisions of the preceding clause shall engage in the work of rendering assistance under the instructions of the mayor of a city, town, or village.

Art. VII.—The mayor of a city, town, or village, may, on the occasion of assistance being rendered, cause persons whose presence he considers to be unnecessary, persons who have caused obstruction, and persons who have been guilty of wrong conduct, to withdraw.

The mayor of a city, town, or village, may, on the occasion of assistance being rendered, restrain the persons of those who have been guilty of violent conduct.

When the mayor of a city, town, or village, takes the steps mentioned in the preceding clause, persons who have been ordered to help may not refuse to do so.

Art. VIII.—When, on the occasion of assistance being rendered, the mayor of a city, town, or village, is of opinion that there are persons who have concealed things belonging to the wreck, he may search for and seize them.

Article IX.—The mayor of a city, town, or village, shall take charge of shipwrecked vessels and of salvaged goods as well as of things seized in accordance with the provision of the preceding clause.

When there is postal matter among the things mentioned in the preceding clause, the Mayor of a city, town, or village, shall deliver it, without delay, to the nearest post office.

Art. X.—After a wreck or other casualty has occurred, the master of the vessel in question shall draw up, without delay, a report of the circumstances, and shall transmit it to the mayor of a city, town, or village. This rule shall, however, not apply in the case of the wreck of or other casualty occurring to vessels for which it is not necessary to apply for a

† The term Sō-nan, covers shipping casualties of all kinds including shipwreck.

Certificate of Registry, or to vessels which navigate only inland waters, or harbours, or bays.

The mayor of a city, town, or village, shall investigate the facts set forth in the report, and when he is of opinion that it is correct, shall grant a certificate to that effect on the application of the master of the vessel.

The mayor of a city, town, or village, may, in order to investigate the facts set forth in the report, order the production of the ship's papers, and may also summon members of the crew, passengers, and other persons, who were on board the vessel, and interrogate them.

Art. XI.—The mayor of a city, town, or village, shall, when he is of opinion that salvaged goods come under any one of the following headings, dispose of them by public sale and take charge of the proceeds.

1. Things which cannot keep for a long time or things in regard to which it is clearly to be apprehended that their value will deteriorate.
2. Explosives, things of an inflammable nature, or other things in regard to which it is apprehended that taking charge of them will be attended with danger.
3. When the expense of taking charge of the things exceeds, or is out of proportion to, their value.

In cases where it is proposed to conduct a public auction in accordance with the provisions of the preceding clause, when the master of the vessel is on the spot, the mayor of a city, town, or village, shall determine a time and give notice to him that if within that time he does not apply for the delivery of the things, furnishing such security as the mayor considers to be proper, they will be disposed of by public sale.

When the place where the shipwrecked vessel is her port of registry, the notice mentioned in the preceding clause shall be given to the owner of the vessel.

When the master or the owner of the vessel has made application for delivery of the goods in accordance with the provisions of the second clause of this Article, a public sale shall not take place.

Art. XII.—Persons who have taken part in rendering assistance may receive from the mayor of a city, town, or village, payment of expenses incurred by them in so doing.

The provisions of the preceding clause shall not apply to the following persons:—

1. The owner of the vessel to which the assistance has been rendered, or the crew of that vessel.
2. Persons who have caused the casualty purposely, through negligence, or by their own fault.
3. Persons who in rendering assistance have violated the provisions of Article V.
4. Persons who have, on the occasion of assistance being rendered, caused obstruction or have been guilty of wrong conduct.
5. Persons who have carried away or refused to deliver up things belonging to a wreck.

Art. XIII.—The following shall be considered expenses in connexion with rendering assistance.

1. Compensation for the labour of persons who have been concerned in rendering assistance.
2. Compensation for the use of land, or for the requisition of things, in accordance with the provisions of Article VI.
3. Expenses necessary for transporting salvaged goods or for taking charge of or disposing of them by public auction.

Art. XIV.—Persons wishing to receive payment of their expenses in connexion with rendering assistance shall state the amount within the time appointed by the mayor of a city, town, or village.

Persons who do not take the steps mentioned in the preceding clause shall not receive payment of their expenses in connexion with rendering assistance.

Art. XV.—The mayor of a city, town, or village, shall determine the amount of the expenses in connexion with rendering assistance in accordance with the provisions of Instructions. The mayor of a city, town, or village shall inform the master of a vessel of the amount of the expenses in connection with rendering assistance, and shall cause him to pay it within a period which the mayor of a city, town, or village, shall determine.

When the place where a vessel has met with shipwreck or other casualty is her port of registry, or when there is no master of the vessel, the notice mentioned in the preceding clause shall be given to the owner of the vessel.

Art. XVI.—The master or owner of a vessel shall, on payment of the expenses in connection with rendering assistance, obtain delivery of the money and other things in the charge of the mayor of a city, town, or village.

When the master or owner of a vessel furnishes security which the mayor of a city, town, or village, considers proper, he may take delivery of the whole or part of the money and other things mentioned in the preceding clause.

He may receive delivery of the following things notwithstanding the provisions of the two preceding clauses.

1. The property of the crew.

2. The provisions of the crew and passengers.

3. The hand-baggage of the passengers carried by them on board the ship without payment of freight.

4. The things specified in clause 2 of Article XVII.

When it is proposed to sell, mortgage, or pledge a vessel or cargo in the charge of the mayor of a city, town, or village, his consent shall be obtained. Under these circumstances when the mayor of a city, town, or village, considers it necessary, he shall be present on the occasion.

Money or other things acquired by taking the steps mentioned in the preceding clause shall be taken charge of by the mayor of a city, town, or village.

In cases where the mayor of a city, town, or village, takes charge of money in accordance with the provisions of Article XI, and of the preceding clause, he shall, when that money has reached the amount of the expenses in connection with rendering assistance, at once pay those expenses with it and shall hand over the balance, together with the other things in his charge, to the master or owner of the vessel.

Art. XVII.—When the master or owner of a vessel does not pay the expenses in connection with rendering assistance within the time determined by the mayor of a city, town, or village, the latter shall dispose by public sale of the things in his charge, or the things furnished as security, and shall take charge of the proceeds.

The provisions of the preceding clause shall not apply in the case of things which the mayor of a city, town, or village, is of opinion should be disposed of by public sale not realize enough to meet the expenses of the sale.

Art. XVIII.—The mayor of a city, town, or village, shall defray the expenses in connection with rendering assistance with the sum which he has received in payment, or with the money in his charge.

Art. XIX.—When assistance is of no avail, the expenses shall be paid out of the Treasury.

In cases where the master or owner of a vessel does not pay the expenses in connection with rendering assistance, when, after the procedure laid down in Article XVII, has been followed, there is not sufficient to pay those expenses with the money in the charge of the mayor of a city, town, or village, it shall be supplemented by payment out of the Treasury, and when there is a balance, it shall be returned to the master or owner of the vessel.

Art. XX.—The provisions of this Chapter shall also apply to persons who have engaged in rendering assistance without waiting for the summons of the mayor of a city, town, or village. When, however, the mayor of a city, town, or village, does not take part in rendering assistance, this rule shall not apply.

Art. XXI.—The provisions of this Chapter relating to the master of a vessel, shall apply also to a person who takes the place of the master and performs his duties.

Art. XXII.—The provisions of Arts. I. to IV. inclusive, clause 1 of Art. V., Arts. VI. to IX. inclusive, Arts. XII. to XIV. inclusive, clauses 1 and 2 of Art. XV., Art. XVIII., clause 1 of Art. XIX., Art. XX., and Art. XXI., apply mutatis mutandis to men-of-war and other vessels of the Navy, or other officially owned vessels.

Art. XXIII.—The provisions of this Chapter shall not apply in cases where some special provision is made in the Treaties.

CHAPTER II.—FLOTSAM AND JETSAM AND SUBMERGED GOODS.

Art. XXIV.—A person who finds flotsam and jetsam or submerged goods shall deliver them without delay to the mayor of a city, town, or village. In cases, however, where the owner of such things is known, he may deliver them direct to the owner provided that this is done within three days from the day on which they were found.

Under the circumstances mentioned in the proviso attached to the preceding clause, the finder may in the case of flotsam and jetsam receive compensation from the owner to the amount of one-tenth of the value of the things, and in the case of submerged goods to the amount of one-third of their value.

Art. XXV.—The mayor of a city, town, or village, shall take charge of the things he has received delivery of.

The mayor of a city, town, or village, shall give public notice that the things mentioned in the preceding clause will be delivered to the owner. When, however, the owner is known, he shall at once communicate to the owner the facts that are to be publicly notified. Under these circumstances he need not give public notice.

Art. XXVI.—The provisions of clause 1, Article XI., shall apply to flotsam and jetsam and submerged goods.

Art. XXVII.—The owner may take delivery of the things within one year from the day on which the mayor of the city, town, or village, has given the public notice or made the communication mentioned in Art. XXV., on payment to the mayor of a city, town, or village, in the case of flotsam and jetsam of a sum of money equal to one-tenth of the value of the things, and in the case of submerged goods, of a sum of money equal to one-third of the value of the goods, together with the expenses that have been necessary for giving public notice, taking charge of the goods, public sale, or appraisal.

Under the circumstances mentioned in the preceding clause, the mayor of a city, town, or village, shall pay to the finder a sum of money equal, in the case of flotsam and jetsam, to one-tenth of the value of the goods and, in the case of submerged goods, to one-third of the value of the goods.

The value of the goods shall be determined by the mayor of a city, town or village. He may, however, cause an expert to appraise them.

Art. XXVIII.—When the owner does not apply for delivery of the things within the time specified in the preceding Article, or when he has expressed his intention not to apply for delivery of them, the mayor of a city, town, or village, shall determine a time, and inform the finder that he is to take delivery of the things within that time.

The finder shall acquire the right of ownership of the things by paying to the mayor of a city, town, or village, within the time specified in the preceding clause, the expenses which have been necessary for giving public notice, taking charge of the goods, public sale, or appraisal.

When the finder does not take delivery of the things within the time specified in the preceding clause, the mayor of a city, town, or village, shall dispose of the things by public sale and shall deduct from the proceeds the expenses specified in the preceding clause. Under these circumstances, when there is any balance over, it shall be appropriated by the Treasury, and when there is a deficit, it shall be supplemented from the Treasury.

Art. XXIX.—In cases where police officials have removed flotsam and jetsam or submerged goods which they consider to interfere with navigation routes, anchorages, or buildings, they shall deliver these things to the mayor of a city, town, or village.

The provisions of Clause 1 of Article XI., and Clause 2 of Article XXV., shall apply in the case of things which the mayor of a city, town, or village, has taken delivery of in accordance with the preceding clause.

Art. XXX.—When the owner has applied for delivery of the things within one year from the day when public notice has been given, or a communication made to him in accordance with the preceding Article, the mayor of a city, town, or village, shall deliver the things to him, causing him to pay the expenses that have been necessary for removing them, taking charge of them, and for public notice.

When no one applies for delivery of the things within the time specified in the preceding clause, the mayor of a city, town, or village, shall dispose of them by public sale and with the proceeds pay the expenses which have been necessary for removing them, taking charge of them, for public notice, and for public sale. Under these circumstances, when there is any balance over, it shall be appropriated by the Treasury, and when there is a deficit, it shall be supplemented from the Treasury.

CHAPTER III.—PENAL CLAUSES.

Art. XXXI.—In cases where assistance is rendered to a shipwrecked vessel, persons coming under any of the following headings shall be punished by a fine of not more than 50 yen.

1. Persons who, without just cause, do not comply with the summons of the mayor of a city, town, or village, or who refuse to allow their things to be requisitioned or their land to be used.

2. Persons who have violated the provisions of Clause 2 of Art. VI.

3. Persons who have violated the provisions of Clause 3 of Art. VII.

Art. XXXII.—Persons who have caused obstruction in cases where assistance has been rendered to a shipwrecked vessel, shall be punished by major confinement for not less than one month and not more than six months, with the addition of a fine of not more than 20 yen.

Art. XXXIII.—Persons who have neglected to take the steps specified in Clause 1, Art. X. shall be punished by a fine of not less than five and not more than fifty yen.

Art. XXXIV.—Persons who have obtained by fraud a certificate of the correctness of a report on a shipwreck or other casualty shall be punished by major confinement for not less than eleven days and not more than six months, or a fine of not less than 30 and not more than 300 yen.

Art. XXXV.—The provisions of Articles 385 and 387 of the Penal Code shall apply also to submerged goods.

SUPPLEMENTARY CLAUSES

Art. XXXVI.—The date of the operation of this Law shall be determined by Imperial Ordinance.

Art. XXXVII.—The memorandum of the 29 Feb. 1870 (Regulations respecting unopened ports,—the rendering of assistance to shipwrecked vessels), the Instructions (Entitled Steps to be taken on the occasion of foreign vessels drifting ashore) issued in April, 1871, Notification No. 66 of 1875, and Notification No. 55 of 1877, shall be abolished from the day on which this Law goes into operation.

Art. XXXVIII.—With regard to cases which at the time when this law goes into operation are being dealt with under Notification No. 66 of 1875, the provisions of that Notification shall continue to apply to them until the action taken has been completed.

Art. XXXIX.—The work of the mayor of a city, town, or village, specified in this Law, shall be performed in Tokyo City, Kyoto City, and Osaka City, by the district Mayor (Kacho) and in places where the Law of Organization of Cities, Towns, and Villages, is not in operation, by the Kacho or corresponding official.

THE JAPANESE INVASION OF KOREA IN 1592.

By HOMER B. HOLBERT, A.M.

CHAPTER V.—(CONCLUDED.)

The Japanese were now settled in P'yŏng-yang, and as they were destined to remain there some time it may be well for us to leave them there and follow the fortunes of Kato, who, as we will remember, had branched off eastward into Hamgyŏng Province after casting lots. Kato pushed on rapidly across the country towards Wun-san, but as he was not on one of the main thoroughfares of the country he found it difficult to keep to the road; so he captured a Korean and forced him to act as guide. Arriving at the town of Kok-san, in the eastern part of Whang-ha Province, they crossed the mountains by the No-ri-hyun Pass and pushed on until they struck the Soul-Wun-san road not far from the latter place.

Gen. Han Guk-sŏng was in charge of the government forces in Hamgyŏng Province. He advanced immediately to engage the Japanese, and a fierce fight took place at the government storehouses at Ha-joung. At first the Japanese had decidedly the worst of it but at last they retired to the shelter of the granaries and barricaded themselves behind bags of rice, from which position they poured a destructive fire among the Korean troops, who were drawn up four deep and therefore suffered the more severely. Not being able to dislodge the enemy, the Koreans decided to withdraw and fortify the passes both in front and behind the Japanese, supposing that in this way they would be entrapped.

The Japanese knew of this and when night came they knew they must make a bold strike for liberty. So they scaled the mountains in the darkness and succeeded in completely surrounding the defenders of one of the passes. When morning came there was a heavy fog, and the Koreans were utterly unsuspecting of danger. Suddenly the surrounding party of Japanese opened fire on them and it took but a few moments to have them on the run. It came on to rain and the roads were heavy with mud, and the Koreans, who were entirely unused to such prolonged strain, fell exhausted along the way and were butchered by the pursuing enemy. General Han made his escape to Kyŏng-sung, but was there captured by the Japanese. The governor of the province, to the disgust of the people, fled and hid among the hills, but the populace arose and dragged him out and forced him to resume his duties. General Yi Hon also fled northward toward Kapsan, and the people consequently seized him and took off his head. It was hard work for generals in that province, for they had the Japanese on the one hand and the people on the other. The people of the north are made of sterner stuff than those of the south, and the punishment they meted out to these cravens is a good indication of their quality.

While these events were transpiring, two princes who had taken refuge in this province fled northward and stopped not till they reached the border town of Hŏn-yung on the Turman River. As it proved this was the worst thing they could have done, for the ajun, or constable, of that district was either in the pay of the Japanese or was so terrified by their approach that he was willing to go to any extreme to gain their favour. So he seized the two young princes and carried them to the Japanese camp. The latter received them gladly, unbound them, placed them in their midst, and carried them wherever they went. They were a prize worth watching. To the traitor, Kuk Kyung-in, who had betrayed the two princes, they gave a position equivalent to the governorship of the province, and he was formally installed in that office. But justice soon overtook him. A loyal general, Chong Mun-bŏn, in the northern part of the province, arranged a plan to effect the capture of the traitor. But in some way the news got out and the pseudo-governor sent and seized General Chong, intending to take his head off the next morning; but during the night another loyal man, named Sin Se-jun, gathered a band of men, armed them as best he could, and addressed them thus:—"Our district has become disloyal through the treachery of this villain. If we do not hasten to make it right we will all have to suffer for it in the end. If you do not agree with me take your words and strike me down." They answered as one man, "We will listen to you and obey you." They immediately sallied out, broke into the governor's house, and beat him to death. The Japanese knew that it was General Chong who had originated the plot and they searched for him everywhere, but he hid in private houses in different places and so they failed to apprehend him.

Chi Dal-wun of Kyŏng-sung gathered a band of men and tried to make head against the Japanese, but not being a soldier he could make but little impression; so General Chŏng was hunted up and put in command. There were only two hundred soldiers in all, but soon they were joined by the prefects of Chŏng-sung and Kyŏng-wun and their contingents, and the little army made its headquarters at Kyŏng-sung.

As the Japanese were overrunning the country many events of interest transpired, many episodes that history will probably never record, scenes of cruelty and rapine that are perhaps better left undiscovered; but a few of the more important of these events are necessary to a correct understanding of the way in which the Koreans met their fate at the hands of the invaders.

When the Koreans fled from Soul a high official by the name of Yi Jong-am fled to the walled town of Yun-an in Whangha Province. Its prefect had fled, and when a Japanese force of 3000 men under Nagamasa approached, the people besought this official to take charge of the defence of the town. He consented and made proclamation:—"The Japanese are all about us and we are in jeopardy of our lives. All that wish to live must now run away and the rest of us will remain and die together." To this they replied with one voice, "How can we let our leader die alone?" The next day the Japanese arrived and invested the town, but on attempting to storm it they were met by buckets of boiling water thrown down on their heads. They drew off, but renewed the attack at night. This time they were met by piles of burning straw, which again drove them back. Again they came on, this time with broad planks over their heads to protect them from the novel weapons of the Koreans, but these were not proof against the huge stones which the defenders threw down upon them. The fight lasted three days, and finally the Japanese withdrew after burning their dead.

In the seventh moon the King moved northward to Kŭi-ju.

But we must turn again to the south to witness another loyal attempt to stem the tide of invasion. In the province of Chul-la there were men who longed to take up arms in defence of their homes, but all the regular troops had been drafted away northward and nothing could be done on regular lines. So Ko Gyong-myung and Kim Ch'un-il of that province and Kwak Ja-ni and Chong In-hong of Kyung-sang Province held a conference to devise ways and means for prosecuting a guerilla campaign. These men had all been connected with the army at some previous time and were not utterly lacking in knowledge of military affairs. Kwak Ja-ni was in the prime of life and was appointed leader. Gathering the people of the countryside to a great conclave, he addressed them thus:—"This whole country is being overrun by the Japanese, and soon we will become their prey. Among our young men there must be many hundreds who are able to bear arms. If we take our stand at Chong-jin, on the river, we shall be able to prevent the Japanese from crossing, and they will thus be held in check." This brave leader then turned his whole patrimony into ready money and spent it in equipping his little army, which amounted to 5000 men.

A Japanese General An Guk-sa attempted to enter this portion of the province, but was met all along the line of the river by a determined soldiery, and was not able to effect a crossing. The Korean leader Kwak has become famous in Korean story for his valiant deeds. He is said to have worn a fiery red cloak and he was dubbed Hong-ei Ta-jang or "General of the Red Robe." His particular skill lay in rapid changes of base, and he appeared now at one point and now at another with such bewildering rapidity that he earned the reputation of being able to transport himself by magic to incredible distances in a moment of time. These reports he did not contradict. The Japanese came to dread his approach, and the report that he was near or a glimpse of the flaring red robe was enough to send them scurrying off. From his central camp he sent out spies in all directions who kept him informed of every move of the enemy, and whenever the Japanese encamped the Koreans gathered on the surrounding hills at night, each carrying a framework that supported five torches, and so the Japanese supposed they were surrounded by great numbers of Koreans and anxiety kept them always awake. The best of the Korean soldiers were detailed to watch mountain passes and defiles and look for opportunities to cut off small bodies of the enemy's forces. Traps of various kinds were set into which they occasionally fell, and they were so harassed and worried that at last they were compelled to withdraw entirely from the three districts of En-ryung, Sam-ga, and Hyop ch'un, and quiet was restored.

But this useful man's career was cut short in a manner similar to that in which General Yi Gak had been. We will remember, after the Japanese had taken Tong-na and were sweeping northward, that Kim-Su, the governor of Kyung-sang Province, not daring to meet them, turned to the west and fled from their path. It was just about this time that the "General of the Red Robe" was having his victories over the Japanese that had pressed westward after the fall of Tong-na. When this successful leader heard of the craven flight of Governor Kim Su he was filled with scorn and with righteous indignation. He considered the cowardly governor to be worse than the Japanese themselves. He sent the governor a message naming seven valid reasons why he deserved execution. Kim-Su replied "As for you, you are a robber yourself," and he also sent a letter to the King charging General Kwak with disloyalty. At the same time General Kwak set a letter to the King saying "Governor Kim ran away from his post of duty, and when I upbraided him for it he called me a robber. I have killed many of the 'rats,' but as I have been called a robber I herewith lay down my arms and retire." Despatching this letter to the King, General Kwak dismissed all his followers and retired to a hermitage of Pip'a Mountain in Kyung-sang Province and "lived upon pine leaves for food". So the records say. Thereafter, though offered the governorship of Hamgyŏng or Chul-la provinces, he refused to come out of his retreat. He changed his name to Mang U-dang, or "House of Lost Passions", and he thus acquired great sanctity. Here is another instance in which the King lost an able leader through mere wanton caprice. Wounded pride made the famous leader forget country, king, kindred, honour—all.

Another attempt was made by Ko Gyong-myung, a native of Chang-hŏng in Chul-la Province. Hearing that the King had fled to P'yŏng-yang he, together with Yu P'ang-no, gathered a large force at Tam-yang. Sending letters all over the province he succeeded in getting together 6000 men and made the central camp at Yun-san. The King, being informed of this, sent a gracious letter giving his sanction and urging the faithful men to do all in their power for the people and the country. General Kwak Nung was also sent from the north to cooperate with this army in their loyal attempts.

Hearing that the Japanese had arrived at Komsan the Korean forces advanced against them, but, for some reason not stated, when they appeared before the town their number had dwindled to eight hundred. Whether the rest had run away or whether a small detachment was sufficient is not known, but at any rate a blunder had been committed and when the Japanese saw the smallness of the attacking party they sallied out and soon scattered the Korean forces under General Kwak Nyung. The other troops, seeing this, also took to their heels, but General Ko would not run away, though urged to do so by his lieutenants. He told them to make good their escape, but that he would remain and meet his fate. So they all stood and fought it out to the bitter end and fell side by side. General Ko's son, learning of his father's death, burned for revenge and so he collected a band of soldiers in the south, which he named "The Band that Seeks Revenge."

A more successful attempt was made by Chong In-hong of Hyun-p'ung in Kyung-sang Province. He was joined by Kim Myon, Pak Song, Kwak Jin, Kwak Li, and Son In-gap. These men organized a force and drove the Japanese out of Mungye and burned their supplies. Hearing that the enemy had fled toward Chŏng-ye and knowing that a river intervened, they gave chase. The Japanese came to the river, but could find no boats to cross. They spent so much time looking for a ford that when at last they found one and were starting to cross the pursuers came up. The ford was a bad one, the bottom being composed of soft sand, something in the nature of a quicksand. Soon the horses and men were floundering about in mid-stream. Chong and his men, who knew the ford, rushed down upon them while so entangled and cut them down by hundreds. Those that escaped fled towards Song-ju, but one of Chong's lieutenants took a thousand men and gave chase. Pressed beyond endurance the Japanese turned and came on to fight. One huge fellow on a magnificent charger came dashing out ahead of the rest, brandishing his sword and yelling at the top of his voice. A hideous gilt mask added to the picturesqueness of his appearance, but it did not frighten the pursuers. Their leader aimed at the horse's legs and soon he came crashing to the ground, where he was speedily despatched. The other Japanese thereupon turned and resumed their flight. Japanese troops who were in force in Song-ju and Kuryung came out to intercept the pursuers, but Chong and his men formed an ambush and, springing suddenly upon the Japanese, threw them into confusion and chased them as far as Pyol Pass. In this fight the Japanese threw away their baggage, weapons, and all superfluous clothing. Chong and his men chased them six miles and then turned back.

The last adventure of this nature which we shall mention is that of Kim Ch'un-il, a man of Na-jin in Chul-la Province. Hearing of the King's flight he sat down and wept, but, suddenly springing up, he exclaimed "I might far better be trying to aid my sovereign than sit here bemoaning his misfortune." In company with his friends Song Je-min and Yang San-do he got together a goodly band of men whose avowed purpose was the succour of the King. Before commencing operations the leader slaughtered horses and oxen and made each man taste the blood and take an oath of allegiance to the cause in which they were embarked. Kim addressed them in these words, "Of course this means death to us all. We cannot expect to come out of it alive. We can only go forward. There must be no retreat. If any one of you desires life more than the accomplishment of the work in which we are engaged let him turn back now." They fortified Tok-san in Ch'un-ch'ung Province. Koreans who had sold themselves to the Japanese as spies came to this camp to gain information, but were apprehended and put to death. The Japanese camp was at Keum-yong not far away. One moonless night Kim, by a forced march, came and surrounded this camp, and at a given signal his forces descended like an avalanche upon the unsuspecting enemy. Those that escaped the edge of the sword found safety in flight. In the seventh moon, this force, consisting of several thousand men, crossed the Han River below Yang-wha-do, intending to go and join the King, but, instead of doing so, they entered the island of Kang-wha and fortified it. When the King heard of these deeds of Kim Ch'un-il, he was highly pleased and gave him the title of "Defender against Invaders."

These incidents of Korean successes against the Japanese cannot be taken as typical cases, for as a rule the Japanese went where they wished and did what they wished, but they are inserted here more to show that it was no craven submission on the part of the Koreans, that there were strong, brave, and faithful men who were willing to cast their fortunes and lives into the scales and strike as hard blows as they knew how for their homes and for their King. It was of course a guerilla warfare and it was only small detachments of the main army of the Japanese that they could successfully withstand, but the utter pusillanimity of the Koreans as sometimes depicted is not a true picture of them. Their worst fault was that they were unprepared for war. This, together with the strife of parties, was the reason why the Japanese for a time worked their will upon the peninsula.

Saigon, May 10.

The President of the Council, M. Dupuy, questioned in the Chamber, affirmed that the resignation of the Minister of War, M. de Freycinet, had been due uniquely to the incidents which occurred during the session of last Friday. He moved that the Chamber proceed to the Order of the Day, pure and simple, and obtained a vote of 444 against 67.

RAILWAYS FOR MADAGASCAR.

Saigon, May 11.

General Gallieni, Governor of Madagascar, is going to France to negotiate a loan of 60 millions of francs for railway building in that Colony.

THE DREYFUS JUDGMENT.

On Monday, 29th of May, the Court of Cassation will commence the public hearing of the revision of the Dreyfus case. The arguments will probably extend over four sittings, and judgment will be delivered on the following Friday or Saturday.

(FROM THE "JAPAN TIMES.")

THE TRANSVAAL EMBROGLIO.

London, May 6.

It is believed that the question of the dynamite monopoly in the Transvaal has become acute, Mr. Chamberlain viewing it as a breach of the Convention.

A petition, purporting to be signed by 9,000 Uitlanders, has been presented to President Kruger, denying the grievances recited in the British petition.

London, May 8.

Various reports are circulated, tending to indicate that the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, Secretary of State for the Colonies, has resolved upon a strong attitude toward the Transvaal.

London, May 9.

The Chronicle learns that, although containing no ultimatum or any threat thereof, Mr. Chamberlain's despatches are uncompromising in tone and temper, and there is a distinct indication that the Government intends to compel a settlement, even taking some risk of a war.

The Morning Post's correspondent at Johannesburg states that the general opinion there is that a crisis is impending; that the families of some prominent men are preparing to quit; and that all Boers are warned to be ready for emergencies.

COLONIAL BISHOP COMMITTED FOR TRIAL.

CHARGED WITH CRIMINAL LIBEL.

London, May 10.

Bishop Tugwell was committed for trial and bailed, at Lagos, being charged with a criminal libel of Europeans on the West Coast of Africa, for writing to the Times that 75 per cent. thereof died of drink.

BRITISH PATRONAGE OF AMERICAN CONTRACTORS.

London, May 11.

Lord G. Hamilton, Secretary of State for India, speaking in the House of Commons, fully explained the circumstances under which a Philadelphia firm had secured the contract to build the Goktiel Viaduct, and regretted that this was not the first contract where marked difference existed between American and British tenders.

THE FAR EAST.

BRITISH AND RUSSIAN SPHERES OF INFLUENCE.

Mr. St. John Brodrick, Under Secretary of Foreign Affairs, speaking on the subject of the Yangtze basin, defined it as comprising provinces adjoining the Yangtze river, and Honan and Chekiang; but he was unable to state the exact claims of Russia in Manchuria.

OPEN DOOR FOR THE SOUDAN.

Sirdar Kitchener notifies that he will open the Soudan in September to traders and settlers without any distinction and admit foreign goods free of duty.

CRISIS IN THE ENGLISH CHURCH.

The Government has given notice of an amendment to the private bill for enforcing Church discipline, announcing that, if the present efforts of the Episcopacy to secure obedience of the clergy prove ineffectual, some further legislation will be required.

2—Kt to B 6 mate

Correct solutions received from East Anglia, W.D.C., and "Veritas."

oid and Villa were caught in the trap set with K to R 2. The reply to K to R 2 is Kt to K 3. For Kt to Q 7 is not mate, as K takes P.

(b)	Q QR4

Notes from Deutsches Wochenshach.

(a) If White had allowed himself to be misled in advancing his K B P two squares, then Black would gain the advantage by 15..... P to Q 4; 16—P to K 5. B to Q B 4 ch, and 17..... Kt to Kt 5 [or 16—P takes P, B to Q B 4 ch; 17—K to R sq. Kt to K K 5; or 17—Kt to Q 4. R takes R ch; 18—R takes Kt, Q takes Kt].

(b) Apparently White has directed his aim to stopping the B, whose advance to Q 8 must be prevented; however, at the same time, he is preparing an attack by Castling.

(c) Of little worth, since thereby the position on the Q wing is weakened.

(d) A momentous mistake, which makes White's plot succeed. The K B P should have taken. Pillsbury intended, as he showed after the conclusion of the game, to continue then with 25—Kt (R 5) to B 4. P takes P; 26—R to Q Kt sq, which continuation, however, Steinitz would have confuted in the following manner, as demonstrated by himself; 26..... P takes P; 27—B takes P ch, B takes B; 28—R takes Q. P takes R; 29—Kt to Q 5 (on any other move, the QR P would advance) B to K 3; 30—P to Q B 3. B takes Kt;

31—P takes Kt, B takes P and wins. However, it is to be considered whether White, after 24..... B P takes Kt, could not have gone to K 6 with the Kt; then Black would have been allowed to take in no way at all.

(e) Now this move decides at once, since Black is forced to take at Q R 4 on account of the threatened check.

END GAME.

The position shown on this diagram occurred in a game played recently at the Manhattan Chess Club, New York, between Edward Hymes, of the American Cable Team, and D. Janowski, the Parisian expert. It was the 27th move of Black and White threatened to win Black's King Knight-Pawn. Janowski played the unexpected move of R to B 5, giving up the exchange and eventually winning the game. The continuation will be found highly instructive:—

R to B 5 (R) Position after Black's 27th move:

BLACK.

WHITE.

28 R xR	P xB	41 R B5ch	K Q5
29 R R3(h)	R QKtq	42 R B4ch	K Q4
30 P Kt3	P Q5	43 P R5	P K6

38 R B5ch	K K3	51 K Q2	R Q8ch
39 R B4	K B3	52 Resigns
40 P KR4	K K4

Notes by Emil Kemeny.

(g) Brilliant play, which gives Black a decided, if not winning, advantage. By sacrificing the exchange, Black obtains a powerful centre. See diagram.

(h) Had he played P to R 3, then the rook would be out of play. The move selected is much stronger. If Black plays B takes P, then White may answer R to Q B 3, with some winning chances.

(i) Had he played P to K R 3, then R takes Kt and R to Q B 4 would have won for Black.

(k) He could not play R takes P on account of R to K 8 mate. Had White played P to K R 4, then R to K 8 check, followed eventually by P to K 4, P to K 5, and P to K 6, would have been Black's continuation.

(l) K to Q 2 might have somewhat prolonged the battle, but the game was hopeless. The text move enables Black to win with R to B 8 check, ♔ to Q 8 check, and queening of the pawn.

NOTES.

The match by telegraph between the Chess Clubs of Vienna and St. Petersburg was won by Vienna. The stakes were 1,000 francs a side.

A match by correspondence, two games to be played simultaneously, has been commenced between the Cercle Philidor, of Paris, and the Cercle des Echecs, of Brussels, for a stake of 100 francs.

Of the fourteen competitors for the championship of the New York State Chess Association, Messrs. Lipschutz and Visser tied for 1st and 2nd places. Mr. Baird obtained the third prize and Messrs. Delmar and Marshall divided the fourth and fifth prizes.

Lasker played 130 games on his recent visit to Moscow. Of these he won 102, drew 19, and lost nine. The following position occurred in an ending of a consultation game, and will be instructive to practical players:—White, Lasker, King at Q Kt 4; Q at K Kt 2. Black, King at Q Kt 8, pawn at Q R 7. White plays ♔ to Q B 3 (not Kt 3) and wins, because after P to R 8 (Q) ch, K to Kt 3 settles matters. A 40 game simultaneous lasted from 8 p.m. till 2 a.m.—Times Weekly.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

THE plague still continues virulent in Southern Formosa.

Prospects are bright for a very successful race meeting next week.

SHANOWAT has had its settlements enlarged on satisfactory terms.

MR. DIOY's tour in the provinces is duly recorded day by day in the vernacular press.

OFFICIAL figures of the import and export trade at Kobe during last month have not yet been published. A rough calculation is as follows:—Imports, yen 8,624,079; Exports, yen 5,950,074.

THE agreement between Russia and Great Britain with regard to Northern China has been published.

WON. BRO. E. FLINT KILBY has been appointed Deputy District Grand Master of Freemasons in Japan.

THE spring athletic sports meeting of the Y.C. & A.C. is to be held this afternoon on the Cricket Ground.

THE first of May passed without any incident in France and abroad. Suspension of work was insignificant.

THE machine room of the Osaka Cement Manufacturing Company was destroyed by fire on Monday night.

AN enormous rise in the price of copper has taken place, due to the American ring dislocating the trade.

H.I.M. THE EMPEROR will visit Yokohama on Tuesday next, the second day of the Nippon Race Club Spring Meeting.

H.I.H. THE CROWN PRINCE has received the Cordon of the Legion of Honour from the French Representative in Tokyo.

REAR-ADMIRAL NUMURA, who played such a distinguished part during the Japan China war, died this week in an early age.

CHINESE residents in Yokohama numbered 3,385 at the end of last month, an increase of 75 as compared with February last.

MR. F. W. EASTLAKE, living at Kojimachi, Tokyo, was on Tuesday robbed of several hundred yen by his cook, who absconded.

AT the Hungarian Diet, the Premier stated that there was no present intention on the part of Austria to acquire any territory in China.

THE Filipinos are suing for peace. At first they asked for an armistice, but the American Commander-in-chief would have no stipulations.

AT an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders of the Tokyo Silver Bullion Exchange, held on Tuesday, it was decided to wind up the concern.

DURING the week several bicycle accidents have occurred in Yokohama, some due to furious Japanese riders, others to the unpractised antics of British men-of-war-men.

ALL is now quiet in the Kowloon hinterland. Mr. Stewart Lockhart, the Colonial Secretary of Hongkong, has been called home to explain matters to Mr. Chamberlain.

AT 1 p.m. on Sunday a fire broke out in a house occupied by a lumber dealer at Omori, Ehara district, Tokyo, destroying four houses, two godowns being greatly damaged.

THE negotiations for a Japanese settlement at Foochow have been concluded between the Japanese Consul, Mr. Ueno, and the chief official of the place. The agreement is stated to have been signed on the 29th ult., and is expected to be shortly sanctioned by the Emperor.

THE Times reports that the Government has decided to contribute an early subsidy to the full amount recommended by the Cable Committee, as guarantee for the construction of the all-British cable.

ON the 26th ultimo, a fearful thunder-storm prevailed at Kobe and the vicinity. A woman named Sei (32), Takano village, was struck by lightning and killed. Her house was also struck and reduced to ashes.

THE combined regatta of the Higher Commercial School and the 1st High School was held on the upper course of the Sumida on Sunday. In the last Champion race, the High School won by about 8 feet.

A MAN named Onodera Teikichi, of the village of Inaniwa Okachi, Akita Prefecture, a few days ago murdered his mother and second son, wounded his daughter and his eldest son, and then hanged himself.

IN spite of the notification issued by Kanagawa Prefecture strictly forbidding students, whether of Government or private schools, to visit houses of ill-fame, 60 or 70 per cent. of recent visitors to such houses are said to have been students.

AT 10.25 on Sunday night a fire broke out at Ichome, Minami Hachobori, Kyobashi, Tokyo. A strong south-west wind was blowing, and made it impossible to extinguish the flames until five houses had been destroyed and eight damaged.

HORI SAICHIRO (31), fireman of the N. Y. K.'s Kawachi Maru, now lying at Yokohama, was found suffocated under the coal in one of the bunkers a few days ago. It is supposed that, while he was working, a quantity of coal fell on him and suffocated him.

MARQUIS HACHISUKA, Marquis Nabeshima, Baron Sannomiya, Messrs. Sonoda and Kikuchi Daitoku will give a garden party at Goryochi, Shinjuku, Tokyo, on the 13th instant. The English Minister, Mr. and Mrs. Dioy, and members of the London Japan Society will be invited.

THE other day sparks from a train on the Koku Railway ignited and seriously damaged two residences by the side of the line. At Akabane, near Tokyo, on Sunday morning sparks from the Shinagawa train fell on the roof of a peasant's house, resulting in the destruction of the building. The owner is trying to get compensation from the company.

SPEAKING in Birmingham, at the banquet of mechanical engineers, Mr. Goheen, First Lord of the Admiralty, said that the general appearance in Europe was much more tranquil than a few months ago, and that Great Britain had made friendly settlements with Germany and France. He also hoped that the country was making one with Russia.

A GENERAL meeting of the shareholders of the Meiji Fire Insurance Company was held on Monday. Mr. Abe Taigo, Director, took the chair, and presented a report and financial statement for the year ending March 30th. A dividend of 14 per cent. per annum was declared—an increase of 1 per cent. compared with last year—and it was decided to raise the salaries of the principal officials in view of the increase in business.

RUSSIA, ENGLAND, AND CHINA.

May 2.

Russia and England have come to an agreement with reference to railways in China. The only question actually at issue when our last detailed advices were received, was the question of the Shanhaikwan-Newchwang line. After the Chinese Government, acting at the instance of Li Hungchang, had granted to a Belgian syndicate, backed by Russia and France, a concession for a railway from Peking to Hankow—that is to say, a railway running from the Chinese capital into the very heart of the Yangtze Valley—, and had managed the grant in a fashion obviously unfriendly to Great Britain, Her Majesty's Minister proposed to demand from China a written assurance that all railway concessions for which British syndicates were then in treaty should be granted without further delay on terms identical with those conceded to the Belgians. The railways falling under this category were (1) the Shanhaikwan-Newchwang; (2) the Tientsin-Chingkiang; (3) the Shanghai-Nanking with its continuations and branches; and (4) the lines in Honan and Shansi. This proposal of Sir Claude Macdonald's was approved by the Foreign Office in London, but he was instructed to exclude the Shanhaikwan-Newchwang line, and it became the subject of the agreement now made public—that a British Chief Engineer and Financial Controller should be appointed for a portion of the line. British enterprise has obtained everything hitherto sought by it in China. It has received concessions for 2,800 miles of railways all offering most favourable prospects, if we except the Yunnan-Yangtze line, and it is not in the field for any further grants.

The quaint feature of the matter is that two European States should agree between themselves as to what parts of the Chinese Empire they are going to exploit, without at all consulting China's views. Never in the history of the world has any such spectacle been seen. China's independence is a veritable myth. She has the semblance of independence, but does not enjoy the reality in any sense. The Fiji Shimpō has a clever cartoon. The British lion and the Russian eagle are depicted as a compound monster, preparing to swallow up John Chinaman, who awaits the catastrophe with every semblance of consternation but not the smallest display of resistance.

May 3.

The publication of the last Blue Book of correspondence respecting the affairs of China clears up some points which had perplexed the public considerably. We learn from it, in the first place, the significance of the demonstration made by the British squadron last autumn at Chefoo. It was a very big demonstration—something like 30 ships assembled—and people in general jumped to the conclusion that it was directed against Russia. But when nothing happened, when the ships dispersed again quietly, and when Russia was found to be pursuing the even tenor of her way, several Far-Eastern English journals ridiculed the whole affair, and asked whether Great Britain's prestige could be sustained or enhanced by this objectless "marching of her men up the hill and marching them down again." We ventured to suggest that Her Majesty's Government probably knew very well what they were doing, and that a good reason for the demonstration would be discovered when the facts became known. It now turns out that China was the Power menaced. The Tsung-li Yamén, instigated by Li Hungchang, granted to a Belgian syndicate a concession for the Peking-Hankow line. The grant was made virtually in defiance of Great Britain's protest—a protest based on the fact that the line would pierce the very centre of the Yang-tze Valley—and the Chinese Government had several times denied that it entertained any idea of giving the concession. Her Majesty's Ministry decided, therefore, at the instigation of Sir Claude Macdonald, that a written engagement of a drastic character must be exacted from China in the matter of railways, and that the British Admiral be invited to coöperate in obtaining the promise. With that object the fleet was assembled at Chefoo, to disperse again so soon as China gave the promise, which she promptly did.

Another point elucidated by the Blue Book is the reason of Li Hungchang's removal from the Tsung-li Yamén. It was stated at the time that the British Minister had demanded the Grand Secretary's dismissal, but the assertion is now proved to have been incorrect. Sir Claude Macdonald did not prefer any such demand. But he did state officially, in an interview at the Yamén on the subject of the Peking-Hankow railway concession, that he "believed that the Prince and the Ministers of the Yamén were not so much to blame for what had occurred, but that they had followed the lead and advice of Li Hungchang, who, for reasons best known to himself, had chosen to show himself hostile to British interests." Sir Claude then asked for the compensatory pledge referred to above, and received it on September 6th, and on September 7th Li was dismissed from the Yamén.

May 4.

The friends of China! Who are they, we can hear the reader of this sentence exclaim. Who are they, indeed? China is truly in the position of the lad in the fable: the time is most opportune for hitting her hard. The Yomiuri Shimbun, however, thinks that it is also opportune for giving her good advice. She must feel very desolate just at present. England, her last possible friend among Western Powers, has been alienated by the untoward events at Kowloon, and is, moreover, likely to come to an understanding with Russia, which can only mean the driving of many new nails in China's coffin. Her sole hope of safety lay in the conflicting interests and mutual jealousies of the States waiting to cut her up. From the moment that they come into accord about the distribution of the morsels, it is all over with her. She ought to be ready now to take advice, and Japan is the country to tender it. On the occasion of the coup d'état last autumn, Count Okuma, then Minister of Foreign Affairs, strongly recommended the Empress Dowager not to countenance any retrogressive movement. The counsel was not adopted. It ought to be repeated now, for, if China persists in refusing to inaugurate sweeping reforms, her doom is sealed.

May 5

Various views are entertained by vernacular newspapers with regard to the agreement concluded between Russia and England. By some it is not regarded as a specially important affair, nor considered likely to affect the course of political events. It may be classed, according to this view, with the Russo-Japanese Convention concerning Korea, which has not exercised any perceptible influence on Korea's status or interfered in any way with her independence. In short, these publicists think that things will continue to move in their old groove, unaffected by the new agreement. Others—notably the Fiji Shimpō—put their finger on the hard fact that China is altogether a quantité négligeable in the eyes of England and Russia. They have settled what parts of her are to be exploited by each without consulting her own wishes in any way. The incident may be regarded as a public announcement by the two leading Asiatic Powers that China is to be cut up. Other Powers will interpret it in that sense and will not fail to shape their own course accordingly. What should Japan do? Give practical effect, says the Fiji, to the rights already acquired by her in Fuhkien. Unless she steps into the arena now, she must consent to be permanently excluded. Of this latter view the Kokumin is also an exponent, but the Kokumin, as our readers know, has for some time been steadily advocating resolute steps on Japan's part with regard to Fuhkien. The Yomiuri Shimbun, more so, makes political capital out of the event. It construes it as a clear indication that Great Britain has changed her policy towards China, and it then asks the reason of the change. Japan's hesitation to join the proposed alliance, is the answer. Had Japan frankly thrown in her lot with England and America for the conservation of the Chinese empire, the British Government would not now be found clasping hands with the Russian for the dissection of China. Next, our contemporary asks why Japan hesitated, and discovers a reply eminently satisfactory to its own political bias, for it alleges that the Kensei-to (Liberals) are responsible, their creed being the partition of China, and the Cabinet being obliged to adopt their creed. Finally, the Yomiuri mounts its pet hobby, and declares that, whatever the policy of the Cabinet or of its political supporters might be, the Foreign Office, under its present head, could not save the situation.

Curiously enough, not one of our vernacular contemporaries notices the essentially significant fact that England has now for the first time publicly recognised a sphere of Russian influence in China. Nothing seems to us more important than that.

EVENTS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

The news received by the Legation of France, and published by us on Monday—namely, that the Filipinos are suing for an armistice—is confirmed by telegrams which have reached the Foreign Office in Tokyo. In the latter intelligence Aguinaldo is mentioned as the sender of the request, and it may therefore be inferred that there is no truth in the recent rumours which represented him as having been deposed from power by the General commanding the Filipino forces. There would be cause for great satisfaction should this armistice prove the prelude to a settlement of the whole question. It does not appear, indeed, that the proximate purpose of the armistice is to treat for peace. The reason said to be assigned by Aguinaldo in preferring the request is that the Filipinos desire to take counsel among themselves. But that, we may fairly assume, will preface formal application for the opening of negotiations. Of course it must be perfectly evident to the Filipinos by this time that they have not the slightest chance of combatting the Americans successfully. With the exception of capturing a boat's crew who landed without proper precautions, and cutting off a few stragglers here and there, the Filipinos have not scored a single point. Every position they attempted to defend has been captured and every district they sought to hold has been abandoned at the first onset of the invaders. They can not but recognise that their cause is hopeless. Indeed, one of the latest pieces of news is that ten thousand of Aguinaldo's soldiers offered to surrender to Otis, but the American General refused to accept their surrender unless they brought their arms with them. At the same time, it is equally evident that the task lying before the Americans is of the heaviest. They beat the Filipinos wherever they find them, but the trouble is that they can never find them in sufficient numbers to render their defeat decisive. It is a campaign of mere skirmishes. The Filipinos yield wherever they are pressed and return to their original shape when the pressure is removed. Under such circumstances, it would be necessary for the Americans to permanently occupy all the territory they over-run if they hoped to reap the full fruits of victory. Their force, however, is quite inadequate for such a purpose, and even if they had men enough to garrison every locality, the nature of the country and the unwholesome climate would forbid that course at this season of the year. Still, it is only a question of time, and if the Filipinos are shrewd enough to recognise the fact, they will save themselves much needless suffering and the Americans a great deal of unnecessary trouble. America is of course prepared, and has always been prepared, to grant them the fullest measure of autonomy they can be trusted to enjoy.

STEAM-BOAT COMPETITION.

The Douglas and Osaka Shosen S.S. Companies appear to have entered into a keen competition on the Tamsui-Hongkong line. The third-class fare from Tamsui to Amoy used to be 3 yen, and that from Tamsui to Hongkong 7 yen, but when the Japanese Company's ships made their appearance, the Douglas Company reduced these fares to 2½ yen and 6 yen, respectively, and ultimately to 2 yen and 5 yen. The Osaka Company has followed suit. The Maisuru Maru, which sailed from Tamsui on the 23rd instant, took passengers at the last-named figures, which really mean 1.80 yen and 4.50 yen, inasmuch as the Chinese make payments in chop-dollars which are at a discount of 10 per cent. in terms of yen. The competition is expected to grow keener, but the Japanese company has a great advantage in the fact that it receives a subsidy from the Formosa Government. We presume that it will end in a "pool." The public generally suffer in the long run.

THE NEW COMMERCIAL CODE.

Dr. Lönholm is to be congratulated on the rapidity with which he has produced a translation of the new Commercial Code, recently promulgated and presently to go into operation. This Code was submitted to the Diet in its eleventh session, and passed the Upper House, but failed to become law owing to the dissolution of the Lower House. Dr. Lönholm nevertheless judged that the foreign public would be glad to have a trustworthy translation of it without delay. He accordingly published a translation last year, adding a note to the effect that the Code would undoubtedly become law within the course of the year. His forecast has proved correct in the main, but during the interval that elapsed before its submission to the Diet for a second time, the Code received certain additions and underwent some alterations, which, though neither radical nor numerous, have the effect not only of changing the import of a few articles, but also of disturbing the former numbering, and Dr. Lönholm has wisely decided to publish a new translation, which is now before us. We trust that his enterprise will be rewarded, but although every foreigner engaged in business in Japan ought to provide himself with a copy of this Code, we doubt whether the layman's old habit of leaving law entirely to the bench and the bar, and following the guidance of common sense only, will not prove more or less fatal to the sale of the German expert's very useful volume.

The first important alteration which we notice is the introduction of Art. 277, which says:—

The provisions of Art. 349 of the Civil Code do not apply to a pledge created at a security for an obligation arising from a commercial transaction.

The Article of the Civil Code here referred to runs thus:—

The pledgee can not, either by the act of creation or by an agreement made before the obligation is due, in order to make performance to the pledgee, agree that the latter shall become the owner of the thing pledged, or shall dispose of it without complying with the requirements of the law.

It is evidently a point of no small importance to the safety and convenience of trade transactions that a borrower should be able to guarantee to a lender an absolute right of property in goods pledged as security for monetary accommodation.

Dr. Lönholm has appended to his translation of the Commercial Code a translation of the Law Concerning the Operation of the Commercial Code. The 92nd Article of this Law says:—

As to foreign commercial companies (this term includes partnerships) which have set up a branch office in Japan before the taking effect of the Commercial Code, special regulations may be made by Imperial Ordinance. The same applies to commercial companies or associations formed in Japan by foreigners before the taking effect of the Commercial Code.

This Article will be found very re-assuring by many foreigners. The evident intention of its drafters is to protect foreign companies or partnerships doing business in Japan against undue inconvenience resulting from their being suddenly brought within the purview of a new Code which may conflict, in some respects, with the original principles of their organization.

In Article 95 et seq. of this Law Concerning the Operation of the Commercial Code, we find a number of interesting provisions with regard to insurance business. Thus the business of insurance can not be carried on without the consent of the Government; it may be carried on by joint-stock companies only; an insurance company can not carry on any other business; the same company must not carry on the business of life insurance and the business of insurance against loss; the Government may, at any time, require an insurance company to make a report on its business, or may examine into the affairs of the company, and may order the business to be suspended or the directors to be removed if the management of the company's affairs or the state of its property shows that the continuance of its business would be perilous; an insurance company must not consolidate with another commercial company carrying on another business, etc. On the other hand, Art. 115 provides that:—

As to foreign commercial companies setting up in Japan a branch office or an agency to carry on insurance business, special regulations may be issued by Imperial Ordinance.

This Article, again, is evidently intended to furnish a means of protecting foreign offices and agencies against obstacles which the Code, if applied rigidly, might create in the path of their operations.

There is one other point to which attention may be drawn, though the interest attaching to it is now academical only. In the enumeration of "commercial transactions" (Art. 264 of the Commercial Code), so called if "done as a regular business," we find "transactions relating to publishing, printing, or photographing." Does not that appear to include journalism, so far as the printing and publishing of a newspaper are concerned? If so, the former Press Law, which limited to Japanese subjects the right of printing and publishing newspapers, could not have remained operative side by side with the Revised Treaties, for the latter guarantee to the subjects or citizens of the contracting parties the right to engage in all transactions of lawful commerce within each other's realms. However, the question, as we have said, has no practical importance, first, because the Press Law has been amended, and secondly because the right to print and publish without the right of editing would not suffice for the production of a journal.

THE "SHINONOME."

We have already explained that contradictions have been published of the stories circulated about injuries to the torpedo-catcher Shinonome on her voyage out, owing to carelessness on the part of her British crew. The contradictions are now supplemented by an announcement that, not only were no injuries suffered, but the vessel arrived in splendid condition, and the care taken of her reflects the greatest credit on her crew. It is a curiously drastic retraction, and one is puzzled to understand how the original story could have been manufactured. There is another complaint now, however; namely, that Captain Page, who commanded the vessel on her voyage out, was not properly treated by the naval authorities at Yokosuka. They gave him a dinner, but no Japanese officers of any standing were present, and Captain Page must have carried away a curious idea of Japanese hospitality. This is the Nippon's news. We have no information of our own.

POLITICAL TALK.

We look to the Mainichi Shinbun for sensations now-a-days. In each of its issues some staring item of intelligence appears, composed with big type. The latest is that Mr. Hoshi Toru, speaking at a meeting in Okawaramachi, Miyagi Prefecture, declared that Marquis Ito would combine with the Constitutional Party next autumn to form a new Cabinet. Such an event is not improbable, we imagine, but that Mr. Hoshi or any one else is in a position to predict it certainly, we do not believe.

Count Okuma has been telling a representative of one of our Tokyo contemporaries that, since the laws of Japan are now satisfactory, the only cause for uneasiness with respect to the operation of the Revised Treaties is the jails. It would be unjust not to take any account of differences in national customs when arranging for the treatment of prisoners. To make a foreigner sit and sleep as Japanese do, and to give him only rice and vegetables when he has always been accustomed to meat diet, would be to aggravate his punishment very heavily. These points call for due consideration, but otherwise there is no reason to be uneasy about the working of the Revised Treaties. We may supplement these remarks of Count Okuma's by reminding our readers that arrangements have been made by the authorities for acquiring the Consular jails at the open ports, and that foreign prisoners will be confined there, the method of treating them being conformed to that pursued while they were still under foreign jurisdiction.

It is significant to find a paper like the Kokumin, whose editor, Mr. Tokutomi, is generally supposed to have very close relations with some of the statesmen now in power, persistently and uniformly advocating the adoption of a strong policy towards China. What our contemporary thinks necessary is that steps should be taken to convert into a practical reality the engagement already obtained from Peking with regard to the non-alienation of Fuhkien. The general argument is that such a course need not imply any unfriendliness to China, for, if Japan is to assist her neighbour, she must be in a position to do so, and she can not be in a position unless she has a point d'appui. Further, there is the consideration of Japan's own safety. To secure that, she must be certainly able to prevent the occupation of the mainland facing Formosa by a potential enemy. Then, again, it is essential to avert every risk of collision with any of three Powers to whom she is drawn by community of general interests, England, America, and Germany. The apparently imminent entente between Great Britain and Russia will directly involve the recognised inclusion of northern China within the latter's sphere of influence, and indirectly impart a southerly direction to the expansion of England, the United States, and Germany in China. If Japan does not openly make good her footing in Fuhkien before that expansion becomes a practical reality, any attempt to do so may bring her into collision with one of the three Powers whose friendship she most desires to cultivate. It is not suggested that desigus would be deliberately planned against Fuhkien, but merely that all forces of expansion follow the line of least resistance and Fuhkien would be such a line if it were left as it is now. The Kokumin is convinced that England, one of these days, will hold sway over a vast tract in the Yangtze Valley, and many tens of millions of Chinamen will be her subjects. Japan had better get a piéd à terre on the continent before that day dawns. To come down to hard facts, our contemporary advocates three things: first, that Japan should obtain a settlement of her own in Amoy; secondly, that she should acquire the sole privilege of working mines in Fuhkien; and thirdly, that she should have the building of all railways in the province, except those for which England may have already secured concessions.

The Asahi says that a project is on foot to form a big league of foreign and Japanese merchants, with a view to improved relations after the Revised Treaties go into operation. The Tokyo Chamber of Commerce has addressed the Yokohama Chamber on the subject, and has received a favourable reply. By what name the organization is to be called the Tokyo projectors do not seem to have yet determined, but there is some talk of calling it an "economic league" (Keisai Dantai). The inaugural ceremony will take the form of a convivial gathering.

The Official Gazette contains the Emperor's sanction of the change made by the Diet last session in the Press Law. The old Law contained a clause providing that the qualifications necessary for publishing, printing, or editing a newspaper in Japan were (1) to be a Japanese subject; (2) to be of the full age of 30 years; and (3) to be a resident in Japan. The first of these qualifications was expunged by the Diet, at the instance of the Government, and the amended Law has now been promulgated, to go into force from July 1st. It is, we presume, unnecessary to repeat what we have often explained already, namely, that the clause restricting newspaper enterprise to Japanese subjects was not inserted originally in an illiberal spirit. The law was framed for the Japanese people and for the Japanese people only, at a time when the question of foreigners' entering the sphere of journalism was not upon the tapis at all.

During the years immediately succeeding the inauguration of constitutional government in Japan, it seemed probable that political speeches would acquire great vogue, and that the Japanese would develop a marked propensity for public meetings and platform talk. But some figures tabulated by the Yoroku Choho seem to indicate that the taste for such things is dying out. The figures are these:—

Year.	Number of Political Meetings.	Number of speakers at meetings.
1891	6,482	15,526
1892	8,076	21,796
1893	7,076	18,021
1894	5,750	15,223
1895	1,506	3,337
1896	1,272	3,198

It is a pity that these figures are not carried down to a later date, for 1896, having been the year immediately subsequent to the war with China, can not be considered an average criterion. Still the marked diminution in the numbers is very suggestive. It further recalls the curious fact that in the early days of the Japanese Diet, many men attained ephemeral distinction of whom actually nothing has since been heard. The proceedings of the first three sessions revealed at least a score of debaters possessing oratorical or rhetorical gifts which ought to have kept them long before the public. With very few exceptions they have all passed out of the vista of immediate observation, and are now scarcely remembered. We should like to hear a Japanese explanation of the fact.

There is a very curious and distinctly crude theory among certain Japanese politicians. Reduced to simple terms it amounts to saying that if a man has a serviceable weapon, he is bound to use it; if he possesses a good rifle and some dry powder, he ought to shoot somebody. The Tokyo Asahi is at present an exponent of that theory. It thinks that if the country's foreign policy does not keep pace with the expansion of her armaments, things will be much as though a party of play-actors should parade for an Imperial military review. But we are not to suppose that the Asahi wants any stalwart displays of enterprise in the field of foreign policy. On the contrary, its object is to prove that the post bellum scheme of armaments' expansion is out of all proportion to the nation's needs. It declares that the country's statesmen are inebriated with the idea of expansion, and have committed themselves to a programme just double as large as it ought to be. This homily may perhaps be regarded as one of the stop-gap utterances with which the Tokyo journals fill their columns in very quiet times like the present.

FRENCH SILK FABRICS.

Nearly all the Tokyo journals publish a paragraph headed "great discovery with regard to foreign silk fabrics." It appears that Mr. Henry Satow, head of the Imperial Commercial Museum in the Department of Agriculture and Commerce, has been submitting specimens of French and English silk fabrics to certain tests of quality. The variety of fabric known in Japan as Kohaku-ori has been specially examined. It is a favourite stuff for ladies' garments, and large quantities are imported every year. Attention was drawn to this material by the curious facility with which it could be torn, and on analysis it was found that, although the warp consisted of silk, the weft was of some material as brittle as tinder. The English fabric proved somewhat better, but still left much to be desired, artificial silk being mixed in both the weft and the warp. The tensile strength of the threads was almost nil, and when burned in the fire they gave out a smell like that of singed hair, but did not shrivel, so that they were evidently made of some vegetable fibre. The results of these experiments may be seen by any one visiting the Imperial Museum.

The great publicity given to this discovery will, of course, have a serious effect upon the popularity of both French and English silk fabrics, especially the former, to say nothing to the rejoinder it will furnish to the Japanese manufacturer when he is charged with dishonest practices. It is of course possible that the specimens examined at the Imperial Museum did not represent the average European fabric, but of course the importers who are directly interested will take care to have that point cleared up.

FOREIGNERS IN JAPANESE LEGISLATION.

We are not altogether surprised to find that the Nippon writes somewhat sarcastically about the importance publicly attached by the Authorities to Mixed Residence as a reason for amending the laws and improving the procedure of the Judiciary and the police. It is a pity that the Japanese people should be taught to value judicial and legislative reforms less for their own sake than for the sake of foreigners visiting or residing in this country, and if the Nippon resents the notion that its own nationals do not deserve as much consideration as foreigners in such matters, the Nippon is not to be blamed. When the first draft of the new Civil Code was submitted to the Diet, one of the most effective objections raised by the Opposition was that the compilation of the Code had been unduly hurried for purposes of Treaty Revision. It was not a valid objection, but it carried great weight. The times have changed since then. There is far less disposition to-day than there was seven years ago to rebel against any concession to foreign requirements. Still the official references so frequently made to Mixed Residence, and the plea that in order to assume jurisdiction over foreigners Japan must rise to a higher plane than the needs of her own people require her to occupy, are not very judicious or tactful.

COMMERCIAL MUSEUM.

Under the able management of Mr. Henry Satoh, not a foreigner, as might be supposed, but a Japanese official—Mr. Satoh, whose personal name "Kenri" reads "Henli" according to Chinese pronunciation—the Imperial Commercial Museum in the Department of Agriculture and Commerce has become one of the most attractive and, at the same time, useful places in Tokyo. All the exhibits have been re-arranged in accordance with a well thought out and very intelligent plan, and it is now possible to find, without trouble or delay, samples of what Japan produces in almost every serviceable line. Apprehending, probably, that the Museum is not as widely known as it deserves to be, the Director has now issued a brochure containing details as to the nature of the exhibits and the course to be pursued in seeking space to exhibit. The little volume is clearly printed on good paper, and embellished with pretty collotypes showing exterior and interior views of the Museum and its contents. As to the articles placed on exhibition, they consist of both domestic and foreign products. In the former class there are four subdivisions, namely (1) staple commodities of export; (2) articles capable of future export; (3) articles to compete with imported commodities; and (4) raw materials of industry. Under the heading of foreign products are included, (1) articles serving as models for home manufactures; (2) articles competing with Japanese products in foreign markets; (3) articles which may become competitors hereafter of Japanese exports; (4) articles commanding large sales in foreign markets to which they are imported from countries other than Japan, and capable of being manufactured in Japan; (5) staple commodities of import; (6) articles promising to become imports; and (7) raw materials of industry. Articles belonging to any of these categories are received, either on loan or as donations, from both Japanese and foreigners, and the form of application to be sent in by applicants for space is given in the brochure. It would seem that samples and models of patents, registered designs, and trade marks are not received by the Museum direct from the patentee, but must be forwarded from the Imperial Patent Office. The Museum is open to the public daily—holidays excepted—free of charge from 8 a.m. to 3 p.m., and its contents will well repay a visit by any person interested in the present condition of Japanese industry. We should imagine, also, that the place will be found very useful by foreigners desiring to introduce their goods to the Japanese market.

MINISTER OF JUSTICE AND THE POLICE.

In an address delivered to the Police Inspectors in conclave, the Minister of Justice insisted on the fact that, after the Revised Treaties go into operation, more respect than ever must be paid to the liberty of the subject. Foreigners and Japanese should be treated alike, speaking generally, but note must also be taken of differences of custom and of language, and allowance must be made on these accounts in dealing with prisoners. His Excellency then proceeded to inculcate some very excellent general principles. The police must not abuse their power in effecting arrests, or confuse old-time methods with modern. In former days the idea was to apprehend a man first and seek proofs of his guilt afterwards, but in the present age the rule was that no one should be arrested unless evidence that he had violated the law was already at hand. Further, nothing was to be eschewed more than the uncivilized conception that a man could not be finally pronounced guilty until he had confessed his crime. Independent proof was the first desideratum: confession possessed altogether secondary importance. The Minister also instructed the police to remember that nothing redounded so much to their discredit as to send a man forward for trial on such slender evidence that he had to be acquitted after a public hearing.

ELECTRIC RAILWAYS.

Some time ago a company was formed for the purpose of laying an electric railway from Kawasaki to the celebrated temple of Daishi, whither so many thousands of pilgrims find their way every year. The company called itself the Keihin Denki Tetsudo Kaisha. It was a comparatively small concern, its capital being only 98,000 yen. The projectors have now combined with men of Tokyo and Yokohama; have decided to raise their capital to 850,000 yen, and to extend the line to Tokyo and Yokohama. Permission is said to have been obtained from the Authorities. But we doubt it. The competition thus created would be too great a shock to the dolce-far-niente folks who manage the present railway. They might find themselves compelled to raise the speed of the trains to the break-neck pace of 35 miles an hour, and to substitute some improvements for the fine full-flavoured antiquities that are so soothing to conservative instincts under the existing regimen.

FEMALE EDUCATION IN JAPAN.

An interesting newspaper controversy is going on in Tokyo about female education. The Fiji Shimpō asserts that the manner of bringing up Japanese girls is very faulty. They are taught the tea ceremonial, the art of flower arrangement, music, dancing, and classical versification. But they learn nothing of housekeeping, nothing of monetary affairs, and nothing of the political and social questions that attract public attention. The result is that they are entirely effaced after they leave the parental roof, and that they possess no influence whatever, but remain always on a much lower plane than men. The Fiji would alter their curriculum of studies in the sense of including subjects a knowledge of which would enable women to take their proper place and be competent to look after their own affairs independently. The Fiji is also a vehement critic of the celebrated classic, Kayebara's Onna Daigaku, which inculcates the self-effacement and subordination of woman. On the other side, the Fimmin denies that Japanese women are relegated to such an insignificant position as the Fiji indicates. Outwardly they do not seem to possess much power, but behind the scenes they have large influence. In that respect the Fimmin finds them just the opposite of foreign women, who receive a great deal of outward homage and seem to hold sway over men, but are of comparatively little account in married life. Still the Fimmin admits that the women of Japan are on a decidedly low level, so far as intellectual companionship with men is concerned, but its idea is that an improved system of general education is alone needed. Meanwhile another journal shows its conservatism by means of a cartoon in which the new woman of Japan, the woman whom the Fiji would create, is represented as a stalwart, over-dressed frump, with ill-fitting frock, a profusion of ornaments, and a vulgar, self-asserting demeanour; altogether a most displeasing ensemble.

SHARE TAKEN BY JAPANESE MERCHANTS IN FOREIGN TRADE.

For the purpose of comparing the share taken by Japanese merchants in the country's foreign trade with that taken by foreign merchants, the following figures are given by the Yoroshu Choho :—

IMPORT TRADE.
	By Japanese Merchants. Yen.	By Foreign Merchants. Yen.
1888	8,499,788	53,820,246

LEGION OF HONOUR FOR THE PRINCE IMPERIAL.

It is noted by vernacular newspapers that Spain was the first European Power to offer a decoration—the grand collar of the Golden Fleece—to the Prince Imperial of Japan. Belgium followed suit with the Legion of Leopold, and now comes France with the Legion of Honour. The ceremony of presenting the Grand Imperial Cordon of the Legion of Honour to the Prince Imperial took place in the Shiba Detached Palace on the forenoon of the 3rd instant. His Excellency the French Representative, accompanied by Vicomte de Bondy, and other members of the French Legation Staff, repaired to the Palace at 11 a.m., and the Prince arrived at 11.20. M. Harmand made the presentation, and the Prince expressed his thanks in the French language. Luncheon was served afterwards, and among those present were their Imperial Highnesses Prince and Princess Arisugawa and Prince and Princess Kanin, their Excellencies Baron and Baroness Sannomiya, Madame and Mademoiselle Harmand, the Vicomtesse de Bondy, Viscount Viscountess and Miss Aoki, Marquis and Marchioness Oyama, and Viscount and Viscountess Kagawa.

It is in contemplation, we read in Tokyo papers, to build a new palace for the Prince Imperial. The work is expected to occupy six years, and the estimated cost is 2½ million yen. A style combining the best features of Old Japanese architecture with those of modern Europe is to be adopted. So, at least, it is journalistically asserted, but we presume that what is meant is an edifice with one section in pure Japanese fashion and one in European. That is the most comfortable and also the most convenient kind of residence for this country. All attempts, however, to combine Japanese architecture, which is essentially adapted to ligneous structures, with the solid style of Europe have hitherto proved unsuccessful, and are now condemned by the experts.

A STRANGE STORY.

Nearly all the Tokyo journals give publicity to a rumour, apparently emanating from Shanghai, to the effect that China has approached the Japanese Government with a request for aid to get Germany out of Shantung. The suggestion is that the Peking Authorities have at last been roused to the imminence of the dangers threatening the Chinese empire, and to the certainty of its disruption unless some stop is put to the unscrupulous demands now constantly preferred by Western States. Germany being regarded as the leader in the game of aggression, and Shantung possessing special sanctity in Chinese eyes as the birth-place of Confucius, there is a double reason for the desire to get Germany out of the field. This canard seems to have been born of the complete dearth of sensations from which the vernacular press is suffering at present.

DEATH OF REAR-ADMIRAL NOMURA.

We regret to announce the death of Rear-Admiral Nomura Tei, who passed away on Thursday in the Red Cross Society's Hospital.

SPECIAL JAPANESE SETTLEMENTS IN CHINA.

Our readers are aware that negotiations have been going on for some time with reference to allotments of land at Foochow, Amoy, and Newchwang to form special Japanese settlements. Matters were much expedited in the case of Foochow by the Shashi outrage, for among the demands preferred in its sequel Japan was able to press the Foochow claim, and an area of 200,000 tsudo (166 acres) on the bank of the River was recently chosen, and mapped out in an agreement which now awaits the approval of the Peking Government. At Amoy, however, all the immediately available space being already devoted to foreign settlements, there is difficulty in finding a suitable area, and as to Newchwang, the negotiations are said to be progressing, but their actual condition is not described. We take these details from the Chiuo Shimbun. Special Japanese settlements at Amoy and Newchwang were promised by the Shimonoseki Treaty, ratified just four years ago. Things move very deliberately where China is concerned. But Japan can afford to wait. If she had obtained these settlements a month after the conclusion of the Treaty, they would probably have remained unutilized, like the majority of the other concessions included in that document.

EFFECT OF THE INCREASED POST AND RAILWAY CHARGES.

It is premature, perhaps, to attempt any conclusive estimate of the effect produced by the increased rates of postal and railways charges recently enforced. The Shogyo Shimpō, however, has collected official statistics which are suggestive, as far as they go:—

	First five days of April.	First five days of March.	First five days of February.
Mail Matter.
Letters.....	873,174	1,081,555	1,258,422
Post Cards.....	1,713,809	2,015,082	2,521,005

Totals..... 2,586,983 3,097,237 3,779,427
A very marked diminution is observable in April as compared with February or March. But it is to be noted that the falling off in March as compared with February was greater than the falling off in April as compared with March, and, since the increased rates did not become operative until April 1st, the table can not be regarded as clearly indicating their effect.

As to the State railways, the increased rates went into force from the 16th of March. The Shogyo Shimpō, however, takes the returns for the month beginning March 11th and ending April 10th, and shows the following increases (+) or decreases (—) as compared with the corresponding period of 1898:—

Line.	Passengers.	Receipts from Passengers.	Yen.
Tokaido	— 53,515	÷	139,805
Shin-Yetsu (Shimano and Echigo)	+ 8,282	+	328
O-u	— 5,178	+	446
Totals	— 50,411	+	140,599
Line.	Goods.	Receipts from
		Goods.	Yen.
Tokaido	— 4,824	÷	13,843
Shin-Yetsu (Shimano and Echigo)	+ 3,118	+	7,845
O-u	+ 438	+	1,979
Totals	— 1,268	+	23,667

These figures show that an increase of revenue has been obtained, at the cost of a marked diminution in the number of passengers and in the quantity of goods carried.

LOTTERIES IN YOKOHAMA.

We gather from the writing in Tokyo journals that the enterprise whose legality after July next is said to be under official consideration, is the pari mutuel, which takes place twice a year on the Yokohama race-course. According to the Tokyo Asahi, different views are entertained about the matter by the Yokohama Local Court and the Tokyo Appeal Court. The former holds that the pari mutuel belongs to the category of games of chance, with which the police are not authorized to interfere unless they discover the gamblers in flagrante crimine. It would follow, if this view be correct, that since the pari mutuel is held within doors, the police would require a warrant if they desired to stop it, just as they would require a warrant in order to raid a club or a private house where they suspected that gambling was going on. The authorities of the Appeal Court, on the contrary, are of the opinion that the pari mutuel is essentially a lottery, and, as such, must be interdicted. After describing these views, the Asahi pronounces its own verdict, namely, that to discuss the legality of the pari mutuel is about as sensible as to argue whether foreigners are entitled to commit burglary or homicide in Japan. There is nothing like being cock-sure, but the Asahi would be more convincing if it gave its reasons. Is the pari mutuel a game of chance, or are the persons taking part in it an association of gamblers, or is it a lottery? It is not a lottery, so far as we can see, inasmuch as there is no drawing of lots. Each person stakes an equal amount on the horse of his choice, and, if his selection prove correct, he receives the money staked on all the other horses, or shares it equally with any persons who have made the same choice with himself. Roughly speaking, that is the system. It is not a lottery, then. It is simply a device for enabling men to back their judgment without the trouble of seeking individual takers. Is it gambling? Yes, undoubtedly, if to bet is to gamble, for the pari mutuel, as its name indicates, is betting and nothing more. But we do not know that betting is classed as gambling in Japan, nor whether the law courts could punish any man for betting. We have never heard of any such occurrence, nor does the Criminal Code contain any provision bearing on it. The Criminal Code vetoes only "games of chance" and "associations of gamblers." It would be difficult we imagine, to demonstrate that backing a horse in a race is taking part in a game of chance. When this question was originally referred to by Tokyo newspapers, we imagined that a lottery, pure and simple, was in question, but since the pari mutuel is the topic of discussion, we do not see that a hard-and-fast conclusion can be reached after the manner of the Tokyo Asahi. At all events, the fact that an expression of official opinion has been sought by the organizers of the pari mutuel evinces the desire that foreigners entertain to conform strictly to the laws of the realm.

AN OFFENCE AGAINST ETHICS.

A very determined campaign has been waged for quite a long time by the Fiji Shimpō against the immoral practices that prevail among its nationals. We have alluded to this subject more than once, and have explained that the Fiji argument is not directed to radical reform but aims rather at securing greater respect for ethical conventionalities. It does not hope to improve the morals of its nationals forthwith, but simply seeks to mend their methods. "If you have no regard for principles," it says in effect, "pay attention at all events to appearances." Probably the Fiji thinks that if the expediency of concealing vice be once recognised, disgrace will gradually attach to being vicious. Very likely the plan is wise, but its opportunism is certainly more apparent than its morality. Meanwhile our contemporary tells a curious story, divested of names and localities. A certain provincial governor, leaving his lawful spouse in Tokyo, took a light-love to the scene of his prefectural duties and introduced her as his wife. The good ladies of the district, suspecting nothing, received the new comer with due empressement, and elected her to the presidency of various social and charitable societies over which the chief official dame of the prefecture was wont to preside. By and by they discovered the truth, and now there is a great hubbub, the outraged ladies agitating for the recall of the governor, and the Fiji Shimpō endorsing their demand most vehemently, as, in truth, every decent person must.

TEA.

There is much significance in certain figures collected by the Shogyō Shimpō to show the comparative progress of the tea industry in India, Ceylon, and Japan:—

Year.	Export of Japanese Tea, Yen.	Export of Indian Tea, Yen.	Export of Ceylon Tea, Yen.
1882 ...	7,029,718	15,894,525	439,767
1887 ...	7,603,341	21,910,246	3,984,309
1892 ...	7,525,315	26,636,085	15,613,025
1895 ...	8,879,241	39,669,100	25,877,528
1897 ...	7,860,460	40,934,507	28,415,569
1898 ...	8,215,665

Thus, while the export of Japanese tea has increased by only 10 per cent. in 16 years, that of Indian tea has increased by 166 per cent., and that of Ceylon tea by over 636 per cent. The fact is that, whereas Europe and America consume larger and larger quantities of tea every year, Japan's market is not improving. Her leaf, partly owing to faulty methods of manufacture, and chiefly owing to its failure to suit Occidental taste, does not find purchasers abroad. It may be inferred, indeed, from the above figures that the circle of foreign drinkers of Japanese tea is narrowing, for, had it remained in favour in all the families that drank it sixteen years ago, the natural growth of their numbers would have produced a nearly doubled consumption. The question is, were foreign enterprise employed for the purpose of improving Japanese tea culture and manufacture, could the palates of Europe and America be captivated?

Mr. Ueda Seihachiro (37), of Hongō, Tokyo and four accomplices were on Wednesday arrested on a charge of attempting to obtain money belonging to the Formosan Administration Bureau by forging convertible notes of the Bank of Japan to the amount of 30,000 yen.

JAPAN AT THE PARIS INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

It is proposed to build at the French International Exhibition of 1900 a special hall for the Japanese Exhibits, taking the Kondo (golden hall) of the temple Koriuji as an architectural model, and to make the internal and external decorations after the style of the Hikari-do of Hidehira. The edifice will be left standing permanently, and, with that object in view, fire-proof wood will be used wherever timber is indispensable, but brick and iron will be substituted for wood as far as possible. The pillars are to be about 15 inches in diameter. They will be covered with aventuring lacquer; the walls, inside, will have decorative designs in gold lacquer in relief; in the recessed panels of the ceiling there will be paintings of dragons, phoenixes, and flowers; the tiles will be green; and the pendants (furin) at the eaves will contain electric lights. The plan includes a large tea-house at the back of the exhibition hall. This programme does not seem to have yet obtained the endorsement of the Government in Tokyo. It is recommended by Mr. Hayashi, who is in charge of the general business of the Japanese section. He justly says that an ordinary Japanese building among such surroundings as those of the French Exhibition, would look like a mere shed, or a stable.

THE NAGOYA "YORŌ-IN."

"A Home for Destitute Children and Aged People"—that is a name which immediately appeals to the sympathies of the charitable. There are six old folks and twenty boys now in the Yorō-in in Nagoya. The Yorō-in is one of the results of the great earthquake of 1891. Its original purpose was to provide sustenance for aged people who had lost their means of livelihood owing to the earthquake, but it was subsequently extended in scope so as to include indigent children also. Thus far, boys alone have been taken in. Unfortunately the funds provided by public benevolence do not suffice for extending help to girls, though many of the latter might be saved from being sold into a life of shame were a slight effort made to expand the Yorō-in's sphere. The twenty boys now supported by the institution would probably become the hirelings of beggars were not this charitable assistance forthcoming. To be hired out to a beggar means that the child is starved in order that its emaciated appearance may excite pity, and that, when it reaches the age of 12 or 14, it is regularly instructed in the art of thieving. A very small measure of relief will save a boy from such a fate. The 26 inmates of the Yorō-in were supported throughout the year 1898 for a total outlay of 896 yen, or a little over 34 yen each on the average. Thirty-four yen is very cheap for such an achievement as the rescue of a boy from a life of misery and crime, and his conversion into an honest bread-winner. Yet it appears that the pittance of ninety pounds sterling required for the maintenance of the institution can not be procured without great difficulty. Last year, the whole of the subscriptions aggregated only 584 yen. Had there not been a balance from the preceding year, it is hard to see what Mr. J. Cooper Robinson, the Treasurer and Superintendent, could have done. An appeal for aid is made this year, and it well deserves to be successful.

THE EDUCATIONAL PROBLEM.

The clever cartoonist of the Fiji Shimpō illustrates the educational problem by means of a closed gate having Count Kabayama's head for gargoyles. Outside the portals stand two strikingly disconsolate figures, one a Japanese promoter of private schools, the other a missionary.

A leading article in the same issue discusses this educational question with all the robust liberality and common sense for which the Fiji is remarkable. The arguments, however, present no new feature. One interesting point insisted on by our contemporary is that the organization of the High Council of Education should be radically altered. Out of the 43 members now constituting the Council, 24 are connected, directly or indirectly, with the Imperial University, or with Government schools, and 7 hold official appointments. In short, three-fourths of the Council's personnel are not free to cast an unbiased vote. A complete re-organization is necessary, the Fiji thinks, so as to make the Council representative of independent public opinion.

That estimate of the Council's composition is not reassuring, for it suggests that in voting for the extremely illiberal and unwise measures recently submitted to it, the Council—or, at any rate, the majority of the Council—believed that it was acting in accordance with the Government's wishes. We should be sorry to think that the Government entertained such views.

OFFICIAL APPOINTMENTS.

Important changes in the organization of the Foreign Office are predicted by the Mainichi Shimbun. They consist chiefly in abolishing some of the present bureaux, and establishing in their place a Bureau of European Affairs, a Bureau of American Affairs, and a Bureau of Asiatic Affairs. It is further said that extensive alterations of personnel will be effected.

Mr. Oyama Tsunasuke, Minister en disponibilité, has been gazetted to represent Japan in Rome, and Mr. Makino, now Minister in Italy, is transferred to Vienna, combining the latter post with that of Representative in Switzerland. Mr. Takahira is ordered home, and it is understood that he will be appointed Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs on his arrival in Tokyo.

A SINGULAR COMMUNITY.

A very curious community is that of a village called Kohime-mura, Shiga Prefecture. It contains about 60 houses; agriculture is prosperous, and the people are well-to-do. They never lend even a sen, nor will they deposit money in banks. They do not cultivate the acquaintance of other villagers, and, there being no way to spend money, they vie with one another in making their buildings and surroundings as imposing as possible, so as to show their wealth. Perhaps the fact of being so comfortable leads them to a special abhorrence of the idea of death, which they carry to such an extent that they will never use the word.

JAPANESE DOLMENS.

READERS of Japan's ancient history have been taught by modern critics to relegate to the region of fable JIMMU Tenno and his doings, together with the whole tale of his provenance, and the narrative of events during the centuries immediately succeeding his era. The outlines of these various incidents are so blurred by clouds of myth and legend that it becomes almost impossible to decipher their true forms, and thus sinologues and sceptics have deemed it wisest to tear the early pages from Japan's so-called "history," and not to consider it seriously until it deals with incidents some thirteen centuries after the days of Jimmu.

A measure of light has been thrown upon this question by Mr. W. GOWLAND'S recent researches in the field of archaeology. The evidence obtained by him from the dolmens and barrows of the early Japanese tends to partly rehabilitate the history which we have hitherto been disposed to discard as fabulous.

What is it that Japanese annals have to tell us about the nation's primæval ancestors? It is a simple story when we separate the kernel of fact from the shell of fancy. A certain race of men, highly civilized in comparison with the general level of their time, discovered the islands of Japan. They came from the south, and, striking the southern part of Kiushiu, landed to find a fair country, covered with luxuriant vegetation, but sparsely populated by semi-savages. These lived like beasts of the field, had no organized form of government, and were incapable of offering serious resistance to the over-sea invaders, who thus established themselves without much difficulty in the island now known as Kiushiu, or the Nine Provinces. But in the main island a footing had already been gained by a race very different from the primæval barbarians whom the invaders of Kiushiu found there. The head quarters of this race were at Izumo, and they claimed to be the rulers of the whole country. It was necessary, therefore, that the immigrants from the south should either subdue or make a pact with the Izumo Court. They attempted to adopt the latter course. Envoys were sent to Izumo. The first of them, bribed by the Izumo folk, made his home in the land he had been sent to reconnoitre. The second forgot his duty in the arms of an Izumo beauty whose hair reached to the ground. The third, faithful to his charge, refused to be tempted by love or guerdon, and was put to death by the Izumo rulers. War ensued. The southern invaders broke the power of the Izumo Court and received its submission. But they did not transfer their own court to the newly conquered district. Ignorant that Izumo was a mere fraction of the main island, they imagined that no more regions remained to be annexed. By and by, intelligence reached them, by routes about which the annals are virtually silent, that away in the north-east a race of highly civilized men, who had originally come from beyond the sea in ships, were settled, holding undisputed sway. To conquer these colonists another expedition was fitted out in Kiushiu. JIMMU became its leader. His campaign lasted 15 years, and ended, after some fierce fighting, in the submission of the Yamato rulers. They were not altogether shattered. A timely discovery of their consanguinity with the invaders saved them from the worst results of conquest.

Setting aside the semi-savage aborigines whom the southern invaders found in Kiushiu, we trace here the marks of three tides of immigration: one which found its bourn at Izumo on the south-western shore of the main island; one which reached the south-eastern shore at Yamato, and one which surged against the southern island, Kiushiu. It is easy to suppose that the Kiushiu and Yamato colonists both travelled, at different epochs, by an ocean railway which existed then as it does now—the Black Stream (Kuro-shiwo). Setting out from the South Pacific, it touches at Kiushiu, and, sweeping thence to the north-east, passes within sight of Yamato before it permanently leaves the main island of Japan. As for the Izumo folk, they doubtless crossed from Korea. Geology and geography are generally referred to by analysts of these events. There is a chain of islets which form a kind of causeway between Japan and Korea. This is pointed to as a probable route for nomads journeying from the latter to the former in remote ages. Again, evidences exist that the Far-Eastern quarter of the globe once passed through a glacial epoch, and it may be assumed that the sea dividing the Japanese islands from the Asiatic continent was then bridged with ice. Thus there is no difficulty in conceiving lines of communication. But in truth the necessity for these hypotheses is not apparent. Japan seems to have been always accessible from Korea, however primitive the means of access. In the very earliest times Koreans crossed to Japan and Japanese to Korea. No testimony furnished from any source suggests a state of affairs so rude that these peoples could not reach each other except by creeping from islet to islet, or by waiting till the ice of a glacial epoch built bridges across the ocean. The foreign policy of Japan, as tradition and history first reveal her to us, consisted in combating attempts made by the Tartars in the north and the Koreans in the south to support the resistance offered by the islands' aboriginal tribes to their Japanese invaders. It is a natural inference that intercourse had continuously existed between these peoples on the East Asiatic sea-board and the insular tribes they thus assisted. That point, however, does not immediately concern us.

Let us now see what the latest witness, archaeology, has to say, under examination by Mr. GOWLAND.

The ancient Japanese buried their dead first in barrows and afterwards in dolmens. By "ancient Japanese" we do not mean the Ainu, or semi-savage tribes whom the Japanese invaders found in the islands. We mean the Japanese invaders themselves. The builders of the barrows were in the bronze age of civilization; the constructors of the dolmens had attained the iron age. The barrows contain weapons and implements of bronze and vessels of hand-made pottery; the dolmens, weapons and implements of iron and vessels of wheel-turned pottery. There is an absolute line of division. No iron weapon or machine-made pottery is found in a barrow; no bronze weapon or hand-made pottery in a dolmen. Hence it seems evident that the evolution of dolmen from barrow did not take place in Japan. The dolmen-builders must have completely emerged from the bronze age and given up the barrow-burial fashion before they reached Japan. Otherwise we should inevitably have some transition form between the barrow and the dolmen, and we should find some iron implements in the barrows and bronze weapons in the dolmens. But it does not appear that the barrow-builders and the dolmen-constructors were two distinct races. Mr. GOWLAND says—and there is every reason to endorse his dictum—that the forms of the metal work and other objects found in the barrows and in the dolmens show such continuity from first to last as to compel the conclusion that barrow-builders and dolmen-constructors belonged to the same race. Thus we come finally to two tides of immigration from the same source, but separated by such an interval of time that the second immigrants brought with them a much higher type of civilization than the first.

That result tallies exactly with the narrative contained in Japanese written annals; the narrative which reveals Jimmu as the leader of the last band of immigrants, represents him as conquering the previous immigrants who had established themselves in Yamato, and tells us that he recognised men of his own race in the settlers whom he conquered.

We shall not here attempt to pursue further the interesting line of speculation suggested by Mr. GOWLAND'S researches, the results of which he has set forth minutely and with scientific insight in the Journal of the Society of Arts, and briefly but succinctly in the Proceedings of the London Asiatic Society. It might be supposed that the dolmen would possess value as an aid in identifying the Japanese with some people of Continental Asia, for the dolmen of Japan is "a highly specialized form of megalithic structure," and were it in common use by any two nations, their consanguinity, or, at any rate, their immemorial intercourse, might reasonably be conjectured. But in that respect the dolmen augments our perplexity instead of removing it. For though similar megalithic structures have been traced from the Crimea and Circassia through Central Asia to India, where they are widely distributed, none has yet been found in China, and the Korean type is essentially distinct. How then, did the dolmen-builders reach Japan if their path lay neither through China nor through Korea? Is it conceivable that they came over-sea from India without finding any temporary home along the route? And how singular it is that the distribution of the European dolmens should create cognate bewilderment. For, whereas the dolmen is found all through Western Europe from Scandinavia to Portugal, whence it crosses into Africa, and there occurs frequently in Morocco, Algeria, and Tunis, no dolmens are found in eastern Europe beyond Saxony, nor do they re-appear until we reach the Crimea and Circassia. Ethnologists have never succeeded in suggesting any working theory to account for this strange irregularity of distribution, and the Japanese dolmen accentuates the puzzle. In short, invaluable as are Mr. GOWLAND'S archaeological researches for the sake of the light they throw on the manners and customs of the ancient Japanese, and interesting as is the testimony they bear to the accuracy of Japan's early history, they do not help us much to answer the great questions, whence did the Japanese come originally and who were their ancestors?

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

Briefly stated, the following are the conclusions that the Rev. E. Schiller reaches in reference to Japanese Christianity in the last of his series of articles on this subject published in the Shinri. Although theoretically the establishment of a special form of Christianity by Japanese Churches would seem to be both possible and natural, in practice it is found that the difficulties in the way are very great. There are two parties which object to the embodiment of the chief elements of the Christian religion in any system designed to become thoroughly national. These may be called the moralists and the extreme rationalists. The moralists, while appreciating the moral excellence of Christianity, see no use in what may be designated its strictly religious elements—its doctrine of sin and revelations about God. If they are told that the ethical part of Christianity cannot be used with effect when separated from the religious part, they reply that in that case they must rely on Confucian and Buddhist ethical teaching and let Christianity alone. The extreme rationalists argue away all the distinctive elements of the Christian creed and render it quite useless as an instrument for reform and a guide in life. I am not in favour of trying to establish an irrational form of Christianity, says Mr. Schiller, but at the same time I am opposed to a form of Christianity in which reason banishes faith, which is all head and no heart. In the Japanese Christianity which I desire to see established faith and reason must have equal power; the intellect and the emotions must be alike satisfied. It seems to me that there are sufficient grounds for the Japanese seeking to establish their own special form of Christianity. As a nation the Japanese are distinct, and the colour and tone of their thoughts cannot but give a special tinge to the creed which has been brought to them from the west. For the thorough nationalisation of Christianity, however, it is necessary that Christian Japanese poets should blend Japanese sentiment and Christian teaching in their verses; that artists of skill should portray scenes connected with Christian life as lived now or in ancient times; that architects should design churches whose appearance would suit native taste, and that musicians should train the native ear so as to enable it to appreciate divine melodies. But these things cannot be forced. They must grow naturally, that is, be produced by the spirit of the times. In addition to this, for the nationalisation of Christianity in Japan, it is essential that Christian schools should be established that are not mission schools. Care should be taken to christianise, as it were, all important national festival days, such as the Tenchō-setsu, the Kigen-setsu, and the Shōkōnsai. Such occasions should be utilised for holding meetings of Christians, and special allusions should be made to the historical event celebrated. All long-established and honoured customs should as far as possible be perpetuated in some form or other in the National Christian creed. But care will have to be taken that Christians do not go too far. In paying respect to the dead, for instance, there should be no burning of incense, as this is invariably associated with worship.

Pessimism and eloquence often go together in Japan as elsewhere, the reason being, no doubt, that pessimistic writers are in earnest; and in the case of practised writers earnestness is wont to become the artificer of powerful language. We have an illustration of this in the pages of No. 147 of the Bukkyō, where the essayist, who is evidently a devout Buddhist, pours forth pages of lamentation over the decay of faith among his fellow-religionists. The language is unusually taking and has the effect of producing deep sadness on the mind of the sympathetic reader. The complaint that the Bukkyō has to make against all Buddhist sects alike may be told in a few sentences. Everywhere there is pretence and show, ceremony and high-sounding words, but no real faith or earnestness. The priests are like whitened sepulchres that within are full of uncleanness. Neither in the old Buddhism nor in the new is there anything hopeful. The young priests who have gone out into the world are far more interested in the money-making schemes which they carry on in secret than in the instruction of the people who attend their preaching. There is much more in the same strain.

The Bukkyō quotes a very sensible article from a newspaper called the Kyōto, which discusses the wholesale and irrational manner in which everything Christian is condemned by certain leaders of Buddhist opinion. The Kyōto says that the proverb, "when a priest is hateful he is hateful even to the garment that he wears," may be applied to the manner in which Christianity is treated by some Buddhist zealots. It is not only the Christian creed that is hated, but the foreigners who profess it, and this fact may, if not guarded against, lead to some very undesirable consequences in the near future. A large amount of anti-foreign feeling is caused by the stupid notion that it is the duty of loyal Buddhists to speak evil of Christianity and its professors. Educated Buddhists should place the real situation before the ignorant masses and explain to them that it will be impossible for mixed residence to prove a success if the religion of foreigners is spoken of in an insulting manner. The majority of priests, says the Kyōto, are quite unconscious of any responsibility that attaches to them in this matter, and hence steps should be taken by the authorities to instruct them as to their duties. This is a State affair, as it may result in undesirable complications.

* * *

It is said that what is known in Japan as shinjū or jōshi (情死), the simultaneous suicide of two lovers, is on the increase, and that Buddhist teaching is responsible for the state of mind which makes such a tragical ending to the lives of young people possible. The Taiyō, in No. 6, discusses this question in the following terms: The idea which these desperate lovers have is that the union which is denied them here will be consummated in paradise, as is expressed in two well-known proverbs: 一蓮花生 ichiren tanshō, "Both dwell together in one lotus-flower,"—(that is, in paradise),—and Oya-ko wa isse; fūfu wa ni se. "The relationship of parent and child extends over one life but that of husband and wife over two lives" (this life and the next). That Buddhist teaching is pessimistic there can be no manner of doubt, says the Taiyō, but to say that this teaching accounts altogether for the existence of lovers' suicide is going too far. Gloomy views of the affairs of this world, arising as they do from the feeling that nothing is as good as it might be, imply that the persons who hold such views have an ideal, and this of itself is to be regarded as preferable to satisfaction with imperfect attainments. Ordinary pessimism would not of itself lead to suicide. It is plain that there is something peculiar in the mental condition of the young people who perpetrate jōshi. The spirit which conduces to suicide is older than Buddhism, and is deep-seated in the national character. Undoubtedly belief in the transmigration of souls helps persons whose love affairs have reached a point where death seems the only happy exit from an unbearable situation to summon courage for the last dire act, but the tendency to lapse into despondency and to resort to desperate measures rather than bear prolonged anguish is one of our national characteristics. It can hardly be said that Buddhism has sufficient influence at the present day to cause any such phenomenon as the one under discussion. If the practice is actually on the increase, it seems more natural to attribute it to the general unrest of the age, to the lack of any true conception of the good uses to which this life of ours may be put, to the tendency to resent any kind of curb on the desires, rather than to the direct influence of Buddhist teaching.

The Shintō organ, the Kyōrin, expresses great anxiety as to the fate of the memorial which was presented to the Diet and accepted by it during the last session. It will be remembered that this memorial petitioned the Government to give to Shintō shrines a rank above all other places of worship and to create a special bureau to take charge of the Imperial mausolea and other sacred places. The Kyōrin fears that the present Government is not likely to regard with favour any such scheme as that embodied in the memorial, and appeals to the general public to bring what pressure is possible to bear on the question.

The Kyōiku Jiron is astounded to find that the Education Department is still uncertain as to the policy to be pursued in reference to allowing religion to be taught in schools. The course advocated by this organ is the banishment of religion from all elementary schools of every kind, and the granting of permission to teach religion in private middle schools. Seeing that in most European countries care is taken to keep religion out of elementary schools, says the Kyōiku Jiron, there is no reason why Japan should depart from her traditional practice, at the instigation of a few narrow-minded agitators.

The Yomiuri Shimbun is to be commended for its diligence in collecting and publishing the opinions of foreign residents and visitors on things Japanese. We have already several times given epitomes of its articles entitled "Japan as seen by Foreign Eyes." But we have by no means exhausted the list. In articles Nos. 41, 42, and 43 of the series, we find Professor von Koeber's opinions given. Professor von Koeber evidently holds decided views on that much-disputed question: Is there any religious sentiment with the normal Japanese? This question Professor von Koeber answers in the negative, as so many observant students of Japanese thought and life have already done. The Professor's observations on this subject as quoted in the Yomiuri Shimbun, may be summarised as follows:—The Japanese have no religion. Buddhism is a religion in India, but in Japan it has lost its religious character. I have inquired of a number of scholars as to the leading features of Japanese Buddhism, and find no agreement between the different answers given. A religion that, when adopted in another country, is so changed as to be almost unrecognisable by those who are acquainted with its original form suffers a loss of identity. Even among the priests of Japan there are very few that know anything about the real teaching of the Buddhist scriptures, and hence it goes without saying that the laity as a whole know next to nothing of Buddhist doctrine. There being no religion in the Japanese mind, the teaching of morality is found to be a very difficult undertaking. The students of the Imperial University are a fair specimen of the state of mind of the whole nation. They have no religious belief of any kind.* When I have occasion to speak to them on the subject of religion, they evince great interest, but at the same time show how crude are their ideas by talking about founding a religion for themselves. Such remarks are not only a proof that the normal Japanese has no religion, but show that he has no conception of what real religion is. The comparatively small influence of Buddhist teaching on the lives of the Japanese is a proof of the uncongeniality of the soil in which Buddhist seed has been sown. One of the professed objects of Buddhism is to teach men how to overcome their desires and lusts. This it certainly has not done in Japan. . . . Since Japan has not adopted Christianity, it may be said to be without a religion. . . . In my opinion Christianity is the only religion in the world (ware wa Kirisuto-kyō no hoka ni sekai ni shūkyō wa nai to omou).† Buddhism is a philosophy with a religious basis, but is not a religion. Christianity, whether as regards its philosophy or its ethics, excels all else in the world. All philosophy since the days of the Greeks that has kept free from error has had the existence of God as its basis. Philosophy in Europe may be said to be the gate by which men approach Christianity. . . . Having adopted our civilisation, Japan must adopt our religion, or she cannot grow into a great nation. . . . Japan has Confucianism. But Confucianism grew out of, and has ever been associated with, a different type of civilisation from that which Japan has adopted. Japan needs a religion one of whose leading characteristics is individuality. . . . Japanese society has elected not to receive Christianity, but individuals receive it, and in my opinion will continue to do so. . . . It is quite impossible for Oriental civilisation to overcome Occidental civilisation. What is the principle that gives to our Occidental civilisation its pre-eminence? It is individuality—the importance attached to each member of the community. Japanese family life is anti-progressive, and implies the existence of feelings and practices that must be regarded as drawbacks. The desire to preserve the family line leads to the use of concubines—an evil with far-reaching consequences. Moreover, the Japanese family system is responsible for a large amount of servility. The system teaches the subjection of relations to each other to an extent that crushes all the independence out of the minds of a large section of the nation. The Japanese will find that our western civilisation is not complete without Christianity and the principles to which it has given birth.

Under the title of "Government and Religion," Mr. Shimada, the editor of the Mainichi Shimbun, has, in a series of articles, been discussing the policy which ought to be pursued by the Government in the matter of religion. As there seems to be no small amount of uncertainty both in official and non-official circles as to the measures which it is desirable the Government should adopt for meeting the altered situation which the operation of the new treaties is bound to create, and as Mr. Shimada is one of the leading advocates of the adoption of a liberal policy, his observations are worth transcribing in an abbreviated form. Mr. Shimada expresses surprise at the action of the Diet during its Thirteenth Session in reference to the Sugamo prison episode and at the constant anti-Christian, pro-Buddhist, or pro-Shintō agitations that have been made during the past 12 months. These things show, says Mr. Shimada, that the party which is in favour of shutting the country against foreigners is by no means extinct. The Occidental civilisation which we have adopted is evidently a very fragile thing, and may be compared to the blossom of the juniper tree which the slightest change of temperature causes to wither. Unless we can devise some means of giving greater stability to what we have taken the pains to introduce into this country, our reputation as a nation entitled to rank high in the world will never be established. The advocates of Government interference with religion in any shape or form fail to read the spirit of the times in the West and fail to comprehend the meaning of our Constitution. Such books as that of Dr. Inoue Tetsujirō's "The Conflict between Education and Religion" are on the wrong track, and display a fundamental misconception of the leading principles of enlightened Constitutional Government. . . . Whatever allusions of a mere formal kind to God and to religion Western Constitutions may contain, and whatever indications of a certain amount of still existing connection between Church and State there may be in these documents, our Constitution is most pronounced in the opposite direction. It is specially worthy of notice that the Emperor in promulgating the Constitution made no attempt whatever to connect the government of the country with religion by any allusion to a religious basis for the authority which His Majesty wields. The introductory words of the Constitution are significant. "Whereas, We make it the joy and glory of Our heart to behold the prosperity of Our country, and the welfare of Our Subjects, We do hereby, in virtue of the supreme power We inherit from Our Imperial Ancestors, promulgate the present immutable fundamental law, for the sake of Our present subjects and their descendants." . . . "The rights of sovereignty of the State, We have inherited from Our Ancestors, and We shall bequeath them to Our descendants, neither We nor they shall in future fail to wield them in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution hereby granted." Article 28 provides that "Japanese subjects shall, within limits not prejudicial to peace and order, and not antagonistic to their duties as subjects, enjoy freedom of religious belief." What room is there for controversy on this subject? And what call is there for all the fuss that is being made about according to religions the title of Kōnin-kyō (Publicly-acknowledged Religions). All religions that are professed in this country are evidently acknowledged by the law of the land. Freedom of religious belief means surely freedom to adopt any religion one pleases. The clamour for Government interference is dictated by a consciousness of weakness on the part of Buddhists and Shintoists, who fear the consequences of further competition

* Professor von Koeber is speaking of the students as a whole. He is doubtless aware of the fact that there are a few professing Christians among the students.—(WRITER OF THE SUMMARY.)

† This seems to be a very singular statement for Professor von Koeber to make. It is possible that he has been misunderstood. We can hardly conceive that any educated man would venture to espouse such a bigoted theory at the close of the Nineteenth Century.—(WRITER OF THE SUMMARY.)

with Christianity. Whatever government patronage these religions have obtained in the past has invariably ended in corrupting them. They do not prosper among us because they are out of harmony with our innermost feelings and aspirations as a nation. . . . But I do not advocate any crusade against either Confucianism, Buddhism, or Shintō. It is better to allow them to die a natural death. I am in favour of no efforts being made to push this religious doctrine or that, but of allowing men to make their own selection in a quiet and unconstrained manner. . . . As for the class of writers who argue in favour of a narrow national, anti-foreign policy, who do nothing but express regret that we have borrowed anything from the West, it is impossible to exaggerate the harm they are doing. They are dwarfing the life of the nation, poisoning the minds of those who pay attention to them, recommending a return to barbarism. In the modern literary world there are no greater transgressors than these writers.*

Dr. Morita Kumato, a well-known Professor of the Dōshisha, died on February 22nd last after a short illness. The following is a record of his life. He entered Captain James' Kumamoto school in 1871, and graduated there in 1875, after having confessed the Christian faith. He then entered the Dōshisha and was further instructed in Christian doctrine by Messrs. Nijima, Learned, and Davis. He graduated at the Dōshisha in 1879 and was employed there as a teacher till 1889, when he went to America and studied philosophy at the Yale University under Professor Ladd. He subsequently (in 1892) received the degree of Doctor of Philosophy from that University for an original essay on Oriental Philosophy. He returned to the Dōshisha as a teacher in the Divinity College, but later severed his connection with that college, and devoted himself to teaching literature and philosophy and laboured to establish a special Literary and Philosophical Department connected with the Institution to which he had given all his best days. He was engaged in making arrangements for the carrying out of this scheme when he was overtaken by the illness which carried him off at the early age of 42.

The Kirisutokyō Shimbun publishes some observations of the late Count Katsu on moral feeling and attainments which are of considerable interest because quite unconventional. We give a few extracts, as far as possible in the Count's own words:—At the beginning of the Meiji era there was nobody that approved of the course I took, not even my own wife and children, but this did not concern me one whit. I had made up my mind that there is a clear path of duty for every man and that path I determined to follow. I did not trouble myself even with the question, who is going to complete my work after I am gone? It is not for a man to concern himself about such problems. I felt that as long as I was not directly instrumental in causing my own death nothing mattered. I could work as hard as I liked. . . . I have come to the conclusion that there is nothing in the world to be compared to mental energy. Without this other mental qualities accomplish little.* It is amusing nowadays to hear people talking about the power of a meat diet or some other kind of nourishing food. But the men who go in for this kind of living are mostly lacking in mental energy, and hence accomplish little. Then there are some who are everlastingly preaching the necessity of doing everything according to rule—so many hours for sleep, so many for work, and so many for exercise. All things great and small are prescribed by people of this kind, and they think that by all their minute calculation and their distribution of time they are going to work miracles, ignorant of the fact that it is man's mental energy that is the prime motor of all effective action, and that no tinkering with subsidiary forces or organs will make up for spiritlessness. . . . When I was about 20 years of age I commenced to study the Zen doctrines at the Kōtokuji, in Ushijima. While in company with a number of priests I sat in religious meditation, the head-priest would come along with a big stick in his hand, and after casting his eyes around would suddenly strike one of us a heavy blow on the side, which rolled the victim over on the floor. The meaning of this was plain to us all. Under pretence of being absorbed in religious meditation, we had allowed our thoughts to wander off to money, to feasting, to women. This blow dealt to one of our fellows served to remind us of our own delinquencies and we instantly turned our thoughts into the right channels again. But the effects of even this severe method of awakening wore off, and after a few years I failed to take any notice of the occurrence. For four years I practised severe religious austerities, learnt how to concentrate my thoughts on one subject and how to deny myself those things that men call pleasures, and was all the better for the discipline. After having undergone privations of no ordinary kind, the inconveniences and trials of everyday life seemed trivial to me. It is comparison that makes things appear light or heavy. Thanks to the indifference to earthly things which I learnt during those four years, I was able to meet all the great crises of my life with an unperturbed mind. Though often threatened with the assassin's dagger, I did not swerve from my course one inch on that account. I only concerned myself with my duty. Whether I succeeded or failed was not my affair. As long as I followed my ideal, success and failure were alike indifferent to me. I emptied my heart of all special desires, and just went on acting in the way that seemed to me right, and as a result of all this I have lived to see the nation survive the struggles of her new birth and to see her grow with all the vigour of healthy youth. I have come to the conclusion that no great thing can be accomplished by persons whose minds are worried by small affairs. Hence the

* There is a remarkable similarity between what Count Katsu says here and that oft-quoted observation of Sir Thomas Powell Buxton. "The longer I live the more I am certain that the great difference between men, between the feeble and the powerful, the great and the insignificant, is energy—invincible determination—a purpose once fixed and then death or victory! That quality will do anything that can be done in this world, and no talents, no circumstances, no opportunities, will make a two-legged creature a man without it."—[WRITER OF SUMMARY.]

cultivation of perfect mental composure under the most trying ordeals should be the object of all who are desirous of carrying out any great purpose. This perfect calmness in the midst of the most exciting events has always characterised the best generals.* . . . It is utter forgetfulness of self, and utter indifference to what fate may be in store for one—it is thorough absorption in the cause to the promotion of which one's whole life and energy are devoted that produces the calm equanimity of which I have spoken above. . . . The end of all knowledge and all attainment is to know how to get rid of self and become lost in the contemplation of greater subjects. (Mattaku satori no kyokudo wa muga [無我] gori hoha nashi. "The actual ne plus ultra of knowledge is no other than thorough disinterestedness.") Men may speak of principles or of moral systems, but a final analysis resolves them all into perfect unselfishness. . . . There are many different opinions on religious and moral subjects. I am not for setting one against the other. As regards myself I listen to all others have to say without opposition, and after careful thought adopt what I think worthy of adoption. . . . A man who fears death is not worthy of being called a man. But on the other hand to be in a hurry to die is a great mistake. Japanese are very sensitive, and hence often wish to escape from their troubles by means of death. On the other hand when there is nothing to vex them they fear death. Neither state of mind is to be commended.

The Kumiai Churches have been celebrating the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the sect. Apropos of this, No. 815 of the Kirisutokyō Shimbun gives a history of the remarkable progress made by the sect during a quarter of a century. Some fifteen or sixteen years ago, says the organ we are quoting, the most advanced of Japanese Protestant sects as regards the number of converts was the Ichi Kyōkai (United Presbyterian Church). At that time their adherents more than doubled those of the Congregationalists, as well as those of the Episcopalians and Methodists. During the following seven or eight years the progress made by all the sects was extraordinary, but that of the Kumiai Churches was specially so. They far out-ran the Episcopalians and Methodists, and came up to the level of the Presbyterians. The chief causes that contributed to this may be set down as follows:—(1) The presence in our midst of men like Mr. Nijima. (2) The impetus given to religion by the graduates of Capt. James' Kumamoto School, many of whom entered the Dōshisha and gave a new tone to that institution. (3) The establishment and work of the Dōshisha, which may be regarded as the 本山 honsan, or headquarters of our sect. (4) The adoption of nationalistic principles by the sect. In this we were one with the Nihon Kirisutokyō Churches, which from very early days preached unsectarianism and freedom from foreign control. The other churches aimed at perpetuating Occidental forms and ceremonies, and, notwithstanding that some members of these churches desired to sever their connection with the foreign Mission Boards, they were unable to effect their purpose to their heart's content, though in some cases they reduced the closeness of the relationship considerably. As out-and-out advocates of the entire independence of native churches of any and every kind of foreign interference the Kumiai Kyōkai stands alone. Their adoption of nationalism as a guiding principle has undoubtedly had much to do with their success. But the Kumiai churches have suffered from the weaknesses incident to their virtues. Champions of freedom of thought and inquiry, the Christians belonging to this sect have lived to discover that in no body have there been more frequent changes of belief on the part of individuals. (Shinkō no ugoki wa, shinkō jiyu no huikei mottomo hiroku katsu Nihon teki naru ga yue, Nihon no chikagoro no fūchō ni kansuru tokoro mottomo ōki ga yue to sesarubekaranu). The unsettled state of belief which is manifest everywhere is the unavoidable result of the extent of the liberty allowed. Considered in this connection the failure of the Dōshisha is by no means difficult to explain. The history of our sect during the past 25 years is full of lessons which call for earnest attention on this festive occasion.

* The allusion here is evidently to Dr. Inouye Tetsujirō and other learned promoters of the Nippon Shugi movement, and accounts for the extreme aversion with which Mr. Shimada is regarded by this school of writers.—[WRITER OF THE SUMMARY.]

* In confirmation of this remark it is said that Wellington was never calmer than when to others the difficulties of his situation seemed insurmountable, and that throughout his long career he never once displayed the faintest sign of flurry.—[WRITER OF THE SUMMARY.]

KOREAN AFFAIRS.

There is evidently a great deal of hesitation on the part of Japanese business-men about taking up the concession for the Sōul-Fusan railway. The line ought to pay. After the Sōul-Chemulpo road, it must be considered to have the best prospects of any railway in the Peninsula, for it traverses populous districts, and should command a large amount of goods and passenger traffic. But the Japanese look askance at it. Journalists advocate its construction and go so far as to assert—as the Nichi Nichi Shimbun does in a recent issue—that the State should step in and furnish the necessary assistance; but, judging from present appearances, there is very little chance of any practical step being taken. The fact is there is no money in Japan for such enterprizes; nor is it easy to see when there will be any money. Seven per cent. can be obtained at home on unimpeachable security, and there is no occasion to go abroad for a doubtful six. Tokyo journals talk of public spirit, and suggest that a political obligation devolves upon the people not to be altogether left out of the railway race in which the countries of the West engage so eagerly. Political obligations of that nature have never been recognised by private capitalists in the history of the world. Japan lacks financial strength to equip herself with railways, and it seems extravagant that she should think of undertaking to equip other States. Want of money is crippling her in all directions. It is very well for her to aim at being the England of the Far East, but—as the Nichi Nichi Shimbun shrewdly remarked in a recent issue—she differs from England in one essential respect, namely, that, whereas the British Government is fully occupied trying to keep up with the enterprise of its own people in Asia and Africa, and in fact, all parts of the world, the Japanese do nothing abroad without governmental assistance, governmental initiative, or governmental inspiration. If we dig deep enough into the strata of human achievements we invariably come to the bed-rock of gold. Money is indispensable in everything. If Japan were richer, she would be playing a very different part just now. It is a great pity for her sake that the cutting up of her big neighbour can not be deferred until she is ready to pay for a place at the dissecting table.

The discussion about the opening of Pyōng-yang is still in progress. Sōk-ho-chōng, which the Korean Government desires to substitute, is a comparatively insignificant place, some 12 or 14 miles distant. It has no commercial recommendation. The Japanese Government is said to have originally asked that not only should Pyōng-yang be thrown open, but also that mixed residence should be allowed everywhere within the limits of the town. The latter proposal was modified, however, in deference to objections advanced by Korea, and it was considered sufficient, for temporary purposes at all events, that the quarter adjacent to the Ta-dong river should be assigned for foreign residential purposes. But the newly adopted attitude of the Korean Government threatens to upset all these arrangements. As to the probable cause of Korea's objections, the only theory advanced is that Russia opposed the opening of Talien to foreign trade, since such a step would have interfered with her designs upon Liaotung, so she now wants to prevent the growth of large foreign interests at Pyōng-yang. That is a Japanese journalistic theory. We do not pretend to pronounce any opinion on its correctness.

The Korean Government has shown a disposition to retract its promise about the opening of Pyōng-yang to foreign trade. It proposes to substitute Sōk-ho-chōng. There is a great difference between the two places. Sōk-ho-chōng is an insignificant and squalid town, with no redeeming feature except its water facilities. Pyōng-yang is an important commercial mart, and there are already over a hundred Japanese merchants settled there, and they, as well as others, have made various preparations in confident expectation of the opening of the port. The Tokyo Government is consequently unwilling to permit the proposed substitution, and Korea will doubtless be held to her original engagement.

CHINESE AFFAIRS.

Among the various matters which find a place in the China Blue Book recently issued by the British Government is a note taken regarding the "excellent state of order and cleanliness" in which the Japanese left their quarters at Wei-hai-wei, and Admiral Seymour adds that "a large quantity of furniture was also left behind for the use of our officers and men, which has much contributed to their comfort on taking up their new duties." For this courtesy and consideration Sir E. Satow, our Minister to Japan, formally thanked the Japanese Foreign Minister.

Sir Claude Macdonald, the British Minister to China, is suffering from heart disease. The story of his being affected with varnish-poisoning is denied.

The Hongkong Daily Press says that the four-cent letter rate—ocean penny postages—was forced on Hongkong by Downing Street, and declares that Hongkong rate-payers have to contribute to the cost of the ammunition granted annually to the Shanghai Volunteers, while Shanghai does not pay anything for the Inspecting Officer who goes up every year.

Mr. George Jameson, C.M.G., lately British Consul General at Shanghai, has joined the board of the Peking Syndicate.

According to the native correspondent of the N. C. Daily News at Peking, China is now ruled by two Manchus—namely, the Grand Secretary Jung Lu and the Assistant Grand Secretary Kan Yi. The Empress Dowager defers implicitly to the advice of these two men, who are clever enough to give the credit and responsibility of all their decisions to the Empress Dowager. The great ambition of Jung Lu is to be proclaimed Grand Generalissimo of the forces of the whole Empire, and he has been working his best to bring the 70,000 or 80,000 men under his special command in Chihli province up to the best state possible, as far as within him lies, in regard to modern equipments and discipline. Hence he does not often interfere in purely civil departmental matters, these being generally left to Kang Yi, who has the reputation of being a bigot and the bitterest enemy of the Reform Party. Jung Lu, who is more of a soldier, being the nearest living relation of the Empress Dowager, has naturally the most influence over her. He is much less of a bigot, and has hitherto always counselled moderation and effectually prevented the sword and fire policy of Kang Yi against the Reform Party—and against all foreigners, for that matter. Jung Lu, therefore, possesses more popularity amongst the masses than any half-a-dozen mandarins put together in Peking.

Another European has died at Shanghai from hydrophobia. Police Constable Ellefsen, on the 22nd of March, was bitten by an undoubtedly rabid dog in the compound at the Hongkew Station. Every precaution possible was taken, and he was never told that it had been proved that the dog was suffering from rabies. Mr. Ellefsen was a native of Germany, had only been some twelve months in the Municipal service, and was greatly respected by all who knew him.

A Shanghai contemporary mentions that an Edict of the 23rd April with reference to the projected conservation of the Yellow River, approves of the recommendation of the Board of Revenue to move the inhabitants living in the vicinity of the proposed works to some higher ground, some distance away, in order to leave the reclamation districts clear, and that the sum of Tls. 400,000 be transmitted before the middle of May next to the Governor of Shantung, for the purpose of purchasing sites for building houses as well as arable land for the people transported in this connection. Further, that another sum of Tls. 600,000 be paid to the said Governor before the middle of July next to be used in the purchase of materials for the proposed works. These two sums, which will aggregate one million two, are to be drawn without delay and transmitted at the appointed dates to their destination by the various Viceroys of provinces from their respective reserve funds by law established. Any delay in sending said amounts will be punished with a double penalty, as this is a matter which concerns the safety of the lives of millions of the inhabitants of the province of Shantung. Similar punishments will also be given to such officials as are entrusted with the purchase of land for the transported inhabitants and for materials, who shall be found to have been guilty of dishonesty. As soon as the above-noted purchases have been made the Board of Revenue undertakes to have ready the balance of two million taels required for the preliminary conservation works as reported upon by Li Hung-chang and his colleagues.

The following extract from the China Blue Book is very interesting, being a striking example of the way in which the Taungli Yamen delighs to work. It is contained in a despatch from Sir Claude Macdonald to Lord Salisbury dated October 17:—"I ascertained on very good authority that one of the Ministers who came with Prince Ching to see me on the 5th Oct. had stated that it was entirely due to my initiative and advice that Legation guards had been sent for. He also told my informant that M. Pavloff, Russian Chargé d'Affaires, had stated at a meeting which he had with the Tsung-li Yamén on the 4th inst. that he personally was averse to the bringing up of these guards, and thought it a great mistake, but that he was obliged to order them up as I had ordered up mine. This being so diametrically opposed to what M. Pavloff had said at the meeting of the foreign Representatives, I called upon him and informed him of what I had heard. He denied altogether having used such language, and said that at his meeting on the 4th the Yamén had told him that I on the previous day had made use of similar language, but he had informed them that this could not be, as all the foreign Representatives in this matter were unanimous. I am convinced that M. Pavloff did not make use of the language stated, and that this was only one more attempt of the Tsung-li Yamén to play off one Legation against another."

Mr. B. C. George Scott, H.M.'s Consul at Tientsin, goes in Canton as Consul-General, and is succeeded at Tientsin by Mr. W. R. Carlen.

A fatal fire occurred at Shanghai on April 5th. It broke out in a wine shop, No. 54, Rue du Consulate, and was caused presumably by carelessness in leaving hot ashes. When the alarm was given it was found that the inmates had their retreat cut off from below, and four men jumped from a window. Two sustained a fracture of the hip, one was severely bruised, but the other was unhurt. Five houses were destroyed, and among the ruins the charred remains of a native lad were discovered. Only one of the houses was insured, the amount being Tls. 6,000.

The Ichon-fu correspondent of the N. C. Daily News, writing under date of April 10th, gives some interesting details of recent German movements in Shanghai. He says:—

As indicated in my last letter, and confirmed by my telegram of the 3rd instant, the anti-foreign disturbances at this place have at length roused the German Government to action with startling effect. On the 30th of March a cruiser landed a number of troops, variously stated at from eighty to one hundred and forty, at a point near Jihchao city. They marched to the city only to find the gates closed. According to all classical precedents as found in the Three Kingdoms and other standard works, they should then have sat down, after soundly cursing the city and its officials, and entered into prolonged negotiation. What did these unconventional Barbarians do, however, but promptly insert a "long thin thing" through the crack in the gate and saw the bar of the gate in two, after which they rudely shoved the gate wide open and marched into the hsien yamen, where they proceeded to make themselves very much at home, and at latest accounts seem to be in no particular hurry to leave.

SWIFT RETRIBUTION.

At the same time they landed a force of fifty or sixty men about one hundred and fifty li further south and thirty li north of Ch'ing'ho. These proceeded at once to the village of Hanchiat'sun, one hundred and fifty li from the coast and seventy li south-east of this city. This was the place where the three Germans were attacked, as related in my last letter. They notified the people that they intended to burn the village, which they proceeded to do as soon as the inhabitants had fled. It seems that they burned about half of the place, which is a large and rather wealthy village. Next day they went back to the coast. They sent on to this city two proclamations in Chinese, one of which announced that they proposed to occupy Jihchao until the pending cases are settled, and the other stated their purpose to burn Hanchiat'sun in retaliation for the attack upon the Germans.

THE OFFICIALS

here were very much frightened, and, as is usual under such circumstances, came to the foreigner for advice. We urged them to settle the pending cases at once, as the only possible means of securing the return of the Germans to Tsintao. The officer in command of the few troops which were here is strongly anti-foreign. He proposed to go out and meet the enemy. He thought that a few words from him would turn them back, but if they would not listen to reason then he would be compelled to use force! When the people heard that the Germans had gone back to the coast they at once concluded that they were afraid to face the redoubtable Major who made the above striking proposition.

Yesterday and to-day troops have been coming in from T'engchow and Chelon. There are now about two thousand soldiers in the city.

RUMOURS

of all kinds are flying about, and the feeling on the street is not as friendly as we would like to see it. In spite of the fright and profuse promises of the officials, we do not seem to be any nearer to getting our various cases settled than we were a month ago. The fatuous blindness of these men is almost past belief. Verily, whom the gods would destroy they first make mad, or, to answer the purpose even better, hopelessly conceited.

The Universal Gazette has received advice stating that recently a number of foreign troops, (probably Russians) rather more than 1,000, marched into the city of Shengk'ing, the capital of Moukden. The local officials being neither aware of their nationality nor their object in entering the city offered no resistance, but reported the matter to the acting Military Governor.

Sir Nicholas Hannen has confirmed the report of the Registrar as to the damage inflicted by the Cowrie on the Indo-China Company's steamers Esang and Sunwo, when the latter were recently at anchor in the Shanghai River. The Registrar (Mr. E. H. Burrows), sitting with Mr. C. Murray Adamson, of Messrs. Shewan, Tomes & Co., as Assessor, fixed the damages payable by the Cowrie at Tls. 29,098³¹/₁₀₀ with costs.

The latest news to hand concerning the rebellion which once more threatens to break out in the old quarter, Kansuh, among the Mahomedans of that district, confirms the impression we have always entertained that these periodical outbreaks form part of Russia's frontier programme. Nothing so simplifies matters for the Muscovite policy as insurrections along any border on which its attention is concentrated, and it has long been an unwritten article of faith that without Russian assistance, supplies or instigation, these outbreaks which have cost China so much trouble might never take place. Russian emissaries have now been discovered in the act of supplying the Mahomedans with arms, and it is reported that near at hand is a large Russian force. The Governor of Kashgaria has appealed for help to the Viceroy at Lanchow, and begged him to send troops to his assistance. A much larger force of Russians is in the neighbourhood of Kashgaria than is generally supposed, but of course it must not be pictured that they are well disciplined troops. They are just the raw material which Russia uses under the stirring influence of the thong when occasion serves.—P. & T. Times.

Our senior Shanghai contemporary, in the course of a recent leading article on the growth of a war-party in Peking, says:—"Whatever they may ultimately do, the Pekingese are at present only discussing the expediency of offering more than passive resistance and protest, if the Kiaochow gambit be tried again: there is still time for counsel to be heard. We know that foreign advice in China, even when sound and disinterested, often rubs the sore where it should bring the plaster. In our matter-of-fact English way of looking at things instead of theories we ignore that most precious of all Chinese possessions—Face. Of two policies a Chinese will deliberately choose the worse if it but saves "face" with his contemporaries; what posterity may deem of his wisdom, his honour, or his patriotism, is a secondary consideration. This is the stumbling-block of every Chinese statesman and, therefore, of Chinese policy; they see the better but follow the worse. Practically the way to secure the adoption of anything in this crumbling old Empire is, firstly, to persuade the officials that their "Face" is assured and, secondly, that their interests are safe.

BICYCLE ROAD RACE.

A road race in connection with the Nippon Bicycle Club took place on Saturday afternoon from Fujisawa to Kodzu, a distance of about 18 miles, for the Kirin Cup presented by the Kirin Brewery, the trophy having to be won three times before it passes into the possession of the owner. Out of thirteen entries eight competitors were started by Mr. McGowan at 2.45 p.m. about one mile from Fujisawa. Poole had a fall before he had gone half a mile, but got on his wheel again and caught up the others before they had gone far. Crossing the Banyu River, Irwine and Scott were well ahead, with Leonard Eyton and Mason a quarter of a mile behind and the rest still another quarter of a mile to the rear. Scott and Irwine were well together till within about a mile of the finish; but, going down the steep hill before reaching Kodzu, Irwine was leading. Scott then lost what chances he had by running into a child and being in consequence thrown off his machine. The loss of time occasioned by the accident, with the attendant apologies and compensation, made the result certain for Irwine. Scott, however, came in second, with Mason third and Eyton next, the rest straggling in. All had tumbles more or less, and Curtis, who ran into a cart, was practically out of the race most of the way. The road was thick with dust and very loose, and the riders had to face a strong south-westerly gale, two facts which explain the time not being better. The handicapping gave great satisfaction. It should be mentioned that the police, who had been notified of the race, took an immense deal of trouble in keeping the road clear of traffic, and the streets of Oslo, the principal place traversed, were lined with constables. The smaller prizes were given by the Club. The Kirin Brewery's Japanese Agents, the Mediji, sent a copious supply of beer for the use of thirty riders and officials. At the conclusion of the race many of the Club members returned to Tonosawa, and remained there overnight.

The officials were as follows:—H. B. Haskell, Referee; J. L. O. Eyton, P. Peacock, R. Ward, and T. M. Laffin, Judges; K. Kingdon and Geo. Hood, Scorers and Time-keepers; H. Arai, T. M. Laffin, K. Kingdon, W. H. McGowan, and Geo. Hood, Handicappers. Details:—

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE NAGOYA YORO-IN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—As no printed information about this Home has been circulated for over a year, during which time rumours of trouble about the property, involving a lawsuit, have gone abroad, some of our friends are probably wondering how we are getting along.

The usual Annual Report has been printed, and is being sent out, but we now wish to give a little information which was not available when the report was written, especially about the trouble above mentioned.

In order that it may be understood how the suit arose, a few words as to the tenure of the property would seem advisable, and so we give the following brief history of the matter.

In the spring of 1892 a plot was bought as a site for the Home, which had been brought into existence by the great earthquake of the previous autumn, and the purchase was registered in the names of two members of the Seikokwai, who, to prevent the possibility of its being used by them or their heirs for their own benefit, mortgaged it for its full value to two other members of the same church. This course was recommended as the simplest and safest by a legal gentleman, a Christian, then living here, and at the end of the same year, when the building was erected, it was secured in the same way to two other Christians as yet unconnected with the Home. The property was thus placed in the hands of six persons who were considered reliable, but it soon became evident that one of the legal owners was anxious, if possible, to use it for his own advantage. There seemed, however, no way in which he could do so, and it was hoped that he would come to a better state of mind, especially as his attitude towards the Yoro-In seemed to be prompted by personal ill-feeling towards some of the other church members connected with it. This man's name is Ueda and the other man in whose name the property was registered is called Ito. No change having taken place in Ueda's attitude during five years it was considered advisable that his connection with the Yoro-In should terminate, so in the autumn of 1897 he was approached with the object of inducing him to quietly transfer his interest in the property to another. He expressed willingness to do so if Ito would do the same and asked for a little delay in order that they might consult together about it. A little later, however, Ito brought us a notice from the court that an application had been made by Ueda's creditors to have the Yoro-In property sold to pay his debts. Action of some kind was thus made necessary and we first tried to arrange the matter quietly by conference with Ueda and his creditor. The creditor's claim amounted to about 500 yen, and he would only consent to withdraw the matter from court on condition that we would pay him half the amount at once and guarantee that the remainder would be paid later on. Such a proposition, we felt, could not be entertained and so nothing could be done except to defend the Yoro-In in court. A barrister was engaged, and, after consultation with others, it was decided that the best way to proceed would be for all those having connection with the Home to elect one of their number "In Cho" and conduct the case in his name. The judges, however, would not admit that this "In Cho" had any legal status, and so the case was dismissed. They kindly intimated, however, that if the case had been brought in the names of all those having connection with the Home it would have been received. This was done, but we still did not feel very confident of success, as a Christian judge in another city kindly examined the evidence and expressed his opinion privately that we had very little chance. He advised us, however, to consult another lawyer, of wider experience than the one we had retained, and when we laid the matter before this man he, feeling deeply the disgraceful character of Ueda's action, kindly offered to do what he could without remuneration and seemed to be quite hopeful of success. This was encouraging, and it is probable that this man's clear presentation of the facts of the case had much to do with the favorable verdict given in July last.

Ueda's statement in court was that the property had been bought by him for his own use with the assistance of a kind foreigner and that he had lent it to the Yoro-In while it was convenient for him to do so, but that he could do this no longer on account of financial difficulty and consequently wanted it returned to him; that Ito had no real interest in the property and was conspiring with the Yoro-In people to defraud him. He was, able, however, to produce no evidence whatever to substantiate these statements, and, after hearing them, the judge advised his lawyer to withdraw the case, saying that the existence and work of the Yoro-In for seven years could not be questioned, and that it was very difficult to imagine that a missionary and a lot of Christian people like those connected with the Yoro-In could be guilty of such an offence as they were charged with. This advice, however, was not taken, and the case went on. The evidence we were able to furnish was most complete and satisfactory in every respect, and our only fear was that some legal technicality might prevent the judges deciding the matter in accordance with the facts, as they evidently desired to do.

That anxiety, however, proved to be groundless, judgment being given in favour of the Yoro-In in July last, and the Court of Appeal, to which the case was carried, has just reaffirmed the decision of the lower court, so, we hope, the end of the matter is now at hand. We shall have to wait for six weeks, the time allowed for carrying the matter to the Supreme Court, before everything can be finally settled up, but we earnestly hope that no further appeal will be made, and we invite all friends of the Home to unite with us in giving thanks that the institution, provided by their kindness for a few of the destitute aged people and orphans of this district, has not been allowed to suffer serious loss at the hands of unprincipled men.

There are probably some amongst us who have doubts and fears as to how institutions established and maintained by foreigners would be likely to fare at the hands of Japanese judges should an appeal to the courts be necessary. To such the decision given in this case will be interesting and help to increase confidence, showing, as it does, that such matters are not decided from a purely legal standpoint only, but that the question of equity is taken into consideration and carries weight.

We not only defended the Yoro-In against Ueda but brought an action to have the property removed entirely from the control of all those originally entrusted with it, and this having been done, it can now be placed in the hands of legally constituted Trustees and secured against further difficulty of the kind we have experienced.

The judgment given against Ueda with costs, but I understand this does not include lawyers' fees, so that, although we have gained the case, it has cost us something. Probably 150 or 200 yen will be required to reimburse the outlay in connection with the case, and to meet this very little has yet been provided. As the Report for 1898 shows, during the whole year funds were very low, and, without counting legal expenses, we closed the year a little in debt for the first time. This year, so far, just about enough has come in to supply daily food, and as for obvious reasons, as little as possible was spent on repairs last year, the Home now requires a thorough overhauling which will cost, at least 100 yen. We look to God in supply what is required with the same faith in which the work was begun, while, at the same time, we feel that it is but right to tell His people, as nearly as possible, how matters stand. The work of the Home is now going on very satisfactorily and there are good prospects that the work of porcelain painting will soon provide for the support of the larger boys. Friends could help greatly by sending orders for such porcelain ware as they require to the Yoro-In. Almost anything in that line can be supplied at very moderate prices.

Commending the above to your earnest consideration.

Believe me, yours very faithfully,

J. COOPER ROBINSON.

JAPANESE HOTELS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—As the subject of the charges at Japanese hotels is being brought before the public just now, and as I think I may say I have had more experience of travelling alone in the interior during the last ten years than any other lady from the foreign settlements, perhaps a few words on my personal experiences on the subject under discussion may be useful to your readers.

When I say travelling alone, I mean of course without any companion of my own station, but, as I am not conversant with the language, I have always been accompanied by my house-boy for the time being. On arriving at any Japanese hotel for the first time, he—knowing the sort of rooms I prefer, and am in the habit of occupying—goes in first and inspects the accommodation, and if he considers it suitable, he asks the price of the rooms per night, for myself and for him, so that when I am taken to them, I know exactly what I shall have to pay for the rooms alone, without extras.

The tariff for the best rooms in a Japanese hotel has been gradually increasing during the last four years, for the best hotels throughout Japan have formed themselves into what they term a "Confederacy," and have established a uniform scale of charges, and every hotel so combined has the title "Japan Confederacy Hotel" above its gate in addition to the special name by which it is known. The hotels in the "Confederacy" are only the best in each locality.

As a fair sample of all others, I may instance the "Momiji-ya" at Miyajima, called also the "Confederacy Hotel." When I first stayed there during the time of the Japan-China war, now about five years ago, I was charged one yen per day for one of the pleasantest rooms. I did not revisit the place for two years, when I found the same room was raised to a yen and a half per day. The next year it was two yen, and I asked laughingly how much more I should find it on my next visit, but found the tariff stationary when there during Easter just passed. At all hotels of the same standing as the "Momiji-ya" the charge is now a uniform one of two yen per day of twenty-four hours per person for room without extras if a foreigner, and one yen for second-class Japanese accommodation, including two meals per diem.

Like hotels in other countries, the accommodation varies somewhat, although the charges are fixed. And they also resemble Japanese semi-foreign hotels in this respect—that if two persons (say two lady friends) occupy the same room, the same charge is made for each, although a slight reduction is made if the stay is beyond one night. For instance for two in one room the nominal charge is four yen per night, but they will take three yen and a half if asked to do so. Of course special arrangements can be made for a stay of some days, or by the week. Foreigners taking their own food, and a servant to prepare it, are not charged extra for the use of kitchen or cooking apparatus.

At one hotel I halted at, about two years ago, in a place little frequented by foreigners, when my servant asked the price of the room for a day and night, he was met by the following naive remark: "Will you please ask your mistress what she is in the habit of paying for her room at other Japanese hotels, for we have never had a foreign lady staying here before, so we do not know what charge to make!" At that time the ordinary tariff was one yen and a half per diem for such accommodation as they were giving me, so I of course named that price, and they were quite satisfied.

With respect to baths—of course a foreigner does give much additional trouble, because he or she must not only have water specially heated, but must also have the sole occupation of the bath-room for the time of his or her ablutions. But as the arrangements of the bath-house are all under the control of the bath-man, I always make my servant tell him that I am willing to pay him 20 sen a bath for the additional trouble he may be put to, and I have invariably found that, upon that understanding, I am always provided with hot water, a clean tub, and absolute privacy—and politeness, even to the extent of being asked at what time I would prefer it;—but, being aware that the sole use of the bath for one person might probably clash with the arrangements of the house, and cause inconvenience to the numerous Japanese guests, I always say that I will suit my time to the convenience of the house, so far as possible.

As to the question of chadai or tea-money, being aware that it is a Japanese custom, I invariably give a small amount over and above the hotel bill, arranged upon the following scale—if I stay one night, 50 sen; if two nights, one yen;—if a few days or a week, two yen; and I have invariably found, after making this addition to the charge for the rooms, settling for any extras supplied, as beer, eggs, bread, milk, etc.—paying the bath-man as stated above, and giving a small doucou to the waiting maid—at a scale of 20 sen for one day's attendance, up to 50 sen or a dollar for a longer stay, that I am not only escorted to the door with great politeness and empressment and with many requests to "Please come again"—but every assistance given me in transporting my luggage to station or steamer, and, in several instances in the North of Japan, a servant of the hotel has been sent travelling with me to the next stage on my journey—and in all cases, with a letter from the landlord of the hotel I am leaving to the proprietor of the best hotel in the next town I am going to, recommending me to their best attention.

Surely a few sen here and there, judiciously laid out as above, which cannot be called needless squandering, is well spent, if it purchases attention and politeness wherever one goes, and leaves a good name behind one, making the way easy for the next foreigner who arrives.

It is true that at several hotels I have been politely refused admission on the plea that the house was full; and at one hotel in the North my boy has been told that they would much rather not have foreigners, though they were always glad to see me—proving that, in these instances, those who had preceded me had not left a favourable impression behind, for which I had to pay the penalty by having to go farther to seek accommodation.

My argument is that those who cannot afford or are not prepared to lose the trifling additional outlay that will ensure civility, and a cordial welcome, had better remain at home and not travel in Japan.

The suggestions that the hotels throughout Japan should be classified, and also that every hotel should be provided with a fixed tariff for 1st, 2nd, and 3rd class accommodation, translated into English, are excellent, and would save an immense amount of chaffering, and probable ill-feeling on the part of both hotel proprietor and foreign traveller.

It is quite true that high-class Japanese do not show the same hoary temper (almost amounting to rudeness) that is ordinarily exhibited by foreigners when they cannot get exactly what they require at hotel, for I was cognizant of a case in point within the last fortnight when staying at an hotel at Tadotsu, a sea-port town in the Inland Sea, on the Island of Shikoku. A Japanese military officer, evidently a very well-bred man, had, it appeared, sent word before his arrival to secure himself a certain room, and when he came he found it was otherwise occupied. He naturally showed a little temper and annoyance on first finding this the case, but after listening to the apologies of the proprietor his manner immediately altered, and he exchanged bows and courtesies with the landlord with perfect good-humour;—the little scene was translated to me by a travelling companion who understood Japanese perfectly and who was greatly struck by the gentlemanly urbanity of the officer on receipt of the landlord's explanation.

All this proves that a little tact will go a long way in Japan, as in all other countries.

Apologizing for taking up so much of your space,

I am, sir, yours, etc.,

EMILY S. PATTON.

FEMALE EDUCATION IN JAPAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—As a sincere admirer of the typical women of Japan—not the class introduced to the reading public by Pierre Loti or Clement Scott, but the very different type depicted by Miss Bacon in her charming little book "Japanese Girls and Women" some years ago, and again quite recently by Mrs. Hugh Fraser, widow of the late British Minister to Japan—I heartily endorse the sentiments given to your readers in your translation in Saturday's Mail of the controversy between the Yiji Shimpō and the Fimmin on the subject of Japanese female education.

As far as the writer's personal observation has gone, the Americanized Japanese woman—I say Americanized because it rarely happens that a Japanese girl is sent to Europe for her education, the United States being so near at hand, and also American influence through the mission schools being brought to bear in determining the locality where a Japanese girl is sent to receive a foreign education—is all that the Fimmin paints her, as stated in your article;—"a being with a vulgar self asserting demeanour, in unsuitable foreign clothes, altogether a most unpleasant ensemble."

No well-wisher to Japan would deny to its women the advantages accruing from a more liberal education than they are at present acquiring through the antiquated routine of the arts of flower arranging, the tea ceremonial, etc., etc., and when they shall have succeeded in gaining a good modern education upon European lines that will be in harmony with the requirements of their distinctive nationality, it will be a matter of congratulation to all thoughtful persons who have the future interests of Japan at heart.

But while to the smattering of all the European arts and sciences is superadded the total loss of their own native retiring grace, and when in its stead is adopted a certain assertiveness and self-assurance which does not sit ill upon Western women, but is as unsuited to a Japanese woman's carriage as Western garments are to her figure, then can the indignant only grieve at such a perversion of all that is most charming in Japanese woman-kind.

The adoption of foreign manners may tend to add to the attractiveness of Japanese girls with a certain class of foreign men, but it certainly does not enhance their charms in the opinion of men of their own nation, it being a well-known fact that at the present time Japanese men are showing a decided reluctance to select wives from their country-women who have been "Europeanized," though perhaps "Americanized" would be the more correct expression.

Whoever in the near future will be able to solve satisfactorily the important problem of what should constitute the most suitable educational curriculum for the women of Japan, will deserve to be rated as one of the truest benefactors of the nation. That such an one may soon arise is the earnest hope of yours, etc.

EULALIA.

CHARGES AT JAPANESE INNS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

DEAR SIR,—With regard to charges at Japanese inns when patronised by foreigners there are, as with regard to almost anything else, two sides. You are certainly right in saying that the foreigner is likely to exact more service and must expect to pay more. No one will object to this, as little as a foreigner who weighs 175 lbs. will object to paying more to his kuruma-man than a Japanese who weighs but a hundred pounds. It is not against any fair charge that my objection was directed in my recent letter in the Japan Times. But is it fair to charge more than twice to a foreigner than to a Japanese when both fared exactly alike? Is it a fair charge to ask yen 1.50 and more simply for the room, meals and everything else charged extra, when at the same hotel the charge to a Japanese guest is fifty sen for room-rent and two meals? If the excess is called the chadai which the hotel-keeper makes sure of, fearing he would not receive one otherwise, it certainly is an exceedingly generous one. In the vicinity of Kyoto, as well as in other parts of Japan in which I have travelled for almost fifteen years, I have never met with this discrimination in charges; the foreigner is charged the same as the Japanese, and he cheerfully gives a generous chadai for any extra services he may have demanded. These abnormal extra charges in Japanese inns stand on the same level with the higher charges made to foreigners by many of the merchants in interior cities. There is a Japanese saying to the effect that a foreigner has to pay double, a man with a beard four-fold, or something in that line. The common Japanese tradesman is not at all averse to taking advantage of a foreign customer, nor is the Japanese hotel-keeper. We are accustomed to it, but it certainly is not productive of good feeling.

Assuring you that I shall not trouble you again with this matter, and thanking you for your courtesy,

I remain, yours, respectfully,

"ADJUTOR."

THE BOOKSHELF.

Over-seas Library: London, T. Fisher Unwin, 11, Paternoster Buildings. The Ipans, R. B. Cunningham Graham; The Captain of the Locusts, by A. Werner; In Guiana Wilds, by James Rodway. Price 1s. 6d. each.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin is a publisher of much enterprise and acumen. His latest idea is an "Overseas Library," which will deal with purely Colonial literature. That is, the editor will strive to get, if possible, descriptions of colonial life true to the special local colour and atmosphere of the district, and writers who may create artistically truthful pictures of their surroundings. The Editor prefaces the new venture with the following introductory note:—

Where are the "Ends of the Empire?" and which are the Over-Seas? At "the Ends" of one Empire may arise the beginnings of other Empires to come. It is notorious that wherever an English-speaking community settles and opens up new lands, it speedily speaks for itself as a centre; and so rapid is the growth of the great Colonies, that Ministers to-day writing despatches to dependencies over-seas, receive their answers from nations to-morrow.

But, great as is the growth of the Empire and the enterprise of its peoples, the new native-born literatures take years to germinate and generations to arrive. Thence comes it that often we do not understand the atmospheres of the new English-speaking peoples, and often misunderstand the problems, the ambitions, the attitudes befitting them as new races. And while the British Empire grows richer daily in patriotic fervours, in speeches, in splendour, in cant, and in the oracular assurances of statesmen, the English people seeks to understand its cousins by the interchange of cablegrams, by debates, and by all the ambiguities of official memoranda.

It is, however, the artist's work to bring the people of his nation and their atmosphere before the eyes of another. It is the artist alone, great or small, who, by revealing and interpreting the life around him, makes it living to the rest of the world. And the artist is generally absent! In the case of the English in India, ten years ago, while the literature of information was plentiful, the artist was absent; Mr. Kipling arrived and discovered modern India to the English imagination. And to-day, in the midst of a general movement for Empire expansion, with talk of Federation, Jingoism, and with the doing of real work, artists in literature are generally absent, the artists who should reveal the tendencies, the hidden strength and weakness, the capacities of the new communities.

The aim of "The Over-Seas Library" is purely experimental. It proposes to print literature from any quarter that deals with the actual life of the English outside England, whether of Colonial life or the life of English emigrants, travellers, traders, officers, over-seas, among foreign and native races, black or white. Pictures of life in the American States will not necessarily be excluded.

"The Over-Seas Library" makes no pretence at Imperial drum-beating, or the putting of English before Colonial opinion. It aims at getting the atmosphere and outlook of the new peoples recorded, if such is possible. It aims at being an interchange between all parts of the Empire without favour, an interchange of the life of the English-speaking peoples, and of the Englishmen beyond seas, however imperfect, fragmentary, and modest such records or accounts may be.

The Editor will be glad to receive any MSS. addressed to him, care of the Publisher, Mr. T. Fisher Unwin, 11, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C.

The idea is excellent, and the editor maps a virgin field. Many a good and well-told story of life as lived by the Westerner in the islands of Japan lies undeservedly buried in the old files of local newspapers, and if some of the writers were to give permission we feel sure a very readable addition could easily be made to Unwin's Over-seas Library—an addition that would be welcome to residents here as well as to dwellers in other lands afar.

The first volume of the series is by that well-practised writer and traveller R. B. Cunningham-Graham. It deals principally with South American life, and several of the sketches are very well worth the trouble of reading. Of the Captain of the Locusts little need be said beyond stating that the book takes the reader into Central and Southern Africa, and gives some stories that throw a vivid light upon the causes that sometimes lead to "native outbreaks." Guiana Wilds may be described as an ethnological romance of a typical young Scotchman who becomes, by force of circumstances, decivilised, and mates with a native woman. The author of In the Guiana Forest, has here ample opportunity for the display of his intimate knowledge of the wild scenery of British Guiana and the weird customs of the Guiana Indians.

We wish the new Overseas Library every success.

A Mariage de Convenance. By C. F. KEARY, Unwin's Colonial Library; London, Fisher Unwin.

Mr. C. F. KEARY (Mr. H. Ogram Matuce) apparently had three objects in writing this "novel": (1) To induce a soft-hearted and soft-headed public to buy it; (2) to show that he has at various times presented Cook's companions at hotels in the Riviera, Vienna, the Tyrol, and other resorts; (3) to prove that he knows certain words of French, Latin, Greek, German, and Italian, or—at lowest—that he possesses three-and-sixpenny dictionaries of quotations in those languages.

The literary deities of these days are, with a few brilliant exceptions, so unutterably dull and uninteresting that we are not at all surprised to learn that Mr. Keary is on the whole a success. While Miss Marie Corelli retains her position as a popular idol, we cannot be bewildered at any possible exhibition of perverted taste on the part of the British public. In fact, we should not be astonished if "A Mariage de Convenance," slipshod, illiterate, and deadly dull as it is, should achieve a success that would have made Dickens or Thackeray envious.

The writer, in his introduction, truly remarks that "speaking broadly, every one writes a novel or novels at the present time," and that "those few who remain outside the ranks of the novel-writers do so from choice; they see that the thing is so easy to be done that it is not worth doing." If Mr. Keary's work be novel writing we most cordially admire the sagacity and the humanity of those who remain outside; pure indolence is a positive virtue compared with the industry which produces light literature of this kind.

Of the plot of "A Mariage de Convenance" we can say little. We have read it through with more attention that it deserved, and can only gather the vague idea that the chief personage is a certain cad named Arthur Norris, alleged to be very clever and to have won University distinctions, though the internal evidence of his cleverness is rather weak. He marries his cousin; meets a German opera singer; runs off with her; quarrels with a man who pays her addresses, and involves himself in a shooting affair. Probably if we read the book a second time we might gain a clearer idea of the story, but there are some tasks which pass the bounds of human patience, and this is assuredly one. A collection of patent pill testimonials, printed on good paper, would possess as much sustained interest as this work. The author has followed the most vicious of all styles of construction—that of narrative in letter form: "From Peter Wilkin to Simon Walker," "From John Smith to William Brown," "From same to same," &c., &c. This is surely the most hideous invention authors have ever hit upon. Even in a master hand, like Smollett's, it worries, and teases, and irritates the reader to an extent that mars half the force and vigour of the writing. Wilkie Collins is readable not because, but in spite of, his vices of construction. But these were men who could write, who could give reality to a character and vividness to an incident. When a man can do neither, when his work is redeemed by neither vigour, wit, nor individuality, when his idea of style is to tessellate a monotonous ground-work of weak English with little tags and phrases of weaker French—then, to add to all this the obscurity of the letter form of narrative is not merely injudicious; it is, in the literary sense, absolutely criminal.

It seems absurd to attempt to criticise seriously a book of this kind, but we understand that "A Mariage de Convenance"—how the title grates each time one writes it—has passed through several editions; it was originally published in 1893, and is now reproduced in popular form. This indicates something like popularity, and Mr. Keary may probably, by dint of "personal paragraphs" and "illustrated interviews," be a great literary light before long. Now-a-days, a man may have ears as long as Bottom's, and yet become a literary Midas, possessing the long ears still, though the public fail to see them.

Seeing, then, that Mr. Keary, if he dines with the right critics and makes love to the interviewers, may possibly become a star of some magnitude, we may be excused if we dwell a little longer on his production. As regards style, Mr. Keary appears to have about as much command of English, French, and German as in the proud possession of a head waiter at a Swiss Hotel. Of Italian he knows a few words, and those he uses. He remembers something of Greek and Latin, like the majority of educated people, and therefore he never lets any character say "Good-bye" or "Farewell." It is always "Vale, vale, maxime vale." He devotes nearly a whole page to demonstrating that he is familiar with the Greek original of our English word "asylum." The dialogue in which he brings out this majestic fact—that asylum comes from asylon—has nothing to do with the plot, and is redeemed by no suspicion—or, as Mr. Keary would no doubt say, suspçon—of wit. It is simply introduced to show that the author knows the word.

But it is in French that Mr. Keary excels. There is a perfect archipelago of italics on every page. So happy, forceful, and epigrammatic is our author in his Gallicism that we are forced to conclude that he must have spent at least a fortnight at Dieppe or Boulogne-sur-mer after leaving the School of Stratford-at-Bowe. He seems, however, to distrust himself still in the elegant but tricky language of Chateaubriand, for he seldom makes long excursions into it, and when he does the results are disastrous. For instance, in trying to say "Love makes the world go round" he spells Monde "Mond." And what can we make of this sentence: "But la vie est comme ça?" Is "but" English or French? Presumably English, but Mr. Keary italicises it.

It is not often, however, that Mr. Keary is so venturesome. He generally follows the well-worn path of the Bow Bells noveletist, who talks about Lady Arabella's tiny mouchoir, who calls silk stockings bas de soie, and substitutes papier à lettre for note paper. Mr. Keary uses such phrases as this:—"These are my amusements;" "I am quite bouleversé;" "I was a little empressé;" "with much dépit;" "its magacent as it is;" "a suspicious crainitif look, &c." The following sentence is typical:—

But if I were to let my regrets for the past interfere with my enjoyment of the present it would only embroil me with my present "wife" and not in the slightest degree benefit l'autre.

This is supposed to be written by an English character. Could any man be capable of using so poor a halfpenny worth of French to such an intolerable deal of Anglo-Saxon? After 34 words of English it is difficult for any tongue to slip naturally into the foreign idiom, and certainly no sane man would make such an effort for the mere sake of appearing to his friends in the light of an ignorant prig.

Mr. Keary's characters consistently describe themselves and their surroundings as triste; they fear they are de trop; they are disturbed by the va et vient of visitors; they have a mauvais quart d'heure; they are éprix; they experience contretemps; they are miserable, and so forth. Surely a Board School boy of sixteen would scorn such tawdry vulgarities of style.

Scraps of Latin, most of them of the kind used with such effect by aldermen of second-rate provincial boroughs, make an imposing appearance in this novel, and there are extracts from German poets, though we have a shrewd suspicion that the author's command of the latter language is not great, for his specimens are generally limited to Ja and Nein and a few interjections which can be readily found at the end of any German accident. To do Mr. Keary justice, however, we should quote one phrase which exhibits him in the light of a scholar: "I am studying these eyes and voice from a purely external and artistic (Ästhetisch) standpoint." "These eyes and voice," by the way, is a typical specimen of the writer's English. When we add that there are in the book bits of other languages which we cannot presume to identify, our simile of a Swiss waiter cannot be said to be inexact.

Mr. Keary's English, probably not strong originally, has suffered by his foreign excursions. "It is this accursed insignificant sprite of an imagination who plays you false." A grovelling slave to grammatical propriety would say which, since the antecedent is a neuter substantive. "We are not at San Remo, for this letter, any more than Rome, is not finished in one day." That sentence is truly a thing of beauty. "I think I shall take to writing a novel, as par example." Is "par example" French or English, or half and half? And here is an elegant phrase—supposed to be written, too, by a young lady of good social position—"it makes me blush inside and outside." Mr. Keary italicises it, as if he had said a good thing. But to give anything like an adequate account of the absurdities and crudities of this popular success would mean practically reprinting the whole novel.

And this is a book which has run through several editions. Of the reading public which can devour such fare we can only say, to follow Mr. Keary's practice (the style is not at all hard when you try)—"Bon dieu! Quel appetit!"

Notes on the Nicaragua Canal, by Henry Isaac Sheldon; Chicago, A. C. McClurg and Company.

We can recommend this little book as a timely and thoughtful contribution to the discussion of a question of world-wide interest. Its style is as unpretentious as its title. Mr. Sheldon has not brought to bear any of the cheap devices of sensational book-making; and those who look for "picturesque" descriptions after the style of American special correspondents will do well not to read his "Notes." But for a serious reader, desirous of learning the plain facts, and of gauging intelligent American feeling on the question, the book is of decided value. Mr. Sheldon has spent some time in Central America, has visited the chief points of the suggested Nicaraguan route, has read and digested authorities and statistics, and places the result of his investigations before the public in a succinct and interesting form.

It is, perhaps, well to point out before proceeding further that Mr. Sheldon is evidently an American of Americans—practical, shrewd, and intensely patriotic. Though his facts may be relied on, it is not always safe to follow his inferences, and there are many points on which an English reader is likely to join issue with him. Mr. Sheldon is for a canal which shall be all American. It must be constructed with American money, America must have the principal control of the district through which it runs, it must provide work for American engineers, it must use American materials, and must earn dividends for American shareholders.

This is perhaps too narrow a view of what is essentially a world-problem. But still the question is a vital one for the United States, and a citizen of that great country may be pardoned for taking the line Mr. Sheldon has adopted. The Western States of America are stunted in their growth, and the Eastern States, great and prosperous as they are, are placed at a disadvantage, by the want of convenient water communication. Of Trans-continental railways, there is no lack—railways that are a model to the world, and that place San Francisco and New York as close together, for many purposes, as London and Paris were a century ago. But railways, after all, do not wholly compensate for the lack of water communication. California is one of the States most favoured by nature. Its soil is of inexhaustible fertility. Its climate is among the best in the world. It produces splendid wheat and the finest fruit. But not a bushel of its wheat crop goes as far as the Atlantic coast, for wheat cannot bear the cost of several thousand miles railway journey. California has been opened to American enterprise for 50 years. Yet in 1890 the population of the whole state, 1,000 miles in length, was little more than that of the single city of Philadelphia. And this is perhaps the most prosperous of the Pacific States. Oregon and Washington are far less developed; their population is scanty; their industries trifling; and their agriculture, though prosperous as far as it goes, leaves vast room for development. Undoubtedly their isolation has much to do with this. The distance between, say, San Francisco and New York, by way of Cape Horn, is so immense that there is, as regards carriage of the majority of commodities, nothing to compete against the Trans-continental Railways. They have and always will have a monopoly of land transit; a new competitor may produce frantic "rate-cutting" for a time; but the competitors eventually become allies; and rates go up again. To quote Mr. Sheldon, "twenty-five years' trial has demonstrated that if railroads are to be the sole means of communication, the development of the Pacific States will be very slow."

What, then, would be the effect of the Canal? It would shorten the water passage from the Pacific seaboard to New York to about 4,700 miles—by no means a formidable voyage to modern steamships, and offering possibilities of most advantageous competition with the railways. But this is but one of the advantages America might fairly anticipate. Another, of great importance to her as a rising manufacturing nation, is the ease of access the canal would give her to the Far East, a share of whose markets she so greatly covets. At present the great manufacturing centres in the Eastern States are very disadvantageously placed vis-à-vis Europe, as regards Oriental trade. And, yet again, the possession of an Asiatic dependency, the new spirit of expansion and "imperialism," and the responsibilities that spirit may be the means of occasioning, bring within the range of possibilities circumstances which may render the canal of immeasurable strategic advantage. Confronted with a more resolute and better equipped enemy than Spain, the United States Government might be made to feel very keenly the inconvenience of a run of 15,987 miles if, as in the case of the Oregon last year, it should require to call a squadron from the Pacific to the Atlantic seaboard. A canal over which it had control would enable the Navy Department to concentrate its force on any given point at extremely short notice.

There is no doubt, therefore, that a strong case may be made out for aid from the American Treasury in the construction of the canal, though Mr. Sheldon is talking rather boldly when he says that "the canal may so develop our trade with Eastern Asia that a single year of that trade will exceed in volume the total cost of its construction." The mind of America is, however, by no means unanimous. The Pacific Coast and Southern States are naturally in favour of State aid; the Western inland States are inclined to regard such a scheme with complaisance; but in the East there is a good deal of opposition, most of which comes under the heading of vested interest. The Central States again, are, if not indifferent, at any rate impartial; their interests are not directly affected, and they can afford to take a broad and unprejudiced view.

Mr. Sheldon gives a very interesting account of his journey over part of the suggested route. The distance across from ocean to ocean is about 170 miles; the surface is level, and the Nicaragua lake—92 miles long and 34 broad—can be utilised as part of the water-way. The idea of a canal at this spot has occurred to scores of old speculators from the time of the Conquistadores onward, and as early as 1849 the founder of the Vanderbilts was granted a concession and made a preliminary survey. Between 1849 and 1857, while the Californian gold fever was at its full height, Vanderbilt placed steamers on the Lake and River of San Juan, ran coaches to connect with the Pacific coast, and provided a more efficient substitute for the dreary Horn voyage or the adventurous trans-continental ride.

A company formed for the purpose of cutting a canal at this point has been in existence since 1889, and has up to the present expended 4½ million dollars, chiefly on preliminaries, though the beginning of the canal has been excavated on the Atlantic side. Mr. Sheldon is disposed to recommend that full recognition should be made by the State of all this outlay, and that on the company giving its consent to the action of Congress, it "should have back at once stock and bonds for all its cash outlays to date." He admits this sounds rather generous; but argues that there is a "special case" for the company's complete indemnification.

Mr. Sheldon gives some very interesting facts and figures relating to the conditions of labour. He is decidedly optimistic, despite the gloomy experience of the French a few leagues away at Panama, as to the question of sanitation. The authorities which he quotes in support of his contention are, it must be admitted, thoroughly practical experts. So far the men employed by the company have enjoyed remarkable immunity from disease, but what will be the case when the excavations are seriously commenced remains to be seen. The French did well enough at Panama before they commenced to dig, and then the fever germs made their appearance. The source of danger, it would seem, lies below the surface of the soil. The climate of Nicaragua cannot be called unhealthy for the tropics; and the country is swept by strong trade-winds, which tend to cleanse the air of fever-generating miasmas.

Mr. Sheldon discusses at length the estimates of cost, variously placed at 70 million, 133 million, and 150 million dollars. As to revenue he says:—

As the conditions are so similar, it is necessary, in taking a broad view of probable earnings, to consider the business transacted by the Suez Canal. The results there shown are more helpful than mere estimates; they are ascertained facts. That company deals with the world's commerce, just as will be done in Nicaragua.

In 1895 its business amounted to 8,440,000 tons. It had then been in operation twenty-five years. The first year, 1870, its business was only 436,000 tons; in 1871, 760,000 tons; in 1872, 1,100,000 tons, and there has been a fairly steady increase ever since, up to the amount in 1895. During all this time the volume of the world's commerce has steadily increased. Not only has trade more and more adjusted itself to the Suez route, but also the aggregate amount of trade has become much larger.

Some allowance should be made for the advantages possessed by the Suez Canal as a now well-established route. Taking its business eight years ago may be a fair offset for this item. The amount for 1888 exceeded six million tons. The earlier Suez tolls were $2.77 per ton, which have been gradually reduced to $1.77. Freight and passenger charges the world over have been greatly reduced the past twenty years, and traffic is not prepared now to stand heavy charges in any direction. A moderate tariff will be in every way desirable. A favourable, but approximate, estimate of the possible revenues in Nicaragua would be as follows: With tolls at $1.50 per ton at the outset, and a business of at least six million tons after the canal is fairly in operation, a gross income of nine million dollars would be obtained. Administration, maintenance, and operation for 1895 cost the Suez Canal about one million eight hundred thousand dollars. Taking into account all the dam and embankment work at Nicaragua, as well as the heavy rainfall, an allowance of three million dollars as an annual average for expenses may be fair, leaving a net income of six million dollars. An undertaking of this character is to be gone into only as a long-term investment, and the earnings for the first few years after it is completed are not to be considered as sufficient for a final judgment. The earnings will come later on. It is also to be noted that the Nicaragua Canal is likely to be used by sailing-vessels as well as steamers, which is not the case with the Suez Canal.

This is surely rather a rosy view. It must be remembered that the Suez route will still be the most convenient for European vessels trading to the Far East and to Australia, and the volume of that traffic is enormously greater than that of any other ocean highway. Mr. Sheldon hopes great things for American trade as the result of the cutting of the canal:—

It will create lines of communication which do not now exist at all,—opening the way for new trade of European nations with the Pacific, and leading our own country up to a commerce which is now unthought of,—a commerce which will come when the necessities of our hungry skilled workmen shall compel us to seek new markets for the manufactured goods which our own country cannot consume. These markets will be found not only along the western coasts of Central and South America, but also in Australia, China, and Japan.

And again:—

In building up a foreign trade, our natural course will be to begin with the countries where we shall meet least competition. In order to be profitable, trade requires to move along the lines of least resistance. Our geographical situation is such that we are the natural producers for all countries bordering on the Pacific Ocean. The relative distance of European manufacturers, as compared with our own, gives us a great advantage. The idea of trying to sell much of our products to China and Japan is new to our people; but those countries are entering on a career of great development, and why should not the American people have a share in supplying their wants? The trade reports tell the story of their awakening. The purchases of Japan from foreign countries, expressed in their silver, were:—

In 1885 $ 28,000,000

In 1894 113,000,000

China bought from foreign countries:—

In 1885 $132,000,000

In 1894 243,000,000

We have not been alive to this demand. Of Japan's purchases abroad of $113,000,000 in 1894, we sold her only $11,000,000. We excelled in paying money to her, however, for in that year we bought of her goods amounting to $43,000,000. Of China's purchases from other nations of $243,000,000 in 1894, we supplied only $10,000,000. We were good buyers, however, taking $25,000,000 of her products. Our diplomatic agents report that with more alertness and enterprise we could have furnished to Japan, and at a reasonable profit, sixty per cent. of all her foreign purchases in 1894.

The impetus the canal will, it is hoped, give to American cotton-growing is touched on:—

The new buyer of cotton in Japan. That country is going strongly into the manufacture of cotton goods, such as are used by the people of the warm countries, and now not only exports these goods to China, but undersells the English manufacturers in their own dependency of India. It is impossible for the latter to sell the Manchester goods in Calcutta and Bombay as cheap as those now brought from Japan. The Japanese legation in Washington writes me that in 1894 their country purchased from other nations 142,000,000 pounds of cotton, costing $9,550,000. Of this only 14,000,000 pounds, costing $1,340,000, was bought in the United States. The remainder came chiefly from British India and China. We are told, too, that the Japanese mill-owners much prefer the cotton from the United States, if it were to be had at the same price, our cotton being cleaner and with a better fibre. Its cost in Japan is, however, against it, owing to the freight rates made necessary by the long journey around Cape Horn. The saving of distance by a Nicaraguan canal from New Orleans to Yokohama will be almost one half.

Mr. Sheldon deals at length with the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty and the question of Great Britain's possible attitude. He treats the contentions of England very cavalierly, and comes to the conclusion that "the possible claims of England to joint control of the canal under the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty should be ignored. These claims could never be allowed, and we would probably hear little of them after we had constructed the canal with our own money and were in full possession." He claims that the case of the Nicaragua Canal is not on all fours with that of the Suez Canal; there are no irresistible arguments for its neutralisation; it should and must remain under the control of the United States and of Nicaragua. "The Monroe doctrine is the settled policy of the United States. . . . It will be impossible for Great Britain to maintain the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty at this stage of the development of the United States." Mr. Sheldon is most emphatic in his conclusion that no European nation must have a voice in the matter. He cannot or will not admit that there are arguments on the other side.

Of the descriptive part of the book we should like to speak did space permit. Without any attempt at fine writing, the author gives excellent sketches here and there, wedged in among statistics and arguments, of the life of the Nicaraguans and of the characteristics of their country. His book is altogether most interesting, and the capital photographs with which it is illustrated add considerably to its value.

YOKOHAMA DOCKS.

An event of considerable interest in the history of the port of Yokohama took place on Monday morning, when the new docks were formally opened. The Dock Company had issued a large number of invitations, and at nine o'clock, the hour fixed for the commencement of the proceedings, a numerous company, consisting chiefly of Japanese officials and merchants, had assembled. Just after nine the hospital ship Hakui Maru, which has been chartered to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, entered Dock No. 2, and those present watched with interest the process of putting into position the great shores intended to support her when the water was drawn off. The exhaustion of the water occupied about two hours, at the end of which time visitors were free to go on board, or to inspect the big ship from the bottom of the dock. In No. 1 Dock, meanwhile, the Kawachi Maru, one of the big European liners of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, was already dry-docked, and a great many filled up their time by wandering over the ship and inspecting the handsome cabins and saloons. At 11 a.m. the opening ceremony took place, speeches being delivered in Japanese from a small platform at the head of Dock No. 1.

Baron KAWADA TATSUROKU said:—We are now celebrating the opening of the new dock. Taking a retrospect of the last 20 years we see that Japan has made gigantic strides in navigation, and her mercantile marine has increased greatly. Naturally the construction of docks has become very necessary, but generally speaking the Japanese are not so far advanced as to be able to construct docks as private undertakings; and I think some credit is therefore due to our company. With the assistance of those interested, and with the diligent help of experts, we completed the building of No. 2 dock in April, 1897, and commenced business with one dock. The size of ships entering the harbour, however, is constantly increasing, and the necessity of a larger dock was urgently felt. With this in view, we pressed forward the construction of No. 1 dock, and succeeded in completing the work by April of this year. It was in May, 1894, that the survey of the dock site was first undertaken, and since that time no less than 1,200,000 yen has been spent, with the result that the organization of our staff is in good order. I hope we shall meet the public requirements, and contribute to the facilitation of navigation by providing further dock facilities and enlarging the works.

Governor ASADA remarked that even a naturally good port without docking facilities was altogether unsatisfactory, and upon the excellence of its ports the trade and prosperity of a country largely depended. Yokohama was in itself an excellent port, but it was not complete without docks, and he congratulated the company on its enterprise and far-sightedness.

Admiral MORI, Harbour Master, said navigation had made phenomenal progress, and, Japan being the chief maritime country of the East, the progress or decline of her navigation greatly affected her advance as a State. Serviceable docks were most important both in peace and war, and the advance of enterprise in this direction was most desirable. The company would endeavour to meet the increasing requirements of the port.

Mr. UMEDA, Mayor of Yokohama, also added a few congratulatory remarks.

Mr. OTANI KANEI, Chairman of the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce, said Yokohama was the centre of Japanese maritime enterprise, and it was deplorable that up to recently it had lacked proper docks. He congratulated the company on its enterprise. Good docks were necessary for the continued prosperity of a port, and he attributed the prosperity of Hongkong largely to its being provided with commodious docks which made it a centre of navigation in the East. Japanese Navigation had made a phenomenal advance since the Japan-China war, and now there were few waters where Japan's ships did not ply. Their urgent duty to day was to add to the national power and to increase the national resources, and do this there was no other course than to promote foreign trade. He congratulated not only the company, not only Yokohama, but the country at large on its possession of these fine docks.

An informal dinner was the next item of the programme, and at the conclusion all the workshops were thrown open to guests; while not a few watched with interest the hakunori, or feats of skill by a number of coolies on floating barks of timber.

The two docks will be able to accommodate all vessels of ordinary size. No. 1 will dock ships of 503.110 feet; its length on blocks is 483.699 feet; the width of the entrance 93.625 feet at top and 75.550 feet at bottom; the draft 27.107 feet; and it takes five hours to pump it clear of water. This dock has only just been opened. It is much bigger and more commodious than No. 2, which was opened in April, 1897. The length of the latter, on blocks, is 351.025 feet; it can take vessels up to 364.200 feet in length; the width of the entrance at top is 60.830 feet and at bottom 45.220 feet; its draft is 26.590 feet; and it takes 2½ hours to pump out all the water. Both docks are very solidly built, and are in every way a credit to the contractors, to the Dock Company, and to Yokohama.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

It is announced in the Official Gazette that Japan's delegates to the International Oriental Association this year will be Professors Hozumi and Tsuboi, two of the most eminent men she has to send.

We observe that the Governments of Austria and Germany have appreciated the labours of Dr. Lönholm in Japan. The former has conferred on him the decoration of the Iron Crown, and the latter that of the Crown.

The Chiuo Shimbun has received a telegram from its special correspondent in Peking, announcing the death of His Excellency the Viceroy Liu Kun-yi, Southern Superintendent of Trade in China. It is expected that his office will be conferred on Chang Chi-lung.

Yamagata Prefecture has been visited by quite a serious calamity. A large conflagration occurred in Yonezawa on the 28th ultimo, and another in the town of Yamazawa on the following day. Of the two the former appears to have been much the more disastrous, but exact details of the damage done are not yet forthcoming.

It is stated that the herring catch during the first part of the present season in Hokkaido has been exceptionally fine. No less than half a million of hoku have been taken, which represents 5 million yen, at 10 yen a koku. That is for only one third of the season, so that hopes are entertained of a total catch worth 10 million yen.

It is alleged that the Emperor has been advised to increase the pay of military and naval officers from the rank of Captain downwards, and that the new schedule will be published in a few days. This appears to be an unavoidable measure. The pay of officers in the junior ranks of the two services was always very small, and has become quite inadequate since the appreciation of commodities.

The trial of two water police-constables for ill-treating a female prisoner in order to wring a confession from her, was concluded in the Tokyo Local Court on the 28th ultimo. Ogawa, who had beaten the woman with an iron bar, received a sentence of two months' imprisonment with hard labour, and Kobayashi, who had used a hempen rope, was condemned to 2 days' confinement. Both men appealed.

The latest scheme with reference to Tokyo harbour is to have it at Haneida; that is to say, at the mouth of the Tamagawa. The cost of constructing it, according to that plan, would be 30 million yen, and the engineering difficulties would be comparatively small. The only trouble is that a harbour 10 miles distant from Tokyo could scarcely be called Tokyo harbour. The Fiji Shimpō justly ridicules the idea, and urges that, even though three times as much money be required, the mouth of the Sumida is the only proper site.

It appears that the Mexican emigration scheme is not turning out successfully. Thirty-seven Japanese were sent thither, and an area of 12,500 acres of land was taken up, but the soil proves to be hopelessly unproductive, and out of the thirty-seven immigrants, no less than thirty-five made their way to the Japanese Legation, a distance of 250 miles, in search of aid. Tokyo newspapers state that unless the families of the immigrants join them by next spring, the allotment of land will be forfeited. The matter is therefore causing much anxiety in Japan, especially to Viscount Enomoto, who has been the head and front of the enterprise.

Lieut Meyer, of the 12th U.S. Infantry, committed suicide by jumping overboard from the transport Sheridan two days before the steamer's arrival at Manila.

It is reported that Messrs. Macgregor, Gow & Co., the well-known London shipping firm, intend shortly to conduct their own business in connection with the Glen Line in the East.

In addition to macadamized roads, says a Chinese report, Legation-street, Peking, is about to be lighted with electricity, and a Japanese engineer has been entrusted with the work.

The second day of the Spring Races will be honoured by the presence of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor. His Majesty will give a handsome prize to the winner of the fourth race of the day. The band of H.M.S. Barfleur has been engaged.

Some of the Volunteer Regiments in the Philippines are now armed with the Krag-Jorgensen rifle. This is a change much needed, for the Filipinos with their Mausers usually made it hot for the Volunteers, whose Springfield rifles are of little use over a long range.

The Foreign Department has received a telegram, dated the 1st inst., from Consul Shimidzu at Vancouver, stating that 57 emigrants to British Columbia who arrived on the 25th April per steamer Empress of China were refused admittance on the ground that they were contract labourers.

The Railway Works Bureau invite tenders for a supply of Portland cement to the amount of 20,000 casks, to be delivered at Yokohama; and two lots of copper wire for electric lighting, to be delivered at Shimabashi. Tenders to be opened on the 18th inst. Mr. Zushi, Director of the Accountant Section, is to be in charge of the contract.

There have been several instances near Manila of mutilation of American dead by the Filipinos. The invariable practice is to strip the bodies naked and then mutilate them. Considering the claims of the Filipino leaders to rank with the highest civilised nations, this brutal conduct of the Filipinos is somewhat strange, remarks the China Mail.

On Monday a boy, eight years old, son of Mr. R. W. Borthwick's jinrikisha man, while climbing a tree near Dr. Wheeler's house, fell on the ground, his head striking a stone. He was lying unconscious, when Mr. J. B. Coulson passed by, and immediately had him carried in to Dr. Wheeler's for medical treatment. The boy was afterwards taken to Dr. Rokkaku's Hospital.

On the 17th April, the Provost guard raided a house in Manila that turned out to be a recruiting office of the insurgent Government. A Colonel, two captains and several subordinates were captured, together with evidence in the shape of books and papers that in proof conclusive. The place had been under police surveillance for some time. It is said that one of the prisoners is the Filipino general Pio del Pilar.

The Russo-Chinese Railway Company has given orders for the building of six swift ocean steamers, intended for a regular line to run between the terminus of the Manchurian Railway of Tientsin, Port Arthur, Shanghai, and Nagasaki. Two of the steamers are to be built at Newcastle, one at Greenock, one in Holland, and the other two in Germany. The vessels will carry both passengers and freight, making fortnightly trips.

Captain John Tracy Willoughby, a mining engineer, and recently of Matabeleland, has just made a voyage out to Nagasaki from Cardiff as an A.B. before the mast of the British ship Terrisdale. Out of work and wishing to do something he shipped just for the experience as much as anything. He has since gone to Hongkong on the Doric, whence he returns to the Cape.

THE JAPANESE INVASION OF KOREA IN 1592.

On the second day of the sixth moon the King called a great council to discuss the advisability of his staying longer in Pyeong-yang or of moving further south. One said, "If someone is left to guard this city it will be well for the King to move north," but another said, "Pyeong-yang is a natural fortress. We have 10,000 soldiers and plenty of provisions. If the King goes a step from here it will mean the destruction of the dynasty." Another voice urged a different course; "We have now lost half the kingdom. Only this province and that of Ham-gyung remain to us. In the latter there are soldiers and provisions in abundance and the King had better find there a retreat." All applauded this advice excepting Yun Du-su, who said, "No, this will not do. The Japanese will surely visit that province too. Ham-hung is not nearly so easy of defence as Pyeong-yang. If the King is to leave this place there are just three courses open to him. First, he can retire to Yung-byun in this province and call about him the border guard. If he cannot hold that place he can go to Eu-ju on the border and ask speedy help from China. If necessary he can go up the Yalu to Kang-gye, still on Korean soil. And if worse comes to worst he can cross into Chinese territory and find asylum at Kwan-jun-bo although it is sure that he could hold out for a few months at Kang-gye before this would be necessary. I know all about Ham-hung. Its walls are of great extent, but they are not high and it is open to attack from every side. Besides, if he retreats northward from that place he will find nothing but savage tribes. Here he must stay." But all cried out as with one voice that the King must go to Ham-hung. General Yi Hang-buk insisted upon the necessity of going north to the Yalu and imploring aid from China even if it became necessary for the King to find asylum on Chinese soil. But in spite of all this advice the King on the sixth of the month sent the Queen on toward Ham-hung and gave orders to General Yun Du-su to hold Pyeong-yang against the Japanese. His Majesty came out and seated himself in the Ta-dong summer-house and addressed the people saying, "I am about to start for Ham-hung, but I shall leave the Crown Prince here and you must all aid him loyally." At this the people raised a great outcry. It looked as if the people would all follow the King from the city. They did not want the Prince to stay, they wanted the King.

By this time the rumors of these things had gone ahead into Liao-tung. The form which the news assumed there was that the King of Korea had fled north to Pyeong-yang, but it was only a blind, as the Japanese and Koreans had formed an agreement to invade China together and the King had made a pretence of flight so as to keep the Chinese unsuspecting until the Japanese should reach the Yalu. This report caused a great deal of anxiety in the Chinese capital and the Emperor sent General In Se-ink, who was stationed in Liao-tung, to inquire into the truth or falsity of the report. General In immediately set out for Pyeong-yang, and on his arrival sought an audience with the King. It was granted, and the General, having learned the exact state of affairs, started post-haste back to Nanjing to report to the Emperor.

On the right day of the sixth moon the van of the Japanese army arrived on the bank of the Ta-dong opposite Pyeong-yang. But there were no boats and no way of crossing, so they went into camp to await the arrival of the main body of the army. No Jik was ordered by the King to take the ancestral tablets, as he was about to leave the town. The people were enraged at this, for they thought it would mean the immediate pillage of the city by the Japanese and consequent hardships and dangers to them. So the crowd armed itself with clubs and stones, and as the tablets were being carried they struck the equipage down and loudly insulted No Jik, who had it in charge. They said, "In times of peace you are ready enough to steal the government revenues, and it is for this reason that all this trouble has arisen. You call upon us to protect the city, and then run away yourself when danger approaches." Lashing themselves into a fury by their own words, they threw off their clothes and prepared to strike down every man who should come to the gates with a view to running away. Meanwhile the old people and the children besieged the palace with their prayers, saying, "We are all here to protect the city and, if the King leaves, it will be the same as handing us over to slaughter." In the eagerness of their importunities they even pressed into the outer court-yard and were stopped only by the statement that the King was not going to leave. Yu Sung-nyong came out and sat down before the crowd, and, addressing an old man, said, "You say that you desire to protect this place and the King, and you say well, but how is it that you so forget yourself as to come in this bold manner into the King's apartments and raise this disturbance?" The people, partly through shame and partly because it seemed evident that the King was not about to leave, returned to their homes.

That night the Japanese caught a Korean and sent him across the river with a letter to the King in which they said, "We wish to meet Yi Dok-hyung and have a parley with him." This seemed to be a proper thing to do, so Yi entered a small boat and was sculled out to the middle of the river, where he met Konishi. Without wasting any words in mere formalities the latter said, "The cause of all this trouble is that Korea would not give a safe conduct to our envoys to Nanking, but if you will now give us an open road into China all the trouble for you will be at an end." To this Yi replied "If you will send this army back to Japan we can confer about the matter, but we will listen to nothing so long as you are on Korean soil." Konishi continued, "We have no wish to harm you. We have wished such a conference as this before but have not had a single opportunity before today." But the only answer the Korean made was, "Turn about and take your troops back to Japan." The Japanese general thereupon lost his temper and cried, "Our soldiers always go ahead, and they know nothing about going backwards," and so the conference was broken up, each returning to his own side of the stream.

The next day the King succeeded in getting away from the city, and made his way towards Yung-byun, Generals Yun Du-su, Kim Myung-wun, and Yi Wun-ik being left to guard the city and oppose the passage of the enemy. The Japanese camped beside the Ta-dong and waited as they had waited beside the Im-jin "for something to turn up." They did not have to wait so long as they did beside the Im-jin. The Korean generals, Kim Myung-wun and Yun Du-su, were not without courage and skill, and they conceived the scheme of crossing the river at night at the ford of Neung-ni-do, a little above the city, and falling upon the enemy with a picked body of troops. It would be difficult to disprove that in the face of such odds and such a vast disparity in equipment, this plan showed the highest courage not only in the generals but in the common soldiers. The fact that the attempt failed and failed disastrously may reflect upon the judgment of the leaders, but it can never impeach their bravery. The fording of the river, always a difficult and slow operation at night, consumed more time than had been anticipated, and by the time the devoted men reached the Japanese outposts it was already dawn. They were now in a desperate situation. There was nothing to do but to retreat, but the retreat was itself a cause of disaster, for it revealed to the foe the position of the fords; and thus it happened that a miscalculation as to time made the Koreans the instrument of their own destruction, even as they had been at the Im-jin.

The Japanese now knew that they had everything their own way. After a hearty breakfast they shouldered their arms and made for the fords. They swarmed across in such crowds that the defenders were driven back before they had shot a dozen arrows. The two Korean Generals, making a virtue of necessity, opened the Ta-dong Gate on the river side of the town and told the people to escape for their lives. The soldiers threw all their heavier arms into the pond called Pung-wal-su and fled by way of the Po-dong Gate. The Japanese did not pursue, but took quiet possession of the town and settled down. Here again they made a grand mistake. Their only hope lay in pushing on at full speed into China, for even now the force that was to crush them was being collected, and every day of delay was lessening their chances of success.

The King was at Pak-ch'un when the news of the fall of P'yeng-yang reached him, and he was in feverish haste to get on to Ei-jin, saying that if worst came to worst he would cross into Chinese territory. But he added, "As I am told that by leaving Korean soil I shall abdicate my royal right I wish the Crown Prince, in case of General Ch'oe Heang-wun, to go to I-ch'un in Kang-wun Province and there gather about him an army and hold the fortress as long as he can." This order was immediately carried out, and the Prince started for Kang-wun Province while the King pushed on northward to Ka-san. He arrived at that place in the middle of the night. It was pitch dark and there were no lights and the rain was falling in torrents. The royal escort had dwindled to less than twenty men. Here the report was received that a Chinese force was about to cross the Ya-lu, and so the King stopped at Ka-san waiting their approach. Yu Sung-nyong was hurrying from town to town trying to get together provisions for the Chinese army that was coming to Korea's aid, but as fast as he got it together the people rose in revolt and stole it all. Some days passed and still the expected army did not appear, so Yi Dok-hyung was despatched as envoy to China to solicit aid from the Emperor, and His Majesty called together his little court and said, "If necessary I shall be obliged to cross the Ya-lu and find asylum on Chinese soil. If so which of you will go with me?" For some moments there was a dead silence, and then Yi Hang-bok, the same who had aided the Queen in her flight from the palace, spoke up and said, "I will go with you." The truth of the matter is that when the King left P'yeng-yang the courtiers all gave up the kingdom for lost and were ready to desert the King the moment there was a more favorable opening.

With tremendous toil Yu Sung-nyong succeeded in getting some provisions together and he transported it all to Ch'ong-jin, but when he arrived at that place he found a crowd of people assembled in front of the royal granary armed with clubs. He charged the mob and scattered it, caught eight of the leaders, and beheaded them on the spot. He then went to Kwak-san and secured further supplies and also at Kwi-sung and held it in readiness for the Chinese army when it should appear.

We will remember that the King had fully determined to go across into Ham-gyung Province, but at the last moment he had been dissuaded because of the difficulties that might arise if he were compelled to retreat further still. Being now urged to go on to Ei-jin, he replied, "Yes, I must do so, but what about the Queen, whom I sent forward into Ham-gyung Province?" The brave Prefect of Un-san made answer, "I will go and bring her to Your Majesty." So he set out across the country to find the Queen, and all the records tell us that he brought her faithfully to the King at Pak-ch'un. This short mention does this brave man scant justice, for even in these days a journey across the northern part of the peninsula is an arduous undertaking, especially in summer. But not only so; he was to find a Queen, beset perhaps by enemies, and bring her safely across that wilderness to the King, who by that time might be far across the Chinese border, while the country behind him swarmed with a half-savage enemy. This prefect, whose name is Song Da-op, must have been a brave, energetic, tactful man whose will was as strong as his loyalty was deep.

(TELEGRAM RECEIVED AT THE LEGATION OF FRANCE IN TOKYO.)

THE DREYFUS CASE.

Saigon, April 28.

The Figaro publishes the deposition of M. M. Paléologue, an official of the Foreign Office, dated March 29th, which establishes that the translation of the despatch of Panizzardi (Italian Military Attaché), contained in the secret portfolio of the Minister of War, is a false despatch, and that the translation of the Minister of Foreign Affairs is rigorously correct.

Mr. Lebre, Keeper of the Seals, has opened an inquiry into the Figaro's publication of the deposition of Mr. M. Paléologue, of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, before the Court of Cassation.

Saigon, May 1.

The Court of Cassation has heard Colonel Dupaty de Clam and Captain Cuignet. It is believed that the examination of witnesses has now been terminated.

ANGLO-RUSSIAN AGREEMENTS.

The agreement between England and Russia with regard to railways in China has been signed.

BRITISH CABLE SUBSIDY.

London, April 28.

The Times reports that the Government has decided to contribute an early subsidy to the full amount recommended by the Cable Committee, as guarantee for the construction of the all-British Pacific cables.

AUSTRIA AND CHINA.

At the Hungarian Diet, the Premier stated that there was no present intention on the part of Austria to acquire any territory in China.

THE COPPER MARKET.

An enormous rise in the price of copper has taken place, due to the American ring dislocating the trade.

FRANCE & GERMANY FRIENDLY TO ENGLAND.

Speaking in Birmingham, at the banquet of mechanical engineers, Mr. Goschen, First Lord of the Admiralty, said that the general appearance in Europe was much more tranquil than a few months ago, and that Great Britain had made friendly settlements with Germany and France. He also hoped that the country was making one with Russia.

ANGLO-RUSSIAN AGREEMENT IN CHINA.

London, April 30.

The Morning Post's St. Petersburg telegram states that an agreement between Great Britain and Russia regarding railways in China was signed yesterday. Russia binds herself not to attempt to obtain or assist another Power to obtain any railway or similar concession in the Yang-tsze valley, while Britain makes a similar pledge regarding Manchuria. The existing enterprises in spheres of interest are safeguarded.

London, May 1.

Speaking at the Royal Academy banquet, Lord Salisbury said he believed that the Anglo-Russian agreement would prevent, in all likelihood, the collision of British and Russian interests in future.

London, May 2.

The German press welcomes the Anglo-Russian agreement, as a guarantee for peace. Some French newspapers hold the same view, but others question whether Russia has not ignored the French interests, while the English Press is somewhat reserved pending the publication of the details.

London, May 3.

The preamble to the Anglo-Russian Agreement states that Russia and Great Britain agree to uphold the integrity and independence of China.

The Right Hon. A. J. Balfour, First Lord of the Treasury, speaking in the House of Commons, has promised to lay the text of the Agreement before Parliament as soon as received, and added that there are stipulations protecting the Newchwang Railway.

TRANSVAAL QUESTION.

BRITISH PRESS DEMANDING ACTION.

UITLANDERS EXCITED.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S STATEMENT.

English newspapers, including the Radical organs, are unanimously demanding action by the Imperial Government in response to the petition of the Uitlanders to redress grievances.

Numerous meetings are being held by the Uitlanders at Johannesburg demanding political rights.

The Krügerite organs insist that the agitation is all manufactured, as prior to the Jameson raid.

Mr. Chamberlain, Colonial Secretary, speaking in the House of Commons, stated that President Krüger had been informed that the dynamite concession would be a breach of the Convention.

PRESIDENT KRÜGER OPENS VOLKSRAAD.

President Krüger, in opening the Volksraad, hoped that, during the present session, he would be able to submit proposals regarding the franchise, the mining rights, and the dynamite question.

The Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, Colonial Secretary, has announced his intention of receiving the Uitlanders' petition, and commented upon the unprecedented circumstances under which it is presented.

Both the Times and the Standard insist that it is impossible to disregard the situation which is endangering the general welfare of South Africa.

ANGLO-RUSSIAN AGREEMENT.

London, May 4.

The Times reports that the Anglo-Russian agreement provides for the maintenance of a British chief engineer and financial controller for the Northern Railway up to Shanghaiwan, beyond which the road will be under Chinese control.

FRANCE AND SIAM.

A despatch to the New York Herald says that the province of Luanprabang has been ceded to France, in exchange for Chantabun, which has been abandoned by the latter country and constituted into a neutral zone.

GAME No. 504.

THE GREAT CABLE MATCH.

In the fourth International Match between the United States and Great Britain, the Americans won three, drew six, and lost only one game. We give below the solitary lost game. It will be seen that Black had a good game, probably the better game, after his 25th move and up to his 31st move. After that, White's game improved. Even then it was believed by many that Pillsbury could draw; but Blackburne played fine Chess in the ending, compelling the American to resign.

END GAME.

The young and rising player, Marshall, champion of the Brooklyn Chess Club, the other day played one of a series of games with the well-known amateur, Johnston, at the Manhattan Chess Club. In the course of the game—Marshall had to concede the odds of a knight—the following complicated position was arrived at:—

BLACK.

WHITE.

It was White's turn to play, and he proceeded with Kt to Q 6. There was a good number of onlookers, and at first they thought that all was over with Marshall. They expected the rejoinder B takes Kt, overlooking entirely the continuation 2—Q to K 8 ch, B to B: 3—B to B5, threatening mate on the move. When Black looked over the position he seemed to have detected the threat, and the game proceeded in the following manner:—

1—Kt to Q 6	1—P to K Kt 3
2—B takes Kt	2—B takes Kt
3—B to K 8	3—B to Kt 5 ch
4—K to B sq	4—Kt takes B ch
5—P takes Kt	5—Q to B 5 ch
6—K to Kt q	6—P to K 4
7—R to B sq	7—Resigns.

It will thus be seen that the move 1—Kt to Q 6 was really very ingenious and sound, and the whole combination indicating Marshall's wonderful judgment of position.

JANOWSKY AND SHOWALTER.

These two masters are playing another match of seven games up for $250 a side, and $100 offered by the Brooklyn Chess Club. When the mail left the score stood; Janowski, 1; Showalter, 2; Draws, 1.

From later advice received, we learn that Showalter won his match by a score of four to two. When the Frenchman congratulated him on his victory, the American very gallantly admitted that "sometimes the best men does not win."

NOTES.

Arrangements have been completed for the international cable chess match between Columbia, Harvard, Yale and Princeton and the British universities of Oxford and Cambridge, which was to be played April 21st and 22nd. Baron Albert de Rothschild of Vienna was to act as referee and was to settle all differences which cannot be adjusted by the umpires. Mr. John Henniker Heaton, M.P., who has been active in furthering cable matches between the legislative bodies of the two countries, was to act as umpire for the Americans at the British Chess Club. The British umpire had not yet been named.

W. E. Napier, Brooklyn's youthful chess prodigy, while in England a few weeks ago, gave evidence of his remarkable prowess on the chessboard to his kinsmen across the sea. The day after Napier's arrival in London he visited Simpson's Divan, the famous resort of chess-masters, and met F. J. Lee, who suggested playing a game, which they did. Napier scored a signal victory after a hard struggle, in which he retained the whip hand throughout. When the bout was over Lee, who is considered next to Blackburne and Burn among the English native players, asked his youthful opponent's name. When informed he did not suggest another game, for Napier's fame had preceded him, and his astonishment at the young stranger's ability at once vanished.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, APRIL 29TH, 1899.

DEATH.

On the 13th March last, LUCY ALCOCK, relict of the late Sir Rutherford Alcock, K.C.B.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

THE question of the Crown Prince's marriage is again being mooted.

ST. GEORGE'S SOCIETY gave a big ball at the Public Hall, Yokohama, on Tuesday.

CAPTAIN BOISSIERE has been appointed naval attaché in the French Legation at Tokyo.

THE Brazilian Envoy, Senhor Henrique Lisboa, was received in farewell audience by the Emperor on the 22nd, and afterwards, in company with his wife and daughters, by H.I.M. the Empress.

It is suggested that Mr. Hoshi Tora should supersede Mr. Yano as Japanese Minister to Peking.

THE N.Y.K. has decided to order 3 steamers of 6,000 tons, and over 15 knots, to be placed on the North Pacific line.

It has been arranged that Mr. Takahashi Shin-kichi will be appointed in October president of the Japan Industrial Bank.

MR. J. L. O. EYTON, aged 54, had a bicycle race with a young Japanese rider last Sunday from Yokohama to Oiso and won easily.

THE Germans are demanding the erection of a Church, the payment of an indemnity, etc., before they will consent to retire from Ichou.

THE Russian Minister, with several of his staff, is paying a lengthy visit at Nagasaki. He will make a tour of the adjacent provinces shortly.

DURING the absence of Marquis Yamagata, Premier, who is now away in Kyoto, Marquis Saigo, Minister for Home Affairs, is acting for him.

ON Monday morning several cars attached to a Nagoya train on the Sanyo Railway upset near Amishima Station, and three persons were injured.

THE Americans are making a steady advance northward of Manila, putting down the rebellion. Aguinaldo retreats faster than the American advance.

VISCOUNT MIURA has been several times assaulted during his political tour in the north-eastern provinces, and now goes about with a strong police escort.

THE Rev. W. J. White was installed Worshipful Master of the Tokyo Lodge on Friday evening, in the presence of a large assemblage of the Brethren.

COUNT AND COUNTESS KURODA gave a very enjoyable garden-party at Mita on Thursday in honour of their daughter's marriage to a son of Viscount Enomoto.

SOME difficulty is being experienced in docking H.M.S. Victorious at Yokohama. All her heavy guns have been removed and most of her equipment, in order to lighten her.

MR. CHINDA, Minister to Holland, and Mr. Okashi, Minister to Brazil, who are leaving for their respective posts, were received in audience by H.I.H. the Emperor on the 24th.

A HOKKAIDO hunter named Imano recently shot a large bear measuring about nine feet, in the recesses of a mountain, three and a half ri from Oiaru. He also captured three cubs.

AT present a clever thief is paying special attention to bartenders in Tokyo. He visits them as a client, and, taking advantage of any possible opportunities, steals their watches, clothes, &c.

THE French Academy of Science has granted to Major Marchand, for his journey across Africa, the grand prize of 15,000 francs, which constitutes a recognition of the highest devotion to science.

ON the arrival of a down train at Kobe the other day a human head covered with blood was found near the wheels. It proved to be that of a man who had been run over near Sumiyoshi Station.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in defending the vote for the barracks in South Africa, stated that an enormous increase, in both offensive and defensive forces, by the Transvaal, formed the sole reason for increasing the British garrison.

AN old woman, aged 96, mother of one Miura Kihachiro, belonging to the village of Kuji, Rikachu Province, has 96 children, grandchildren, and descendants. They have been increasing of late years at the rate of about 10 per annum.

A DECREE has been issued authorizing the opening of works of railway construction from Haiphong to Vietri, and from Hanoi to Vinh, with the exception of the section from Ninh-binh to Quang-yen, which crosses the rivers of the delta.

Le Figaro states that an agreement has been effected between the King of Siam and M. Doumer, Governor-General of Indo-China, in virtue of which French will be taught in public schools, while the question of Luangprabang has also been satisfactorily settled.

SECOND Captain Murakami has been appointed naval attaché to the Japanese Legation in Paris; Commander Ota and First Lieutenant Saiho to the Legation in London; First Lieutenant Hirose to the Legation in St. Petersburg; and First Lieutenant Akiyama to the Legation in Washington.

THE Japan Red Cross Society's ship Kasai Maru, sister ship of the Hakui Maru, which has arrived at Yokohama, is reported to have left Glasgow on the 21st. These ships are to be chartered to the N.Y.K. during peace time, and will be placed on the Hongkong-Vladivostok line.

THE births and deaths last month in Tokyo reached the following totals:—Births, 2,914 (1,473 males and 1,441 females); deaths, 2,129 (1,117 males and 1,011 females). The marriages numbered 933 (an increase of 215 compared with the preceding month), and the divorces 205 (an increase of 27, as compared with the preceding month).

DURING the first three months of this year the number of ships added to the Mercantile Marine of Japan was as follows:—January—steamers 5, sailing ships 180; February—steamers 6, sailing ships 182; March—steamers 9, sailing ships 205. The Hongkong Maru (6,063 tons), the Tatsukami Maru (2,691 tons), the Daijin Maru (1,649 tons), and the Futami Maru (3,840) are the largest of the new acquisitions.

POLITICAL TOPICS.

Mr. Akabane is gazetted to the post of Counsellor of the Foreign Office, in addition to the position of Minister Plenipotentiary en disponibilité. That means, of course, that his appointment as Vice-Minister has been given up, for the present at all events, a fact which our readers are already acquainted. There seems to be very little doubt that Mr. Takahira will become Vice-Minister.

Viscount Aoki's enemies have drawn in their horns. The Asahi offers an explanation which is intended to be a Partisan shaft for the Minister. It makes out that inasmuch as the main cause of the difficulty was the Viscount's disagreement with his subordinate, Mr. Tsuzuki, who is Count Inouye's relative, the Count felt constrained to support the Minister since opposition would have been attributed to partizanship! That is an entertaining interpretation. Are we to understand that the vehement attacks made by a section of the press upon Viscount Aoki's foreign policy were due simply to friction between him and the Vice-Minister of the Department over which he presides? If that be so, the confession, instead of being a parting shot for Viscount Aoki, is a suicidal stroke for his enemies. While professing to write grave criticisms in the interest of the nation's foreign relations, they were simply expounding the cause of a Vice-Minister in a personal quarrel with a Minister. We suspect that no one is more disgusted with all this talk than Mr. Tsuzuki himself.

The Yorosu Choho has a story worthy of its most savoury traditions, and that is saying a great deal. It makes out that Mr. Hoshi Toru has obtained a sum of thirty thousand yen from the Minister for Foreign Affairs by intimidation, the Minister having secretly subscribed twenty thousand to pay the expenses of the new political party, and having thus provoked the wrath of the Constitutional leader. To cap the tale, the Yorosu alleges that Mr. Hoshi has pocketed the thirty thousand yen himself. It goes without saying that the Yorosu does not believe a word of these falsehoods. It has the honour of being the most reckless and depraved journal in Japan. We presume that no one finds it worth while to invoke the law against such a newspaper. The pity is that journalists themselves do not possess some power like that vested in the benchers of England, for it would be very much in the interests of journalism in general that a paper like the Yorosu Choho should be "unfrocked."

Count Okuma comes in for a good deal of abuse because he has espoused the cause of reduced taxation. He is accused of stirring up the ignorant rustics to rebel against the Land Tax, and the Progressist leaders are charged with resorting to improper intimidation because they have announced that no person who is not a member of the Gensō Domei (League for the Reduction of Taxation) will be eligible for any posts of honour which the League may have power to secure—i.e., membership of the Lower House of the Diet, or of provincial assemblies, or of party committees and so on. The latter accusation seems to us to be mere froth. No political party casts its votes in favour of persons who do not support its platform.

As to Count Okuma and the rustics, the charge sounds somewhat antiquated when we remember that all the political parties, including that which now attacks the Count, employed their parliamentary strength a few years ago to obstruct legislation and block the passage of the budgets as well the necessary increase of the Navy and the reform of the prison system, solely for the sake of getting the Land Tax reduced. But there certainly is one weak point in Count Okuma's armour. It was by the Cabinet to which he belonged that the second part of the programme of armament expansion was adopted, and since that programme is responsible for the expenditures involving increased taxation, Count Okuma's former action and his present position are difficult to reconcile.

As a feature of general fiscal policy, too, it seems most regrettable that any public prejudice should be excited against the Land Tax, for that is the form of impost most consistent with the soundest principles of modern political economy. Neither do we believe that the condition of the agricultural classes suggests any symptom of suffering from heavy fiscal burdens. A very conclusive proof is furnished by their conduct in the matter of rice. They have large stores of rice on their hands at present, but they can afford to hold it in the hope of enhanced prices and big profits, instead of realizing forthwith at fairly remunerative figures. The consequence is that there has been little or no export, comparatively speaking, and the season for transactions of that kind is now nearly over. A plentiful harvest this year may prove an embarrassment rather than a blessing to the farmers, but in the meanwhile men who can hold tens of millions of yen worth of rice locked up in their granaries can not be much distressed about paying their taxes.

It is stated that when Mr. Takahira is appointed to be Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs, he will be succeeded at the Legation in Vienna by Mr. Makino, at present Minister in Italy, and the latter's successor will be Mr. Oyama, now a Minister Plenipotentiary en disponibilité.

The Mainichi Shinbun, in large type, double headed, announces a crisis in the country's foreign affairs; conferences between Viscount Aoki and Marquis Ito, and Viscount Aoki and Count Okuma, and a general state of unrest and anxiety. For a staid, sober journal like the Mainichi that kind of sensationalism is strange. The crisis is wholly imaginary.

In connexion with the rumours recently circulated about ministerial instability, Mr. Hoshi Toru has been interviewed. The gist of his remarks was that perpetual dissatisfaction, in some form or other, existed among the members of the Constitutional Party, but that they did not want to share administrative power with the present Cabinet. They had a fair cause of complaint about the Regulations for Official Appointments. Doubtless, however, something would be done to mitigate their discontent in that matter, and, for the rest, their prime object was to have their policy adopted by the Government. Success in that respect would be the reward they chiefly desired for supporting the ministry. The expectation of the Party was that it would bury the present Cabinet in due time, with all becoming ceremony, and would then possess a large reversionary title to the official property of the deceased.

POLICE AND FOREIGNERS

As a result of investigations made by order of the Department of Justice, instructions have been issued to the police which are not only excellent in spirit, but may also have the very desirable result of educating a discretionary disposition among the force. The instructions are to the effect that in dealing with foreigners when the latter pass under Japanese jurisdiction, the police must endeavour to distinguish, and treat leniently, difficulties resulting from differences of language, or of customs, and must show as much consideration as possible towards persons arrested. The police are already a very civil and fairly efficient body of men, but they have one great fault: they stick too closely to the letter of the law instead of exercising a wise discretion. The object of the police in England is to preserve good order with a minimum of arrests and penalties. They try to avoid making prisoners as far as possible. The Japanese carry that rule to still greater lengths in the case of drunkenness. Disorderliness is a rare accompaniment of drunkenness in Japan, and so is complete incapacity. Seldom or never does one see a drunken Japanese defying the world or embracing the gutter, and short of the former condition or the latter arrests are not made. We have often thought that the police err on the side of leniency in that matter. For the rest, however, their disposition is to shun the responsibility of ever putting any liberal construction on the law, and it will be a decided gain if the orders recently issued have the effect of leading them to exercise their own judgment more freely.

AN ANGRY JOURNAL

In straits for some stick to beat the Cabinet, the Yomiuri Shinbun does a little "swearing at large," and falls foul of Dr. Myers in the process. It calls the Doctor a Goro-tsuki, which is the Japanese equivalent of "loafer," and manufactures a very choice list of charges against him, as that he obtained from Liu, the President of Formosa's ephemeral republic, a number of bogus titles to real estate which he afterwards held in terrorem over the Japanese authorities, compelling them not only to recognise their validity, in some cases, but also to employ him as adviser at two hundred yen a month, and that he has now found his way to Tokyo to practise further sinister manoeuvres. On reading this very pretty specimen of reckless abuse we were at first disposed to think that some enemy of Dr. Myers had obtained access to the columns of our distressed contemporary, but closer scrutiny shows that the Cabinet is the real object of attack, and that the Yomiuri's purpose is to bring the Ministry into contempt first by falsely representing them as intimidated by Dr. Myers, and secondly by depicting Dr. Myers in such colours that to be intimidated by him is to be contemptible. The Yomiuri would pay dearly for its romantic tendencies were it published in a country where the Law Courts could be induced to punish libel adequately.

EMPHYTEUSIS

There is some agitation, apparently with reason, against the Civil Code and the Law of Operation of the Civil Code in the matter of emphyteusis. An emphyteuta is a person who uses the land of another to carry on agriculture or cattle raising. The 278th Article of the Civil Code says that the duration of an emphyteusis is from 20 to 50 years, and if it is created for more than 50 years, it must be reduced to 50 years. But the 47th Article of the Law of Operation of the Code says that an emphyteusis created before the taking effect of the Code shall be valid even though its duration exceeds fifty years, but that if its period—i.e. its remaining period—exceeds fifty years from the day when the Civil Code takes effect, it shall be reduced to fifty years from that day. The critics claim that there is a conflict between these two articles, since the one declares that if an emphyteusis is created for a longer period than 50 years it must be reduced to 50 years, and the other says that however long it may have been running before the operation of the Code, it may have a further lease of 50 years' life. We fail to detect the contradiction ourselves. What the Law of Operation does is simply to provide that the Civil Code shall not have retrospective effect. But the serious objection urged is that the new law will operate most inconveniently with regard to the tenure of land in many parts of the empire. It is claimed that considerable tracts of land now under cultivation have been rendered arable under a dual arrangement, by which one party supplied the capital, the other the labour, and both acquired an equal right to the land, the capitalist, however, being registered as the owner, and the working farmer as the perpetual tenant in consideration of a certain division of the produce. What is to become of this kind of tenure under the new Code? Will the registered owner,—i.e. the original capitalist or his descendant,—be entitled to say to the representative of the original reclaimer, "Your right of perpetual tenancy shall now be reduced to a fifty-years' emphyteusis?" That would certainly be a hardship. We presume that in other directions also the working of the Code will be found more or less at variance with existing conditions.

LAND TAX AND LAND RENT.

For the purpose of comparing the present special system of land rents in the Foreign Settlements with the general system of land tax that would be applied were foreigners and Japanese on the same footing, we recently published some partial figures which seem to have attracted a good deal of attention. It will be worth while, therefore, to complete the estimate, so that our readers may be able to see exactly what would be the effect of abolishing land rents and substituting a land tax the same as that paid by Japanese subjects.

SETTLEMENT OF YOKOHAMA.

Area of land in foreign occupation.....	Tsubo.
Total sum paid originally by foreigners	Yen.
for this land	101,278
Land Rent now paid annually under special system	36,068

These figures bring out the interesting fact that the land in the Settlement passed into the possession of the foreign settlers at an average price of 85 sen per tsubo approximately. It must be now worth fully fifty times that amount. We proceed, next, to consider the figures that would apply under the general fiscal system:—

Taxable value of the land in the Yokohama Settlement.....	Yen.
Imperial Land Tax that would be leviable on the above at the present rate of 5 per cent.	894,005
Prefectural Land Tax	44,700
District Land Tax	7,371
Relief Fund	3,175
House Tax	607
House Tax	7,144
Total	62,997

We have included the House Tax in the latter category, as it forms an item in the general fiscal system. But inasmuch as the House Tax will be leviable on buildings in the Foreign Settlement after the Revised Treaties go into operation, it does not constitute a factor of differentiation between the special and the general systems. Hence the ultimate results stand thus:—

Taxes that will be payable after July on account of land and buildings in the Foreign Settlement of Yokohama under the present special system.....	Yen.
Taxes that would be payable under the general fiscal system	43,212
Difference in favour of the special system	62,997
Difference in favour of the special system	19,785

BLUFF LANDS OF YOKOHAMA.

Area of land in foreign occupation	Tsubo.
Total sum paid for the same	Yen.
Ground Rent now paid annually	103,293
.....	23,534

This land, it will be observed, came into the hands of the original purchasers for 55 sen per tsubo, approximately. The figures under the general system would be:—

Taxable Value of the Bluff lands	Yen.
Imperial Land Tax (3.33 per cent.)	165,655
Prefectural Land Tax	5,466
District Land Tax	1,405
Relief Fund	603
House Tax	114
House Tax	1,278
Total	1,278

Noting, as in the case of the Settlement lands, that the House Tax will be leviable after July although the special system remains in force, our final result with regard to the Bluff is:—

Taxes that will be payable under the special system after July on Yokohama Bluff lands in foreign occupation ..	Yen.
Taxes that would be payable under the general system	24,812
Difference in favour of the general system	8,866
Difference in favour of the general system	15,946

Grouping together the Settlement lands and the Bluff lands, we find these figures:—

Total taxes that will be payable after July on Settlement and Bluff lands under the special system	Yen.
Total taxes that would be payable under the general system	68,024
Total advantage derived by the Yokohama community by remaining under the present special system of land rents	71,863
We now pass to the case of Kobe:—

SETTLEMENT OF KOBE.

Area of land in foreign occupation	Tsubo.
Total sum paid originally by foreigners	Yen.
for this land	39,988
Annual rent now paid under special system	120,438
.....	15,000

It appears from these figures that land in the Kobe Settlement cost its original occupants 3.01 yen per tsubo, which is three and a half times the corresponding figure for Yokohama.

The figures under the general fiscal system would be:—

Taxable value of land in Kobe Settlement	Yen.
Imperial Land Tax (at 5 per cent.)	198,160
Prefectural Land Tax	9,908
District Land Tax	884
Relief Fund	990
House Tax	69
House Tax	2,239

Total

Area of land occupied by foreigners in the extra-Settlement area at Kobe.	Tsubo.
Area of land	9,117
Annual rent under the present (special) system	Yen.
Taxable Value under the general system	2,211
Imperial Land Tax (at 5 per cent.)	37,585
Prefectural Land Tax	1,870
District Land Tax	168
Relief Fund	187
House Tax	12
House Tax	236

The final results in Kobe's case, therefore, are as follow:—

Total taxes that will be payable after July on Settlement and extra-Settlement Lands in Kobe under the special system	Yen.
Total taxes that would be payable under the general system	19,686
Difference in favour of general system ..	16,572

For Tokyo we have the following:—

TOKYO SETTLEMENT.	Tsubo.
Area of lands in foreign occupation	Yen.
Price paid by foreigners for this land	25,642
Annual rent now paid (under the special system)	43,148
Taxable value under the general system	7,180
Imperial Land Tax	91,171
City Land Tax	4,558
District Land Tax	502
House Tax	276
House Tax	1,714

Total taxes under general system

Hence in Tokyo's case the final result is:—

Taxes payable after July under the special system	Yen.
Taxes that would be payable under the general system	8,894
Difference in favour of general system ..	7,140

For the remaining Settlements, Osaka, and Nagasaki we have:—

OSAKA SETTLEMENT.	Tsubo.
Area of land occupied by foreigners	Yen.
Total price paid by foreigners for this land	9,937
Annual rent now paid (under the special system)	39,297
Taxable value of the land	4,150
Imperial Land Tax (at 5 per cent.)	37,903
City Land Tax	1,595
District Land Tax	259
Relief Fund	113
House Tax	9
House Tax	229

Total taxes payable under the general system

Hence in Osaka's case we find this result:—

Total taxes payable after July (under the special system)	Yen.
Total taxes payable under the general system	4,379
Difference in favour of the general system	2,205

NAGASAKI SETTLEMENT.

Area of land in foreign occupation	Tsubo.
(For this land no payments were originally made.)	Yen.
Annual rent paid under the special system	25,494
Taxable value of the land	Yen.
Imperial Land Tax (at 5 per cent.)	7,943
Prefectural Land Tax	67,556
District Land Tax	3,378
House Tax	441
House Tax	221
Relief Fund	2,845
Relief Fund	39

Total taxes payable under the general system

Hence in Nagasaki's case our result is:—

Taxes that will be paid after July (under the special system).....	Yen. 10,788
Taxes that would be payable under the general system.....	6,944

Difference in favour of the general system 3,844

Collating all the above results we have the following table:—

	Taxes under the present system. Yen.	Taxes under the general system Yen.
Yokohama	68,044	71,863
Kobe	19,686	16,572
Tokyo	8,894	7,140
Osaka	4,379	2,205
Nagasaki.....	10,788	6,944

Totals 111,771 104,724

Thus it appears that if the general system of taxation were applied to all the Settlements, the foreign communities would be gainers to the extent of 7,047 yen. It is a small matter, arithmetically speaking, but the figures are certainly worth publication in view of the belief which seems to be entertained by some Japanese that the foreign residents enjoy an unfair advantage over their Japanese competitors by holding their lands under a special system. It will be remembered that the Keisai Zasshi recently discussed the subject, and in very emphatic terms urged either that the foreigners should be bought out, or that new ports should be opened with the object of depreciating the value of the land at the present ports and thus inducing the foreign occupants to sell it to Japanese. Probably when our contemporary finds that foreigners will be paying actually more after July on account of their lands than they would have to pay if they were brought under the general system of taxation operative throughout the rest of the empire, it will see that the drastic measures recommended by it are decidedly superfluous.

LAKES AND FORESTS.

A correspondent writes:—"A plan is on foot to drain the beautiful lake at Kawaguchi, on the northern flank of Fuji. The peasants will suffer, but some speculator expects to make two thousand yen. At least, that is what I hear. Furthermore, I am told that Professor Burton condemned the project when first mooted some years ago. . . . People do many wrong things despite excellent laws. For instance, the deforestation that goes on in the Government woods is woeful, simply because the staff of foresters is insufficient to stop depredations on the part of the neighbouring peasantry. Possibly such foresters as there are, connive at the depredations. The laws are good, I understand, but their enforcement is very faulty. One who travels much, as I do, can not but be alarmed at the progress of deforestation in this country. Izu is ruined; the Nakasendo is half ruined; the Mibu district is being ruined; the same is true of other regions, and all during this single Meiji era. Under the Shogunate the laws were observed; now they are not. It is surely a very grave question, for the agriculture of the country and the control of the rivers are bound up with it." It is strange that no Japanese of influence takes this subject under his special care. In every session of the Diet, and periodicaly in the newspapers, an agitation is got up about the State Forests, but their unproductiveness and mismanagement are the cry, not their denudation.

CHARGES AT JAPANESE INNS.

A few days ago there appeared in the columns of a local English contemporary a letter condemning, in somewhat severe terms, the charges made by Japanese inn-keepers when foreigners use their inns. This letter has elicited from the Fiji Shimpō certain editorial comments which appear so just that we reproduce their gist. Our contemporary points out that foreigners are entirely mistaken if they imagine that the fixed tariff of prices—in other words, the items set forth in the bill—covers the expenditures made by a Japanese guest at an inn. He gives in addition a chadai, or douceur, which adds very materially to his outlay. The foreigner does not understand that custom, and therefore makes no attempt to comply with it, and the consequence is that inn-keepers include the chadai in his account, which thus becomes apparently much larger than it would be were it for a Japanese. In the second place, there is the fact that the foreign guest gives incomparably more trouble than the Japanese. The better the social status of a Japanese traveller, the more courteous he is; the less exacting are his ways, and the greater consideration does he show for all around him. But the opposite is true of a foreigner. Intentionally or unintentionally, he always makes himself very obtrusive, takes up a great deal of room, and demands a great deal of attention. It can not be called exorbitant or unfair that some additional charge should be levied from him. The Fiji nevertheless recommends that the chadai system should be abandoned, being an equivocal and inconvenient custom, and that all charges should be final.

Our own experience leads us to endorse every word written by the Fiji. Indeed, our contemporary might have gone much further. It might have pointed out, with truth, that the presence of foreign guests at an inn generally has the effect of deterring Japanese custom. We do not mean to assert that the average Japanese gentleman dislikes staying under the same roof with a foreigner. What we mean is that when accommodation is given to foreign guests the routine of the arrangements at the inn is dislocated: the bath has to be specially prepared; the kitchen is put to unwonted uses, and the house in general is pervaded by an atmosphere of disagreeable bustle. Such is not always the case, of course, but any of our readers who have travelled much in Japan will endorse our remarks. Directly and indirectly the foreigner takes up more room and requires more service than the Japanese, and must expect to pay more. The ultimate explanation is that Japanese inns are not adapted for accommodating foreigners. At a hotel built and run in Western style, the nationality of a guest makes no perceptible difference. But the average foreigner does not fit comfortably into a Japanese inn.

THE "CHITOSE."

The new second-class cruiser Chitose, which was built for Japan in the United States, arrived at Yokosuka on the 20th instant. She left San Francisco on the 21st of March, and came under easy steam via Hawaii. The Chitose's armament has been sent out from Lord Armstrong and Company's factory, and will be placed in the ship at Yokosuka.

GENERAL VISCOUNT KAWAKAMI.

Universal regret is caused by the intelligence that General Viscount Kawakami is dangerously ill. He is suffering from some trouble of the heart, and Doctors Baelz and Hashimoto are in constant attendance. Tokyo journals say that the Viscount fainted seven times on the 22nd instant, and that the Emperor sent a Chamberlain to enquire about his condition. Viscount Kawakami is Vice-Chief of the Head-Quarter staff. It was upon him that the duty of planning the campaigns against China devolved, and he has often been called the Moltke of Japan.

General Viscount Kawakami's condition was slightly more hopeful on Tuesday, but he has had more than one alarmingly severe attack of spasms of the heart. It is said that his malady dates from the war of 1894-5, when very onerous duties devolved on him as the most active member of the Head-Quarters Staff, and that it was greatly aggravated by the loss of his daughter, to whom he was deeply attached. No marked cause for uneasiness presented itself, however, until the 19th instant. On that day the Viscount attended the graduation ceremony at the Seijo Gakko, a very lengthy affair, involving the delivery of an address. Subsequently he received a visit from the Minister of Finance, who consulted with him for several hours. That night some painful symptoms were developed, and on the 22nd he had an access of spasms which lasted for two hours. It is feared that, even though immediate danger be averted, the distinguished officer's condition will be such as to necessitate complete rest.

MINOBU.

It may interest some of our readers to hear that an exhibition of the art treasures of the Minobu temples will be held for three weeks, beginning on May 2nd. The shortest way to reach Minobu is to go to Iwabuchi station on the Tokaido line; sleep at the Tani-ya inn, and engage a jinrikisha with two men for the 13-ri ride to Minobu—feasible in one day—up the perfectly lovely valley of the Fuji-kawa. The return journey may be made by boat down the rapids in from 3 to 5 hours. There is probably no very great collection of art treasures at the temples, as they were burned down within the past 30 years, but they certainly have some fine pictures, especially a few from the brush of the great Kano Motonobu, who is said to have spent 3 or 4 years at the place. The temples themselves are very fine. A full description of them is given in the Guide-Book.

JAPANESE SILK FABRICS IN FRANCE.

The Official Gazette publishes a notice that certificates of origin (seisan genchi shōmei-shō) must accompany all Japanese fabrics of pure silk imported into France, from the 1st of next August, habutaye excepted. The document will have to be signed either by the local government office of the Prefecture where the fabric is manufactured; or by the Inspector of Customs at the port of export, or by the French Representative in Japan. A certificate signed by a local government office must have the endorsement of a French Consul.

CONSERVATISM IN EDUCATION.

The opinion has often been expressed in these columns that whatever anti-foreign feeling exists in Japan finds its foster-parent in the educational staff of the country. It is impossible to suppose that the rudeness so often displayed by students towards foreigners would long survive any resolute effort on the part of school-teachers to correct it. But the school-teachers of Japan are probably among the worst of their class in the civilized world. To expect them to be men of competence and high attainments would, of course, be extravagant, for the salaries they receive are not sufficient to remunerate a common labourer. A slight improvement has been effected in their pecuniary condition during the past two years, but it is insignificant, and unless the present opportunity is seized to apply a remedy, things will probably drift on in their evil groove for years to come. When we say "the present opportunity," we allude to a Bill passed by the Diet last session, in the sense that the Treasury should lend to elementary education such assistance as would tend to raise the number of school-attending children from 66 to 88 per cent. of the school-age total. It was a vaguely phrased measure, and there is some discussion now about its meaning, as it will have to be put into operation from April 1st, 1900. Some people maintain that the idea of the Diet was to relieve parents from the burden of paying school fees. The fees paid on account of the children—66 per cent.—now attending school aggregate 3,360,000 yen, and if the per-centage of attendance rose to 88, the fees would amount to 2 million yen. Hence, according to this interpretation of the Bill, the State should put its hand into its pocket to the tune of 4 million yen on account of the schools, and elementary education should be absolutely free for all children of school-going age. But that would not do anything for the teachers. They would remain just as they are now, incompetent, miserably remunerated persons, with a mere smattering of knowledge, quite unable to command the respect of their pupils, and thus indirectly responsible for the scholastic insubordination which disgraces Japan. Hence, many publicists contend that whatever increase of State aid is granted under the Bill, should go to procuring a better class of teachers. Others again, think that physical education is the great desideratum of the time, and would have the Treasury devote funds to meet that want. In short, the sum of the matter is that the educational system stands in need of improvement all round, and the public are perplexed to determine which of its defects should be remedied first.

Under such circumstances it is surely singular that a strong objection should exist to permitting foreigners to engage in educational enterprise in Japan. A resolution recently adopted by the Yokohama Educational Society, and submitted to the Government through the Society's president, Mr. Otani Kabei, would, were it embodied in a law, have the effect of excluding foreigners from the whole field of general education, and of restricting them to the sphere of technical education alone. Of course the motive of this conservatism is an apprehension lest foreign influence in education should undermine the nation's patriotism and loyalty to the throne. It is an extravagant fancy. The Fiji Shimpō pertinently asks whether parents refrain from sending a child to school lest scholastic discipline should have the effect of impairing its filial love, and reminds its countrymen that patriotism is an instinct not so easily eradicated. We should not, for our own part, attach much importance to isolated expressions of opinion like that of the Yokohama Society, seeing that the strongly liberal tone of some of the leading vernacular papers indicates the existence of a wholesome sentiment in other quarters. But it is stated that among the queries submitted by the Department of Education to the High Educational Council, there is one suggesting that no person unfamiliar with the Japanese language should be allowed to establish a private school. That, as the Hochi Shimbun justly points out, seems to be directed against foreign educational enterprise, and, of course, if such a spirit exists in official circles, the outlook is not re-assuring. The Hochi denounces the authorities in the strongest terms for suggesting such a restriction: calls them old-fashioned, narrow-minded, pusillanimous and what not. Is it quite certain, however, that the proposed qualification would exclude foreigners, or even embarrass them? Foreign co-operation in Japanese education may be said to be confined to the missionaries, and the missionaries make it their business to acquire the Japanese language. Of course, the expression kokugo ni tsū-tatsu suru koto wo shōmei suru (furnish proof of familiarity with the language of the country) might be interpreted so as to exclude all foreigners, for no foreign sinologue, even the most learned, could pass an examination of a drastic nature in the Japanese language. But would it be so interpreted? We do not think so. Possibly this proposal is a sagacious compromise intended to deprive conservatism of its mischievous potentialities while not exciting it by radical opposition.

A far more serious question, to which we have often alluded in these columns, is the tendency to discourage private educational enterprise. Among the suggestions submitted to the Educational Council are the following:—

Children of school age, who have not fulfilled their public scholastic duty, shall not be permitted to enter any private schools with the exception of those qualified to take the place of public elementary school.

Persons who establish private schools must have obtained certificates of competence as teachers.

The former of these proposals would virtually eliminate private enterprise from the field of elementary education, since no child would be permitted to enter a private school until he had completed his course at a public elementary school. The second would make it impossible for men like Mr. Okura Kihachiro to establish a commercial school, or Mr. Fukuzawa to establish a Keio Gijyuku, or Count Okuma a Semmon Gakko, or Mr. Nishima a Doshisha. It is not conceivable that the Authorities have any desire to impose such restrictions, but there can be no question that their attitude towards private education is singularly illiberal.

THE YOKOTA AFFAIR.

Any of our readers who retain a recollection of the stormy incidents that preceded the fall of the Okuma Cabinet, must be very familiar with the name of

Mr. Yokota. When Mr. Sone Arasuke held the portfolio of Justice, he adopted drastic measures to purge the Judiciary of its antiquated and imperfectly qualified elements, and Mr. Yokota lent active assistance in carrying out this reform, one result of which was the promotion of Mr. Yokota himself to the post of Chief Public Procurator. These things happened on the very verge of Mr. Sone's retirement, and some of the Judicial officials who had suffered by the reform submitted a strong protest to his successor, Mr. Ohigashi. They complained specially of the part played by Mr. Yokota, and the new Minister of Justice endorsed their protest by removing Mr. Yokota from the Chief Public Procuratorship to the inferior position of Chief Public Procurator of the Tokyo Court of Appeal. Mr. Yokota carried the case to the Cabinet, and for a considerable time it seemed probable that he would triumph over the Minister. In the end, however, some indiscreet language used by him when addressing the Minister led to his removal from office as a disciplinary measure, the original dispute being thus left unsettled. Mr. Yokota has now been relieved from disciplinary punishment, and appointed Chief Public Procurator of the Tokyo Appeal Court. In other words, he gets the office which he refused to accept when its acceptance involved a step-down from the higher post of Kenji Sōchō. Of course it is one thing to obtain a good appointment after having been placed on the Retired List in disgrace, but it is quite another thing to descend from a higher to a lower post without being convicted of any fault.

NIKKO RESTORATIONS.

Restorations on a somewhat expensive but still insufficient scale are to be undertaken at Nikko, according to vernacular journals. A sum of 200,000 yen will be spent, at the rate of 40,000 yearly; half being furnished by the Treasury, under the provisions of the Law for the Preservation of Ancient Shrines and Temples, and the remainder coming out of the Hoko-kai, a private society organized for the purpose of conserving Nikko. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun says that this outlay will not be enough for any interior restorations, and that the money will barely suffice to strengthen the foundations and repair the exterior of the buildings. We read our contemporary's remarks with some surprise, for very considerable repairs have been made within the past five years.

MARRIAGE OF THE PRINCE IMPERIAL.

It is stated that the marriage of the Prince Imperial will take place next November. The Prince will complete his twentieth year on the 31st of August. The reigning Emperor was only 16 years and three months of age at the time of his marriage, and had then been on the Throne for nearly two years. His Majesty's first child—a Prince who died on the day of his birth—was born just before he had completed his twenty-first year. The marriage of the Prince Imperial has been deferred considerably beyond the time usual in the Japanese Imperial family. We presume that ill-health has been the cause of the delay. Nothing is generally known as to the lady upon whom the Imperial choice has fallen.

TOKYO.

There is a big scheme of harbour construction on the tapis in Tokyo. The detritus carried down by the Sumida River is the chief cause of the shallowness of the present harbour, and must always constitute a great difficulty. What is proposed, therefore, is virtually to abolish the Sumida by deflecting its course into the Nakagawa somewhere in the neighbourhood of Senju, and filling up the bed from Senju to Tsukiji. By filling up the bed it is not meant that the water communication now furnished by the Sumida would be destroyed, but only that the river would be reduced to the dimensions of a large deep canal. The area of the reclaimed land, a wide belt running through the most populous parts of the city from end to end, would be very great, and its value enormous. But how seriously such a scheme would affect the citizens: directly affect the thousand of persons now living along the banks of the Sumida and deriving their livelihood from the river; indirectly affect the whole of the middle and upper classes whose existence, without the broad, placid river of multitudinous memories, would be deprived of so many compensations for the toil and toil of city life. We do not attach the least credence to this scheme, for our own part. The Tokyo folk are great in planning but very small in practice. When they have remedied some of the innumerable defects which render their city a disgrace to Japan, one may be disposed to believe in their earnestness about really formidable enterprises.

The Tokyo Municipality have determined to send to America and Europe a commission charged with the duty of inquiring into a long list of matters—urban administration, education, sanitation, hospitals and asylums, communications, road-making, drainage, and so on. The catalogue of cities to be visited includes six in the United States, five in Great Britain, three in France, two in Belgium, two in Germany, one in Holland, two in Austria-Hungary and one in Italy. It is a very pretty scheme, and it has obvious advantages. One is that no steps need be taken to effect any improvements in the present wretched condition of Tokyo until the commission returns, and as 22 cities have to be visited, and extensive investigations must be undertaken in each, the commission, unless its trip is to be a mere junketing, must devote at least a year, and a half to its work. Meanwhile Tokyo will remain in statu quo, and a complete answer to all complaints will be that the commission's report is in process of compilation. Then, by the time the commission returns, the men that sent it will be out of power, and their successors will be able to pigeon-hole the report with perfect grace.

But is it possible that any necessity for such a commission exists? Does not Japan possess a number of engineers who have not only been fully educated in all the matters which the commission is to investigate, but have also completed their education in several of the great cities which it is to visit? Are there not innumerable books accessible explaining with the utmost accuracy of detail all the points the commission has to consider? And if Japan's engineers are not competent to undertake the necessary works, and her experts are unable to obtain the desired information from books, would it not be far more practical, expeditious and economical to employ two or three qualified foreigners?

We mention above a rumour to the effect that a scheme was on the tapis for diverting the greater part of the Sumida River's volume into the Nakagawa, above Senju; reducing the former river, below that place, to the dimensions of a canal, and thus permitting the successful dredging and deepening of the space within the forts, which is at present kept perpetually shallow by the detritus of the Sumida. Another project is now spoken of as having been suggested by Mr. Furuichi, the well-known Chief-Engineer of the Home Department. It is to fill up the whole fore-shore from the Shiba Detached Palace to Shinagawa by dredging the bay in front. The Tokyo newspapers which give this information do not explain what Mr. Furuichi proposes to do with the Sumida River, the whole source of difficulty, but they tell us that the area of the reclaimed land would be eight hundred thousand tsudo, which, at 100 yen per tsudo, would represent eighty million yen. Even after the amplest allowance has been made for roads, canals, &c., there would certainly remain four or five hundred thousand tsudo, and as the total expenditure would not exceed 30 million yen, a substantial margin is in sight. Pending the sale of sufficient land to cover the initial outlay, harbour and wharfage dues might be levied to pay interest, and the Government's assistance might be invoked.

If the Tokyo people had even a moderate degree of enterprise, they would have possessed a harbour long ago. Perhaps they are wakening up at last. But we doubt it. At all events, they ought to be able to manage their own business without assistance from the Treasury. There is no reason why the whole nation should be obliged to put its hand into its pocket because the people in the capital want to enjoy a larger measure of prosperity but have not the courage to procure it by their own exertions. Another point is that if heavy harbour dues and wharfage charges are to be levied in Tokyo, shippers will certainly prefer Yokohama.

SENSATIONS AGAIN.

It is the unexpected that always happens. We certainly should never have imagined that an eminently sober journal like the Mainichi Shimbun would suddenly begin to cut sensational capers of a most extravagant nature. But our solemn contemporary has struck a new vein and seems determined to exploit it for all that it is worth. The other day it published an announcement in huge type to the effect that some great problem of foreign policy had suddenly presented itself for solution, and that the wit of all the country's leading statesmen was required to avert a crisis. That was a cautiously vague item of news. The Mainichi now becomes more explicit. It has discovered a colossal mare's nest in which certain giant eggs of gold are being incubated by Viscounts Katsura and Aoki. At Naka-Kozaka in Joshu there is an iron mine which the Government tried to work some years ago, but without success. Then it occupied the attention of Mr. Maruyama, and ultimately it came into the possession of a speculator called Ogura, who, with the assistance of another speculator, Kaida, is trying to sell it to the Government for 10 million yen. The Minister of War and the Minister of Foreign Affairs are promoting the scheme, and it is pretty certain that they will bleed the Treasury to the extent of 5 millions at any rate, a part of which will go to defray the organization expenses of the new political party!

Does the Mainichi Shimbun credit that nonsense? If so, it really ought to put up its shutters and advertise its plant for sale, because its capacity to supply the public with intelligence has disappeared. If it does not credit it, then the verdict about its condition must be still less complimentary.

JAPAN TEA DEALERS.

A meeting of representatives of all the tea-growers and tea-dealers in Japan has been held at Yamada in Ise, and various resolutions have been unanimously passed. The first is that steps must be taken to protest against the heavy duty which Canada talks of imposing on Japanese tea; the second, that Japan must send consuls to Canada; the third, that delegates must be sent to Canada and the United States in the interests of the tea trade; the fourth, that the duty imposed last year by America ought to be abolished; and the fifth, that efforts should be made to obtain a reduced scale of charges for the transport of tea by steamer and railway. The Asahi Shimbun is very severe on these proposals. It says that for Japanese provincials to get up an agitation with the idea of influencing the Canadian or American Governments is like dropping medicine into a man's eye from a room upstairs; that any steps now taken by the Tokyo Foreign Office will be as futile as beginning to spin a rope for a thief after he has escaped; and that sending consuls to Canada and America for the purpose contemplated will be as though one should try to sever a stream of water with a sword. The original fault rests with the negotiators of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty who agreed that the British colonies should be excluded from the Treaty's purview, and with the bunglers who placed France in a position to discriminate against Japanese silk fabrics.

That is pungent criticism, at any rate. But, however just it may be with regard to Japanese diplomacy in Paris, it has no basis of facts in the case of England. There seems to be little doubt that a bad mistake was made by the Japanese Representative in France, but, as to the inclusion of the British Colonies in the Treaty, the thing was impossible. Even supposing that the positions had been reversed, England being the one to apply for Treaty Revision and Japan the one to concede it, there would still have been no possibility of making the document binding on the British Colonies. They are absolutely independent of the mother country in matters of tariff. Does not the Asahi know that some of the British colonies actually exclude British manufactures by means of a protective tariff? How, then, could England compel them to grant to Japan privileges which they deny to herself.

SUPERFICIES ONCE MORE.

A feeling of uneasiness with regard to superficies seems to have been again engendered by the recent discussion between this journal and the Japan Times. We do not see any valid reason for such a feeling. The original doubts about superficies had reference solely to its nature. Was it or was it not a method of land tenure which might fairly be regarded as the equivalent of an English building lease; that it to say, a lease for such a lengthy term of years as would warrant the erection of expensive buildings on the site? That point, we imagine, has been settled to the satisfaction of every-body, and that point is not touched at all by the recent discussion. What the Japan Times and the Japan Mail discussed was the authority under which British subjects will enjoy the privilege of superficies after the revised treaties go into operation. That they will enjoy the privilege is not queried in any manner by the writer in the Japan Times. Upon that fact it is well to insist, for the general public seem to have misunderstood it. Neither is the nature of superficies disputed, nor are any doubts raised as to the right of British subjects to enjoy it. The whole problem is, will they enjoy it by grace of Japanese legislation, or will they enjoy it under the German Treaty as most favoured nationals? We allege that they will have the dual right; the Japan Times says, "No; they will have the legislative right only." The practical difference between the two contentions is that, according to our view, British subjects can not be deprived of the right so long as the Treaties remain in force and so long as superficies is among the forms of land tenure recognised by the laws of Japan; whereas, according to the view of the Japan Times, they have no treaty claim to the privilege and may be deprived of it by independent legislation. Of course the proposition advanced by the writer in the Japan Times sounds a little alarming, but, when considered carefully, it is found not to suggest any cause of disquietude. For, in the first place, whether the Government of Japan admits or denies that land tenure for commercial purposes falls within the purview of the most-favoured-nation clause in a treaty of amity and commerce, there certainly can not be any reasonable fear that the Japanese Government, while granting the privilege of superficies to German subjects under the explicit provisions of the German Treaty, will attempt to withhold it from British subjects. That would be an act of manifestly unfriendly discrimination, against which the British Government would be justified in entering a very strong protest, and it would moreover be an act entirely contrary to the proved sentiments and uniform traditions of Japan. In the second place, even if the right of British subjects to enjoy the privilege depends solely upon Japanese legislation, it is nevertheless a right not at all likely to be disturbed. The provisions about superficies were included in the laws of Japan, not for the sake of foreigners, but for the convenience of the Japanese people. Superficies is found in the original Code, promulgated ten years ago, when the Japanese Government was prepared, and had shown its willingness, to grant by treaty to foreigners the right of land ownership, and before any question about the tenure of land by aliens had arisen. In order to deprive British subjects of the privilege of superficies by legislation, it would be necessary to remove the right altogether from the laws of Japan, for since the Treaty promises national treatment to the British subjects in Japan, the privileges conferred by Japanese laws upon Japanese subjects are, speaking generally, enjoyable by British subjects, and it would be impossible for the Diet to pass a law declaring that, although the form of land tenure called "superficies" continues to exist for the convenience of the Japanese people, it should be denied to British subjects. It follows, therefore, that even if the contention of the Japan Times be admitted, superficies will continue to be enjoyable by British subjects so long as it remains a legally recognised institution in Japan, on the one hand, and so long, on the other, as the Japanese Government is not disposed to resort to special legislation at the cost of great inconvenience to the whole Japanese nation for the purpose of setting up most unfriendly and unfair discrimination between British subjects and German subjects. With this two-fold protection, surely we may all sleep soundly.

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT IN JAPAN.

Statistics published by the Government show that the number of civil officials employed in the administration of State affairs—local officials included but those of the Imperial Household Department excluded—and the amount of their salaries during twelve years ended 1897, have been as follow:—

Year.	Number of officials.	Total of yearly salaries.
	Nin.	Yen.
1886	40,737	9,625,800
1887	44,076	10,525,440
1888	45,558	11,016,588
1889	46,407	11,189,748
1890	50,353	12,001,784
1891	48,979	11,254,361
1892	49,143	11,452,252
1893	45,617	10,761,164
1894	46,203	11,035,496
1895	46,698	11,405,425
1896	57,502	14,516,262
1897	65,502	17,104,226

It is noticeable that while the number of officials has increased by 32 per cent., the total of the yearly salaries has grown by nearly 78 per cent., and that whereas the average annual pay of officials was 236 yen in 1886, it was 261 yen in 1897. If to the above figures we add the number of military officers, namely 10,009, approximately, who are in receipt of yearly salaries aggregating 4,900,000 yen, and the number of naval officers, namely, 4,000 approximately, whose salaries aggregate 1,700,000 yen, we find that the total personnel is 80,000, approximately, and that the total salaries are 24 million yen. This means that each unit of the population pays about 57 sen for the support of the officials and the naval and military officers. The year 1886 witnessed the sweeping administrative reforms introduced by Count Ito; reforms which involved an immense reduction in the personnel of the administration and in the total amount of administrative salaries. Thenceforth until 1896 no remarkable change took place, but contemporaneously with the adoption of the post-bellum programme the number of officials increased by 40 per cent. and the amount of their salaries by 50 per cent. The Nippon, discussing the figures of the above table, seems disposed to attribute these changes to the introduction of constitutional government, and noting also how greatly the prices of all the necessities of life have increased of late years, asks what it is that men find to admire in parliamentary institutions. Certainly the experience of all countries shows that constitutional, and especially republican, government has the effect of augmenting public expenditures, and Japan's case is not likely to prove an exception. But the responsibility for high prices and increased administrative expenses can not fairly be laid to the door of constitutionalism in this country as yet.

DEVELOPMENT OF RAILWAYS DURING THE PAST THREE YEARS.

At no time, says the Mainichi, has Japan made such marked progress in extending her railways as during the past two years. It is not a question of increased traffic, but only of added mileage. According to the latest investigations, the mileage of state and private railways open at the end of the 31st year (1898) totalled 3,406 miles, which figure, compared with that for the 28th year (1895)—2,272 miles—shows an increase of 1,134 miles, or 33.3 per cent. Such rapid development is without precedent, and will probably not be equalled in the future. The following table gives the figures for the various railways throughout the empire:—

FORMOSA BANDITS.

We learn from vernacular newspapers that the number of bandits who made act of submission in Formosa from January 1st to the date of most recent advices was 2,297; namely, 1,414 in Taichiu and 883 in Lianan. It seems to be doubtful, however, whether these men are all sincere, and at any rate, a great many others continue to defy Japanese authority.

GERMAN DEMANDS IN CHINA.

A telegram published by the Chuo Shimbun and dated at Peking on the 26th, says that Germany has made the withdrawal of her troops from Jitchiau conditional on the building of a Church at Ichou by the Chinese Authorities. The latest intelligence about Germany's doings in Shantung carried us down to the 20th instant, when she was said to have withdrawn the force stationed at Ichou but to have left 120 men at Jitchiau. Apparently she has determined not to complete the evacuation without exacting a substantial concession from China.

China presents just now such a miserable spectacle of helplessness and pusillanimity that it is very difficult to sympathise with her. At the same time to compel her to erect, at public expense, places of worship for an alien faith which the vast majority of her people abhor, is a form of humiliation that thoughtful men can scarcely approve. Christianity and politics are ill-matched companions, nor do the interests of the former seem to be really promoted when the armed forces of Occidental States are employed for its propaganda in the Orient. It is scarcely possible to conceive any necessity more painful to a nation than to be called upon to build, with its own hand and at its own charges, edifices for the honour of strange gods, and if these arbitrary exactions provoke retaliatory outrages, who can be surprised? It seems to us that the policy of European Powers towards China is travelling in a vicious circle. The punishments imposed upon her, instead of being deterrent, are calculated to become incentive of fresh offences. Injury involves exaction and exaction provokes fresh injury. There can be only one ending—the complete overthrow of the Chinese Empire. Probably that will be a happy ending so far as the Chinese people are concerned, but the stages by which it is being reached constitute the worst record that civilization ever wrote for itself.

CAPTAIN COGHLAN.

Captain Coghlan, whose extraordinary utterances in New York have been made the subject of international complaint, does not enjoy a very high reputation in the United States' naval service, we believe. He is said to be a "jingoo" of very pronounced type, and moreover to be equipped with a vocabulary which renders his expressions of opinion more forceful than picturesque. Still naval officers, when they attain the rank of captain, are expected to exercise some discretion of speech and they are usually so circumspect in that respect that whatever allowances be made for Captain Coghlan's idiosyncracies, his extraordinary recklessness can only be regarded as an after-dinner episode, especially since it was coupled with the recital of ribald doggerel. We have heard some expressions of surprise that the German Representative in Washington should have thought it worth while, or even dignified, to take official notice of an incident. Certainly he might have waited to see whether the American Secretary of State would not take action of his own accord. That would have been the more graceful course, and we shall not be surprised to find that the haste shown by the Ambassador has engendered some ill-feeling in America. But failing spontaneous action on the part of the United States' Government, we do not see that the Ambassador could have had any alternative. An officer is an officer under all circumstances, and the State whose commission he carries is responsible for his public acts so long as it does not disavow them.

What really happened at Manila between the Americans and the Germans will probably remain a mystery for some time. Two statements have been made, one by Americans, the other by the Germans. The former is to the effect that arms were conveyed to the Filipinos with the active connivance and assistance of German naval officers, and that when the American Admiral objected, his German colleague pretexted ignorance of what had taken place; an explanation which seemed so incredible in view of the strict discipline maintained in German ships that it greatly provoked Americans. The German story is that Admiral Dewey, having accused the German officer of assisting the Filipinos to obtain arms, signified his intention of searching the German vessels for contraband of war, whereupon the German Admiral steamed out of Manila Bay and returned with his ships cleared for action. Neither tale is credible in its entirety, but with embody testimony to the fact that the source of difficulty was the conveyance of arms to the Filipinos. At all events, the incident is closed, and nothing could be more regrettable than its renewal through the after-dinner effervescence of men like Captain Coghlan.

MALTRTREATMENT OF A PRISONER BY THE WATER POLICE.

The two constables of the Water Police who recently beat a servant woman to make her confess a crime which she had not perpetrated, have been committed for trial, one being detained in custody, and the other entrusted to the care of his friends. Punishment has also fallen upon the Superintendent who erroneously reported the loss of his watch, and thus brought the woman into trouble. The Superintendent's case seems rather hard. He missed his watch, imagined that it had been stolen, suspected his servant, and did what most men would have done under the circumstances, gave information to the police. Afterwards he discovered that he had himself misplaced the watch, but, in the meanwhile, the woman had suffered. The code of vicarious responsibility is distinctly severe in Japan.

Quite a sensation seems to have been caused by the recently reported example of official misconduct. Day by day, the Tokyo journals have alluded to the trial of the two water-policemen who are accused of beating a servant girl until she confessed the theft of a watch which had never been stolen at all. One of the constables is supposed to have used a futte, or short metal mace carried by policemen in former times, and the other wielded a hempen rope. Both denied the assault, but the fact that the girl had made a confession though she was wholly innocent, and the fact that bruises were found on her body by a medical man, constituted an ugly case against the police. The girl has put in a certificate showing that she was unable to work for 10 days and that she had to apply medicine to her injuries for over two weeks. The law says that striking and wounding so as to incapacitate a person for any period not exceeding 20 days, shall be punishable with imprisonment with hard labour for not less than one month and not more than one year. That is the sentence hanging over the head of the constable who used the mace. The other man, he of the rope, stands charged with a misdemeanour only, and can not be sentenced to more than 10 days' confinement. We have already explained that the police inspector who imagined his watch had been stolen, and who caused the servant-girl to be arrested on suspicion, had to resign his post, though the beating took place entirely without his cognisance.

GARDEN PARTY IN TOKYO.

On the 26th instant a garden party was given by Count and Countess Kuroda at their residence in the Mita suburb of Tokyo to celebrate the marriage of Miss Kuroda to the eldest son of Viscount Enomoto. The guests numbered several hundreds, and included Her Imperial Highness Princess Kanin, nearly all the Cabinet Ministers, the Foreign Representatives, and the majority of the leading residents of Tokyo, Japanese and foreign. Count Kuroda is well known for his love of what may be called the urban style of Japanese garden; that is to say, a garden in which landscape effects are less considered than rare and curious trees, fantastic rockeries and potted shrubs. The Mita garden contains a remarkable display of nature's freaks in the way of quaint or picturesque stones, and of art's achievements in the form of trees which, having been for centuries subjected to expert control, have grown into strange shapes, combining the crabbedness of age with the capriciousness of youth. There was also a large and interesting collection of sekisho, or miniature pot-rockeries, for which the Japanese are famous. Music, dancing, feats of legerdemain, and other amusements were provided for the amusement of the guests, and refreshments were served in a separate building.

JUDICIAL OFFICIALS AND FOREIGN LANGUAGES.

It is urged by the Fiji Shimpō that foreign languages should be included in the subjects of examination for public procurators and judges. This recommendation is based on the hypothesis that a good deal of business in which foreigners are concerned will come before the Courts after the Revised Treaties go into operation, and on the fact that in order to make progress in juristic knowledge competence to study foreign works on jurisprudence is essential. The Fiji seems to us to overstep the legitimate mark in this matter. We do not know of any country where such knowledge is required of judicial officials. No doubt it would be a good thing that Japanese procurators and judges should possess a working knowledge of English, or French, or German, but to make the attainment compulsory would be scarcely fair.

Warren's Circus, which appears to have done exceedingly well at Manila, Hongkong, and Shanghai, intends coming on to Japan in about three weeks' time.

JAPANESE EDUCATION.

THE question of foreigners in Japanese education is on the tapis in a very practical manner. There has been submitted by the Department of Education to the High Educational Council now in session, a set of proposals which are intended to form the basis of legislation, if approved by the Council. Among these proposals some have obvious reference to the contingency of foreigners taking part in education, and others are independently interesting. We have already alluded to one of the proposals, namely, that no person not conversant with the Japanese language shall be permitted to become a teacher in a private school, unless the instruction is to be given in some special subject. When this proposal came before the Council for discussion, Mr. HOZUMI moved that a further qualification be imposed, namely five years' previous residence in Japan, but the motion was rejected. Dr. KUMAMOTO then moved that a clause be inserted disqualifying all foreigners as founders of private schools in Japan. This suggestion seems to have been prompted by the Doshisha affair and the incidents growing out of it. Mr. EBARA SOROKU strongly opposed it. He asked whether such a restriction was imposed in any country, and he denounced the idea as bigoted, small-minded, and contemptible. Happily the Council rejected the motion.

Then followed the discussion of the Department's 9th proposal, namely, that any person establishing a private school must have a teacher's certificate. Mr. HOZUMI moved that this be amended so as to make the restriction apply to the principal of a school, not to its founder, but, strange to say, the Council rejected the amendment and adopted the original proposal. The object of such a law is quite obscure to ordinary minds. Looking at the question as outsiders, we observe that nothing is more conspicuously lacking in Japan at present than private enterprise in the field of education. In Europe and America munificent contributions are made every year by private individuals for the endowment or equipment of colleges and schools. In Japan there is comparatively little evidence of such a spirit. Count OKUMA and Mr. FUKUZAWA are conspicuous exceptions, and of late the action of Mr. OKURA KIHACHIRO set an example which might have borne fruit. But now we have the High Educational Council, and apparently the Department of Education also, stepping in to check any repetition of these public-spirited acts. What conceivable reason is there to require that the founder of a private school must be qualified to discharge the duties of a teacher? Founders of schools are generally men of wealth who have not the remotest intention of undertaking pedagogic functions. They merely give their money, and leave the teaching to others. If this proposal is to be interpreted according to the ordinary rules of language, it must be described as one of the most mischievous and ill-advised measures ever conceived.

The Council was then asked to consider a proposal with reference to the qualifications of teachers in private schools, kindergartens, schools for the deaf and dumb, &c. Its gist was that any teacher, not duly provided with a certificate of competence, must furnish proof of his scholastic ability (gakuryoku) and of his good conduct (hinkei) to the Governor of the Prefecture where his duty lies, or to the Minister of Education. Presumably such a regulation is considered necessary in Japan. At all events it was passed by the Council, though to us it looks like very grandmotherly legislation. The standard of qualifications for elementary school teachers in Japan is so low that to have satisfied it constitutes no guarantee of pedagogic competence.

The most interesting and important proposal of all related to religion in education. It ran thus:—

In elementary schools, middle schools, high schools, and all other schools whose curricula are fixed by law, as well as in schools which enjoy special privileges from the Government, no religious instruction must be given, nor must any religious exercises be performed.

Mr. EBARA SOROKU denounced this proposal in strong terms, and was strenuously supported by Mr. KAMADA of the Keio-Gijuku. Both gentlemen argued that such a veto was the worst kind of bigotry, and must have the effect of destroying national morality. Mr. EBARA is reported to have contended that religion is absolutely essential to the lower orders of the population; a strange argument, much more objectionable for the sake of what it implies than commendable for what it advocates. However, Mr. EBARA'S speech would probably read differently if we had it in full. In spite of the resolute opposition offered by these two distinguished publicists, the Council adopted the proposal as it stood, and there is therefore much reason to fear that it may ultimately be embodied in the laws of the land. If so, it will be the very worst piece of legislation ever adopted by Japan. Our readers will perceive that the gravamen of the proposal is contained in the words "as well as in schools which enjoy special privileges from the Government" (seifu no tokken wo yetaru gakko). That refers to private schools which, although not in receipt of any aid from the State, conform their curricula to the officially prescribed standards of public schools, and are consequently placed on the same footing as the latter in respect of exemption from conscription. To put the matter succinctly and concretely, a law embodying the above restriction would make this declaration to Japanese parents:—"You must choose one of two courses. Either banish religion altogether from the education of your children, and by so doing secure for them exemption from conscription until they have completed their studies and reached the age of 27; or include religious instruction in their education and thus expose them to the risk of being drafted into the ranks of the Army at 20 years of age." Is it possible to conceive a more terrible alternative? Fancy a conscientious father who believes in GOD, in a future state of existence, and in an eternity of happiness or misery—fancy such a father having to purchase his child's exemption from military service by ruling religious instruction out of his life! It is perfectly right and proper that religious teaching and religious exercises should be forbidden in schools which are supported, partially or wholly, by the proceeds of general taxation. That is an essential result of the principle of freedom of conscience. No man should be obliged to contribute to the maintenance of a school where a creed is taught that he does not himself embrace. But the schools in question are private schools; schools which receive no manner of State aid, but which, in virtue of their pedagogic standard, are entitled to rank at least as high as public schools. Thus the announcement which the Department of Education and the High Educational Council contemplate making to the nation is, "You shall banish religion from the school life of your children or pay the penalty of exposing them to conscription. You are not only required to pay taxes for the support of schools where religion in every form is nominally tabooed" (nominally, not really, as we shall presently show), "but you are also forbidden to establish private schools of your own where your children may be taught the faith you cherish, for if you establish such schools we shall take your sons away when they reach the age of 20, and make them serve as conscripts." There is only one name for such legislation. It is semi-barbarous. The men who drafted the proposal and the men who voted for it stand on precisely the same plane of civilization as did the Inquisitors of Spain. Few parents possessing any earnest convictions would not prefer to be laid on the rack rather than to see religious influences banished from their children's lives.

That is the moral side of the argument. Japan may rest assured that if she adopts this step, she will be hopelessly degraded in the eyes of the civilized world. The finger of scorn and pity will be pointed at her as a nation of narrow-minded bigots, three hundred years behind the time of which she claims to stand abreast.

It seems almost a sacrilege to add anything to the broad, moral condemnation of this cruel legislation, but we observe with astonishment that its palpably un-
